PERFECT, PERFECTION: Perfection is in the O T ascribed to God, to man, and to impersonal objects. (1) When applied to impersonal objects (shālēm, e.g., "A perfect and just weight," Dt 25 15; nākhōn, 'established,' 'perfected,' the "perfect day," Pr 4 18, etc.), the word is the synonym of 'complete,' i.e., full in measure, ideal in quality and with perfect harmony of parts. The notion does not, however, occur with an attempt at precision, but with the same freedom and approximation to exactness as outside the Bible. (2) When applied to the Divine character or works, from the nature of the case, the term must connote absolutely the best in all respects that it is possible for the speaker to think of (tāmīm, II S 22 31; Ps 18 30; Job 37 16; Dt 32 4). (3) When used of man it denotes, first of all, conformity to the ideal entertained at the time, and is therefore a relative and quite variable and expansive term. David claims to be perfect in this sense (Ps 18 23), though elsewhere confessing sinfulness (Ps 51 3 ff.). Asa was perfect because his attitude was right in all things, though his conduct in the matter of removing the high places did not conform to the law of J″ (shālēm, I K 15 14). This kind of perfection was attained by many of the towering figures of Israel's history. Noah and Job were perfect (tāmīm, Gn 6 9; Job 1 1, 8, 2 3). It is a duty to attain such perfection (Dt 8 13).

In the N T use of the term the ethical element as distinguished from the statutory, the positive as distinguished from the negative, and the inward as distinguished from the outward become prominent in the idea of perfection. The notion thus becomes absolute. When Jesus holds up the ideal it is to show it as existing in God (Mt 5 48). Mere performance of duty does not make perfect (Lk 17 10). In the teaching of the Apostles the additional light which was shed by the life and example of Jesus is thrown on the idea (Ph 2 5; Eph 4 32). And this is finally worked out in the Ep. to the Hebrews into a "doctrine of perfection" (7 11, 12 23). A. C. Z.

PERFUMER. See Ointments and Perfumes, § 2.

PERGA, pęr'ga (Πέργη): In Roman times the capital of Pamphylia (q.v.). It was situated not far from the mouth of the Cestrus river. P. was captured by Alexander on his eastward march, but played only an insignificant rôle in history. It was the seat of a famous cult of Artemis, who was akin to the "Diana of the Ephesians," and was called the "Queen of Perga." Her figure and temple appear on coins of P. The site of this temple, which was plundered by Verres (see Cicero), is not positively identified, but probably it was on the Acropolis, N. of the city. The ruins of P. show that it was a wealthy town. The well-preserved theater seated 13,000 people; the stadium is also well preserved. Besides these there are ruins of a palestra, baths, agora, covered market-porticoes, and a basilica. It was at P that Paul first landed on the soil of Asia Minor, and here he was afflicted with a severe illness (malaria, the "thorn in the flesh" of II Co 12 7). See also ASIA MINOR, § 13. J. R. S. S.

PERGAMUM, pẹr'ga-mum (Πέργαμον): A city of Mysia, situated 15 m. from the sea, at the confluence of two small rivers in the Caïcus valley. It lay at the foot of a lofty, steep, terraced, free-standing hill, towering 1,000 ft. above the plain and crowned by an acropolis, or natural fortress, the site of the earliest settlement, said to have been made by Arcadian colonists under Telephus, son of Heracles. The Greek element predominated as early as Persian times, but P attained to no prominence until selected by Lysimachus as a strong fortress in which to deposit his treasure of 9,000 talents in the care of his chamberlain and treasurer Philetærus, who proved disloyal and thereby laid the foundation of the future greatness of P., which became the capital of the little principality founded by him after the fall of Lysimachus in 282 B.C. In spite of wars with the Seleucids, Bithynians, and Gauls, Philetærus succeeded in passing on his principality to Eumenes I (263–241), who fought many battles and made great conquests in Asia Minor. He was succeeded by his cousin Attalus I (241–197), who was the first to assume the title of king. He defeated the Gauls, about 235, and quartered them in that portion of Phrygia thenceforth known as Galatia (see ASIA MINOR, § 6). In commemoration of his victory, he erected as a votive monument the famous Gigantomachia at Athens, of which the 'Dying Gaul' (Gladiator) is a reminiscence. Attalus I consolidated his kingdom by a wise and fortunate alliance with Rome, which used P. as a 'buffer-state' between Macedonia and Syria. In his emulation of Alexandria and Rhodes, Attalus I proved himself a liberal patron of all industries, but especially of letters, learning (the school of rhetoric at P. greatly influenced Roman oratory and learning), and art (the Pergamenian school of sculpture). He was succeeded by his son Eumenes II (197–159), who continued the policy of alliance with the Romans in their wars with Antiochus and Perseus. He fought with Scipio at Magnesia (191), and on the fall of Antiochus (190) received as his reward the Thracian Chersonesus and the eis-Tauran domains of Antiochus. His kingdom was almost identical with the ancient kingdom of Crœsus (Phrygia, Lydia, Pisidia, Pamphylia, parts of Lycaonia, and perhaps Caria). He founded the famous library, which Antony afterward gave to Cleopatra (200,000 rolls), who incorporated it in the library of Alexandria. In commemoration of the Pergamenian victory over the Gauls, he built on the Acropolis a great altar (40 ft. high) to Zeus, the Savior, which he decorated with sculptures and a colossal frieze in very high relief, depicting the battle between gods (Pergamenians) and giants (defeated Gauls). This was one of the marvels of the age and now decorates the Berlin Museum. He was succeeded by his brother Attalus II (Philadelphus) (159–138), also a patron of art and letters and founder of Attalia and Philadelphia (q.v.). Attalus II was succeeded by his nephew Attalus III (Philometor) (son of Eumenes II), who at the close of his short reign (138–133) bequeathed his kingdom to Rome. The genuineness of the will was contested by his half-brother Aristonicus, an illegitimate son of Eumenes II, who attempted to make good his claim to the throne. He was suppressed and executed by the Romans (129), who entered upon their inheritance in 130, and at that time organized the kingdom of Pergamum into Provincia Asia (see ASIA MINOR, § 2) with Pergamum as capital (hence John's reference in Rev 2 12 to the "sword," the symbol of Roman authority), seat of a conventus (judicial district), and center from which radiated the Roman roads for western Asia Minor. Pergamum's persistent loyalty to Rome was shown later on by the erection of a temple to the god Augustus on the Acropolis ("the throne of Satan," Rev 2 13). During the reign of Eumenes II the librarians of Alexandria became jealous of Pergamum's library and induced Ptolemy to prohibit the exportation of papyrus (for bookmaking) from Egypt. This prohibition redounded to the good of mankind, for it led to the invention of parchment (corruption of Pergamena, short for Pergamena charta), a more enduring material for books, alluded to by St. John in Rev 2 17, "I will give him" (not your white parchment, but something even more durable) "a white stone" (or tessera, and I will imitate the example of Octavianus with his new imperial title Augustus, and will write upon the white stone) "a new name" (the name of God). The catalogue of the library of P., made by Crates, was of great value to writers on the history of literature. A globe of the earth stood in the front court of the king's palace. P. was the birthplace of the rhetor Apollodorus and of the physician Galenus. It was famous for the worship of Asclepios, to whose shrine outside the city ailing visitors flocked from everywhere. It early accepted Christianity and was one of the "Seven Churches" addressed by St. John in the Apocalypse (Rev 2 12-17). J. R. S. S.

PERIDA, pẹ-rai'da. See PERUDA.

PERIZZITE, per'i-zait (פְּרִזִּי, perizzī): One of the races in Canaan which the Israelites were expected to displace (Ex 33 2; Dt 20 17). There is much uncertainty as to their character and affiliations. They were not a race of great importance like the Hittites and Amorites, or even the Canaanites. Their name is not given in Gn ch. 10 among the descendants of Canaan (peoples of the Canaanite group). It has therefore been suggested that they were the aborigines of Palestine whom the Canaanites dispossessed and enslaved (Dillmann, Com. on Gn., ch. 10). According to a better theory, they were not a race at all, but a class or caste among the Canaanites, noted for dwelling in villages (cf. Moore, on Jg 1 5 in Int. Crit. Com.). A. C. Z.

PERPETUAL: This term is the rendering of three Heb. words: (1) nētsaḥ or netsaḥ, the root idea of which is 'brightness' or 'brilliancy' and then 'continuance' (Ps 9 6, 74 3; Jer 8 5 [the verbal form], 15 18). (2) tāmīdh, 'continuance' or 'continual,' in the sense of taking place day by day continually (Ex 30 8; Lv 6 20). (3) 'ōlām, 'age' or 'age-long,' much like the Gr. αἰών, αἰώνιος, and used sometimes in a sense practically equivalent to 'eternal' (Jer 5 22; Hab 3 6, etc.), but generally in a less absolute sense (Gn 9 12; Ex 29 9, etc.). E. E. N.

PERSECUTION: All the words rendered "persecution" and "persecute," with the exception of θλίψις (Ac 11 19), etymologically lead back to the notion of pursuing. The persecutor is pictured as hunting and following after the persecuted. Persecution, however, as 'oppression for the sake of conscience,' is not an O T conception. It was first suggested by the experiences of the Maccabæan age, especially under Antiochus Epiphanes. In the N T it is always held in view as a possibility (Mt 13 21; Mk 10 30), and so made a matter of record when it occurs in fact (Ac 8 1). A. C. Z.

PERSEPOLIS, pẹr-sep'o-lis (Περσέπολις): The ancient capital of Persia proper, plundered by Alexander the Great. It is referred to in II Mac 9 2 as the city which was entered by Antiochus Epiphanes (circa 165 B.C.) for the purpose of robbing a temple (cf. I Mac 6 1). But it is improbable that a temple was then at Persepolis. E. E. N.

PERSIA, PERSIANS: Persia (פָּרַס, pāraṣ) is the name given in the O T to a country lying SE. of Susiana and NW. of Carmania with the Persian Gulf to the SW and Arabia to the NE. Like Media, it was inhabited by people of Aryan (more precisely, Iranian) stock. P. sprang into sudden importance with the appearance of Cyrus the Great (529 B.C.), under whose leadership its people overthrew the Median supremacy, gained control of Media and thus established an empire of their own. Cyrus then proceeded to capture Babylon (538 B.C.), which was at the time in the hands of the weak successors of Nebuchadrezzar. The whole of the vast possessions of Babylon, including Judæa, were transferred to the new empire. Media, though subject to P., must, however, have occupied a privileged place, as its name is associated with that of Persia in the title of the controlling powers ("Persia and Media," Est 1 3, 10 2; cf. also the usual designation "Medo-Persian Empire"). The monarchy founded by Cyrus was ruled successively by Cambyses (529–521), Darius I, Hystaspes (521–486), Xerxes I (486–465), Artaxerxes I, Longimanus (465–424), Darius II, Nothus (424–405), Artaxerxes II, Mnemon (405–359), Artaxerxes III, Ochus (359–338), Arses (338–336), and Darius III, Codomannus (336–331). Of these the O T knows and names Cyrus (Is 45 1), Darius I (Hag 1 1, 2 10; Zec 1 1), Xerxes ("Ahasuerus," Est 1 1, etc.; Ezr 4 7), Artaxerxes I (Ezr ch. 7 passim; Neh ch. 2 passim), and possibly Darius III, Codomannus. With the conquest of P. by Alexander (333–331 B.C.) the empire came to an end. The subsequent return to power of a Persian dynasty (the Sassanids), at the end of the Parthian domination (226 A.D.), falls outside the limits of the Biblical period.

The religion of the ancient Persians was a dualistic system, either devised or perfected by Zoroaster (Zarathustra, c. 1000 B.C.?). Its sacred book was the Zend-Avesta and its two eternal principles Ahuramazda (Ormuzd) and Ahriman (Angra-Mainyu). In the main, this system appears to have been independent and of non-Semitic origin; but in its later forms it bore traces of Semitic influence, such as the worship of Mithra (the sun-god). In its turn, the Avestan system influenced at least the form of the Semitic religions and among them later Judaism. But the points of contact between the O T and N T on the one side and Zoroastrianism on the other are not numerous, being limited perhaps to angelology and demonology (but cf. Mills, Avestan Eschatology, 1908; also Stave, Einfluss des Parsismus auf d. Juden, 1898; and on the whole subject, A. V W. Jackson, Persia, Ancient and Modern, 1905). A. C. Z.

PERSIS, pẹr'sis (Περσίς): A Christian woman at Rome to whom Paul sends a salutation in terms of warm commendation (Ro 16 12). E. E. N.

PERUDA, pẹ-rū'da (פְּרוּדָא, pᵉrūdhā'): The ancestral head of a family of "Solomon's servants" (Ezr 2 55; Perida in Neh 7 57). E. E. N.

PEST, PESTILENCE. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5 (9), and PLAGUE.

PESTLE: A short, thick instrument used for pounding or crushing material (grain, etc.) in a mortar (Pr 27 22). The Heb. term 'ēlī is practically identical with the Assyr. word elit of similar meaning. In Pr 27 22 the words "along with bruised grain" are probably a late gloss (cf. Toy, Int. Crit. Com., ad loc.). See Plate II of HOUSEHOLD UTENSILS, Fig. 13. E. E. N.

1. Name.

The original name of Simon Peter (Σίμων Πέτρος) was the Heb. name, שִׁמְעוֹן, Shim'ōn, Gr. Συμεών, which was easily shortened to conform to the Gr. Σίμων, Simon.

2. Early Life.

P. was the son of a certain Jona or John (Mt 16 17; cf. Jn 1 42, etc.) and was, according to Jn 1 45, a native of Bethsaida, though later he became a citizen of Capernaum, where he had a house, and with his brother Andrew was engaged in the fishing business in partnership with Zebedee and his two sons, James and John (Mk 1 16-31 = Mt 4 18-22; Mt 8 14-15 = Lk 5 1-11; Lk 4 38-39). He was married, and it is probable that in later years his wife accompanied him on his missionary tours (cf. I Co 9 5). Though not wealthy, Simon was a man of some property, not a poor, grossly ignorant laborer. Of his early education and attainments we know nothing definite. Galilee, his home, was practically a bilingual country. A good degree of Greek culture was possessed by the Greek or Gentile elements of the population. Hence Simon had abundant opportunity of becoming well acquainted with colloquial Greek, though his mother tongue was, of course, Aramaic. In childhood he was probably taught, as many other Jewish children were, to read the Hebrew Scriptures, although in the rabbinical sense he was not learned (Ac 4 13).

3. First Contact with Jesus.

Among those who flocked to hear John the Baptist were Peter and his brother Andrew—an indication of their interest in the religious hopes of the times. John's words made such an impression that the brothers attached themselves to him as (at least temporary) disciples. Soon after, Andrew met Jesus and at once sought his brother Simon and brought him to Jesus, who even then foreshadowed his future career by saying that he should be called Cephas (Κηφᾶς, the Gr. form of the Aram. כֵּיפָא, kēphā', 'rock,' of which the Gr. πέτρος, 'rock,' is the translation; cf. Jn 1 35-42). After continuing with Jesus for a while, they returned to their accustomed occupation. To what extent P. was with Jesus during the period covered by Jn chs. 2–4 is uncertain. When Jesus opened His public ministry in Galilee He summoned the brothers to a more permanent discipleship (Mk 1 16-20, and ‖s). For this summons their previous acquaintance with Jesus had prepared them, and it was with enthusiastic self-sacrifice they left all and followed Him. As yet, however, P. was only one of many whom Jesus attracted to Himself during the early months of His work in Galilee. This was a testing-time for Simon. He was a wholehearted, though often blundering, disciple. While he had much to learn, he was also willing to be taught, and this enabled him finally to grasp certain of the great essentials of Jesus' character, teaching, and mission. He showed such appreciation of Jesus' person and teaching that he was chosen by Jesus to be one of twelve, selected from the larger body of "disciples," who were to be "apostles," i.e., intimately associated with Him to learn of Him and (ultimately) be sent out by Him to declare His message and carry on His work (Mk 3 14).

4. Peter One of Jesus' Most Intimate Disciples.

With the brothers James and John, P. made a group of three with whom Jesus was most intimate and who alone were associated with Him on such occasions as the Transfiguration and the Prayer in the Garden of Gethsemane. To P. and his companions Jesus' refusal to allow the enthusiastic crowds, after the feeding of the five thousand (Mk 6 31-44; Jn 6 14-15), to proclaim Him as Messiah must have been a great disappointment. But the Twelve remained steadfast even after Jesus' popularity began to wane, and it was P. who voiced their conviction later in response to Jesus' searching question that He was indeed the Messiah (Mk 8 29; cf. Jn 6 68). It was his confession that drew from Jesus the commendation "thou art Peter (i.e., 'rock') and on this 'rock' I will build my church" (Mt 16 18). The true explanation of these and the immediately following words is somewhat uncertain. If they meant a personal primacy of P. over the Church, it is strange that the rest of the N T and the documents of early Christianity give not the slightest hint that P ever claimed or exercised any such supremacy. It seems better, therefore, to take them as referring to the truth that P. uttered (i.e., that Jesus was the Messiah) as the foundation of His Church. P himself was still far from comprehending the real nature of Jesus' mission. When Jesus soon after declared that it was necessary for Him to go to Jerusalem and suffer, P. protested vehemently and was severely rebuked. The Transfiguration scene may have opened his eyes more fully to the significance of Jesus' person. Thus his education proceeded, new lessons being learned daily. The experiences of Passion Week were full of significance for P He and John were sent into the city to prepare the Passover meal, which became the Lord's Supper (Mk 14 12 ff. and ‖s). He was a witness of the Agony in the Garden (Mk 14,32 ff. and ‖s). When Jesus was arrested, P drew his short sword and struck off the ear of one Malchus (Jn 18 10). Though with the others he fled when Jesus was arrested (Mk 14 50), he followed the party into the city and through the influence of John gained admission into the palace where Jesus' trial was proceeding (Mk 14 54 and ‖s; Jn 18 15 ff.). Here his fickleness and cowardice again overcame him, and when taunted by a servant-maid with an oath he denied that he knew Jesus (Mk 14 66 and ‖s). Overcome by shame, he went outside and wept. He was also a witness of Jesus' sufferings on the cross if not of His trial before Pilate. These scenes were so indelibly stamped on his mind that years after the impression was still vivid (I P 2 23, 5 1). The despair that settled over his soul when he saw his beloved Master die was not lighted by any definite hope of a resurrection. But when the women who visited the sepulcher early Sunday morning came back with the news of an open and empty tomb, P. and John ran to investigate. They found the tomb empty and wondered, with an incipient faith, at the orderly appearance of the grave-clothes (Jn 20 3-10), and then returned to their company. Later in the day Jesus appeared to P., the first of the Twelve to whom He showed Himself after the Passion (Mk 16 1-8; Lk 24 35; Jn 20 1-10; I Co 15 5). To P this was as a new birth, filled with a living hope (I P 1 3). He was present at most of the post-resurrection interviews between Jesus and His disciples, and to him in particular, probably because of his denial. Jesus very tenderly and suggestively reentrusted the Apostolic commission, intimating at the same time the self-denial and suffering involved in his future career (Jn ch. 21).

P. now took a leading part in the direction of the little band of disciples that was the nucleus of the Christian Church. It was he who proposed the election of a successor to Judas Iscariot (Ac 1 15 ff.) and on the day of Pentecost came forward to make the first statement of Christian doctrine to the world. The sermon as given in Ac 2 14-36 centers about the necessity of proving to the Jews that the crucified but now risen Jesus was indeed God's Messiah. The line of argument followed, from the analogy between ancient prophecy and the recent events connected with Jesus, was a convincing one to many Jews, and large numbers confessed their faith in Jesus as Messiah (Ac 2 37 ff.). Up to the time of the persecution that followed the martyrdom of Stephen the new movement was confined almost exclusively to Jerusalem, and it was P. who had the chief share in the guidance of affairs. His associate was John. These two figure prominently in the accounts of the first conflicts with the Jerusalem authorities (Ac ch. 3 f.). It was P. who rebuked Ananias and Sapphira for their covetousness (Ac 5 1-11), who was spokesman for the Apostles in their formal trial before the Sanhedrin (Ac 5 17-42), and whose fame was such that later tradition said that even his shadow was able to perform miracles (Ac 5 12-16). After the martyrdom of Stephen the Christian movement took on larger proportions, spreading throughout Palestine and into the neighboring countries. To a certain extent it was supervised by the Apostles. Ac preserves a record of two visitations by P. in connection with this work. The first was when he and John were sent by the Apostles to oversee the evangelistic labors of Philip in Samaria. Here P. came in contact with the magician Simon and severely rebuked his cupidity and lack of spiritual perception (Ac 8 14-25). The second tour led him in the regions to the northwest of Jerusalem as far as Joppa (Ac 9 32 ff.). From Joppa he was summoned by a vision and by messengers from Cornelius, a centurion at Cæsarea, to preach the gospel to the latter (Ac ch. 10). This was the first recorded preaching of the gospel by Jewish Christians to Gentiles. In this matter P. was led to a result he had not anticipated. At the end he found himself doing what he had never done before, fellowshiping freely with Gentiles, recognizing them as Christian brethren, and eating with them. Naturally, such conduct provoked sharp criticism on the part of the stricter members of the Jerusalem church, and when P. returned to Jerusalem he was called upon to give an account of his doings. His defense, that he had been guided by the Holy Spirit and that the Spirit's presence had been manifested while he was preaching to the Gentiles (Ac 11 1-18) was accepted, though probably with misgivings by some persons.

5. Peter One of the Leaders of the Early Church.

Some time after this P. was arrested by order of Herod Agrippa I, and imprisoned in Jerusalem with a view to executing him on the following day. But he escaped and left Jerusalem immediately (Ac 12 1-17). Whither he went is not said, and for all further knowledge of P.'s movements we must trust to incidental statements in the N T or to the somewhat unreliable notices in early Christian literature. Since Herod Agrippa died in 44 A.D., the events narrated in Ac chs. 1–12, in case they are arranged in chronological sequence, must have covered a period of about fifteen years. We may say, then, that for that length of time P. was the foremost figure of the early Apostolic Church. It was during this period, three years after his conversion, that Paul visited Jerusalem to talk matters over with P. (Gal 1 18), staying with him fifteen days. This must have been c. 38 A.D. Paul's desire to have this personal interview with P. incidentally reveals the important place held by the latter in the Apostolic Church at that time. His subsequent career was just as important, but its details have not been preserved. About five years later (49 A.D.), P. was present at the Council in Jerusalem and took a leading part in its deliberations (Ac 15 6 ff.; Gal 2 1-10). By this time he had become recognized as the "Apostle of the Circumcision" (Gal 2 7), through whom God was working as effectually as He was through Paul for the "Uncircumcision" (i.e., the Gentile world). These expressions suggest that P.'s activity was—like his own—largely missionary in character to the Jews of the dispersion as his was to the Gentiles. For this reason P was in Jerusalem probably only occasionally after his escape from Herod Agrippa in 44 A.D. We learn further, from Gal 2 11-14, that at Antioch (either soon after the Council of 49, before Paul set out on his second missionary journey [49–52 A.D.], or at the close of that journey, when Paul was at Antioch for a while; cf. Ac 18 23), P. was sharply rebuked by Paul for weakly yielding to emissaries of the strict Judaistic party of Jerusalem and withdrawing from familiar fellowship with the uncircumcised Gentile members of the Church. It is of interest to note that Paul's own words in Gal imply that P., Barnabas, and others had been in the habit of thus freely mingling with Gentile Christians, which is only what we would infer from Ac ch. 10 f. Full fellowship with the Gentile converts was not discussed at the Council of 49, and P.'s withdrawal did not violate the terms of the agreement reached in the Council. It violated the principles there followed, however, and deserved Paul's rebuke (see also GALATIANS).

Of the remainder of P.'s career we are in almost total ignorance. He appears to have continued his missionary labors. In these he was frequently accompanied by his wife (I Co 9 5). Early Christian tradition looked back to him as the first 'bishop' of the Church of Antioch. Whatever truth there may be in this tradition, it is certain that he did not organize that great Church. Other ancient traditions speak of his labors in Asia Minor, especially in the regions near the Black Sea. These may be no more than inferences based on the address of the First Epistle. At what point in this later period are we to place the two Epistles attributed to him? The authenticity of the first is more certain than that of the second. It was written from "Babylon" to the "dispersion" of northern Asia Minor. Both terms have been taken in a figurative sense, and most scholars hold that it was written from Rome to Gentile Christians in Asia Minor. Neither of these positions rests on any very substantial evidence, though it is just possible that the letter was sent from Rome. Mark was with the Apostle at the time (serving as his "interpreter" [ἑρμενευτής, so Papias; see MARK, GOSPEL OF, § 1 (h)] and gathering the material [in part] for his Gospel), also Silvanus, who appears to have penned the Epistle (5 12-13). Since Silvanus was Paul's companion as late as when he wrote II Cor (1 19),

6. Later Career of Peter (After 50 A.D.).

P.'s letter must be dated after 55 A.D. And since Paul's later letters from Rome, Ph, Col, Eph, Phm (59–61 A.D.), betray no evidence of personal contact with P. in Rome, the probability is that P. was in Rome between 56 and 59 and thence sent his message to the churches of Asia Minor—not to the Pauline churches there, but to other communities that were less directly connected with Paul's work. To what place P. went after leaving Rome, whence he sent the second letter, in case it is his, and whether he returned to Rome—all these are points on which we possess no direct information. According to a wide-spread tradition, which has become generally accepted in Christendom, P suffered martyrdom at Rome. It must be admitted, however, that the explicit evidence for this tradition can not be traced much further back than 180 A.D.

7. Uncertainty as to Our Knowledge of P.'s Last Years.

The earliest notice of P., outside of the N T, in early Christian literature (I Clement, V) is indecisive. The statement in the Epistle of Ignatius to the Romans (about 110 A.D.) merely implies the presence at some time of both Apostles in Rome. Later writers who say anything decisive almost without exception represent P. as having not only labored but suffered martyrdom in Rome. The most that can be said is that it is probable, but by no means certain, that P 's later years were spent in the West and, in part, at the capital. The process once started, it was inevitable that many legendary details should be invented to fill out a complete story of P 's career in the city. The exact place of his martyrdom (or burial), many minute details regarding the same, and the exact period of years (25) of his sojourn (as early as c. 170 A.D. he was spoken of as having founded the Church), the representation of him as first bishop of the Roman Church, the attribution to him of an apocryphal Gospel, an Apocalypse, and a "Preaching," the famous story of his controversy, in conjunction with Paul, with the magician Simon Magus before Nero, and the strange distortion of the same story in the pseudo-Clementine literature for the purpose of attacking Catholic Christianity—such was the result of combining floating tradition, uncertain legend, wilful invention, and extravagant imagination. None of these details, not even the widely accepted opinion that the Apostle was martyred under Nero about 64 A.D., can be considered to rest on a sure foundation. Apart from the two N T Epistles bearing his name (their genuineness presupposed), we know nothing of his activity after the events referred to by Paul in Gal 2 11-17.

8. Theological Teaching of Peter.

The position to be assigned P. in the development of N T doctrine is difficult to state. We have no direct sources for his earlier teaching. The discourses in the first chapter of Ac are of course not verbatim reports and, at least to some extent, represent the general views of primitive Christianity as much as those of any one Apostle. The Gospel of Mark, constructed mainly, according to early tradition, from P 's teaching, may indirectly represent P 's maturer views regarding Jesus' person and work. The doctrine of the Epistles of P. is easily ascertained, but here also we are confronted not only with the question of genuineness, especially of the Second Epistle, but also with the problem of the extent to which the doctrine shows the influence of Paulinism and thus represents a stage of P. s thought when he had modified his earlier views under the influence of Paul.

We shall confine ourselves here mainly to the teaching of P. as found in Ac, referring the reader to the articles on the Epistles for a discussion of the teaching found in those documents.

A chief characteristic of P 's teaching is that it appears to have been developed as occasion demanded. From Jesus P. with the other disciples had received much more than they had formulated into definite propositions. He had revealed the Father, the higher standards of life, certain great truths of the Kingdom, and He had also impressed the disciples with the great significance of His person and work, and had more than hinted at the necessity of His death and the certainty of His resurrection. But P. had not organized these facts into a system when Jesus' death and resurrection occurred, followed by His departure, and the disciples were left to organize and carry forward the new faith. The speech of P. at Pentecost shows what he first fixed upon as the salient facts of the new doctrine. Jesus of Nazareth, though crucified, was in truth the Messiah. His life showed that He was "approved" by God. His death was a part of God's plan, evidenced in O T prophecy, and His resurrection, also prophesied and now witnessed to as a fact by those who had seen Him, has been followed by His exaltation to (or by) God's right hand. He is now in heaven and is active among His followers by the Holy Spirit, whom He sends from the Father. The central thought here is the Messiahship of Jesus. This Messiahship was interpreted not altogether according to current Jewish ideas, but in the light of the facts they knew of Jesus as modifying those ideas. Jesus was all that the term 'Messiah' ought to mean. The blessings of the new age, of forgiveness of sin, of the Holy Spirit, were all assured in Him as Messiah and to reject Him was to reject the whole counsel and plan of God. Within this general scheme there were many points as yet undeveloped, such as the real relation between Jesus and the Father, the ultimate reason for His death and its relation to forgiveness, the way in which the salvation in Him was to become universal, etc. P. developed in his thinking along these lines, step by step, not always consistently (cf. Gal 2 11 ff.). His was not an original mind, rather a practical one. He probably received from, as much as he contributed to, the general body of doctrine held by the Apostolic Church. His first Epistle shows to what stage his thinking had advanced when it was written. But even in this he is still the practical Christian believer rather than the theologian. See Weiss, Bib. Theol. of N T, §§ 39–40, 44–51; Stevens, Theol. of the N T, pp. 258–324. E. E. N.

PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF: This Epistle was universally received in the early Church as the work of the Apostle Peter. The suspicion which attached to II P makes this reception more significant. It is found both in the Syriac and Old Latin translations; and, although unaccountably omitted from the imperfect Muratorian Canon, it is fully used and ascribed to Peter by the great writers of the closing decades of the 2d cent., Irenæus, Origen, and Tertullian. In the Ep. of Polycarp (baptized in the year 69 A.D.) there are at least four unmistakable quotations from I P, although the Apostle is not mentioned as its author. And Eusebius (HE, iii, 39; iv, 14) tells us that it was used not only by Polycarp, but also by Papias. Probably II P, whether genuine or pseudonymous, is the earliest witness to its existence and authorship (cf. II P 3 1). The Epistle itself is confirmatory of this external testimony. Not only does the writer (5 1) claim to be "a witness of the sufferings of Christ," but in ch. 2 these sufferings are described in a singularly realistic manner. He seems again to hear the 'reviling,' to see the welts of the scourge, and the visible wood of the cross. A man of Peter's temperament is revealed in his never ceasing to marvel that "when reviled" our Lord "reviled not again," and "when he suffered, threatened not." Neither is it without significance that in this Epistle Christ is designated by a title nowhere else given to Him, "the Chief Shepherd" (5 4). It is used to strengthen the exhortation to the under-shepherds to "shepherd the sheep of God," an expression which inevitably recalls the parting injunction of the Lord to Peter (Jn 21 15-17). Nor is it without plausibility urged that when (5 5) the author bids his readers "gird" themselves with humility, he uses a rare word which literally means 'tie on' or 'knot on,' as a slave's apron is tied, a word which takes the mind back to the scene at the Last Supper when our Lord assumed the badge of a slave and set for all ages the crowning example of humility. To argue that the similarity of the expressions in the Epistle to those in the Petrine discourses reported in Acts is evidence of the presumed authorship is precarious; yet it is not without interest and suggestion that we compare I P 2 7, 1 3, 4, 8, 5 1 with Ac 4 11, 2 32, 3 15; nor is it without significance that both in these discourses and in this Epistle a word is used for the cross (ξύλον) which is never elsewhere so used in the N T save in quotation from the O T.

1. Authorship.

The Epistle is addressed to "the elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia." These names denote the Roman provinces into which Asia Minor, with the exception of the southern littoral (Lycia, Pamphylia and Cilicia), was divided in and after the reign of Tiberius. The reason of the order in which these provinces are named seems to have been divined by Ewald. Dr. Hort (First Ep. of St. Peter, p. 168), improving upon Ewald's suggestion, supposes that Silvanus, the bearer of the letter (cf. 5 12), landed at some port in Pontus, probably at Sinope, and thence proceeded S. and W. through the churches, and finally turned northward through Bithynia and reembarked. The route is partly illustrated, and its risks and hardships suggested, by the experiences in 1897 of the American commissioner sent by The New York Herald to ascertain, if possible, the truth about the Armenian massacres. He landed at Trebizond and thence traveled S. and W. (Cf. Hepworth's Through Armenia.) That there were many Jews in those provinces is well known. In Ac 18 2 we read that Paul's friend Aquila, the tent-maker, was a native of Pontus. His namesake, the translator of the O T, belonged to the same province. Other distinguished Christians came from Cappadocia; while the early diffusion of Christianity in Bithynia is apparent from the conspicuous place it occupies in the correspondence of its governor, Pliny. It might at first sight be supposed that by "sojourners of the Dispersion" Jews are meant. But as there must have been many Gentiles in these churches, it is not likely that Peter could have intended to send a letter which should exclude from its address a large part of the churches. Jülicher thinks that he addresses them as "the Dispersion" "simply because they were isolated, without country, few in number, and scattered among immense majorities of unbelievers." It must also be kept in view that it is characteristic of this Epistle thus to transfer to the Christian Church the titles and descriptions previously confined to the Jews (cf. ch. 2).

2. Recipients.

Both place and date have been much contested. In 5 13 we read, "She that is in Babylon, elect together with you"—who in 1 1 are addressed as "elect"—"saluteth you." But is "Babylon" here used as a pseudonym for Rome? Authorities are divided. In the Revelation of John (an apocalypse) and in the Apocalypse of Baruch it is not questioned that by "Babylon" Rome is meant; nor is it doubted that from the time of the Neronian persecution this usage was common. Accordingly, the Fathers in general adopted this view (cf. Eusebius, HE, ii, 15). On the other hand, it may be urged that a metaphorical name, though natural enough in apocalyptic writings, in which concealment and disguise are characteristic, is not to be expected in a letter and seems fantastic there. Some weight also must be allowed to the fact that among Peter's first audience (Ac 2 9) there were "Parthians, Medes, Elamites, and dwellers in Mesopotamia." No doubt, however, the route of Silvanus, if indicated in the address of the letter, makes it likely that it was sent from Rome. It has been supposed that "she that is in Babylon" refers to the Church (cf. II Jn 1 5, 13); and indeed ἐκκλησία is read in the Sinaitic MS., while the Vulgate renders Salutat vos Ecclesia, quæ est in Babylone co-electa. On the other hand, we know from I Co 9 5 that Peter was married and that his wife accompanied him on his missionary tours. She would therefore be known wherever he was known and might naturally wish to salute old friends. This individual interpretation is also favored by the added words "and Marcus my son."

3. Place and Date.

But it is the date which has been most vehemently contested. Those who deny the Petrine authorship, as McGiffert, von Soden, and Jülicher, place the Epistle in the last decade of the 1st cent. Ramsay, who accepts the Epistle as genuine, dates it about 80 A.D., and it is in his Church in the Roman Empire that the most interesting discussion of the date is found. The decision we arrive at depends largely upon the answer we give to the question, Was the persecution which is referred to in the Epistle domestic or public? In favor of the latter alternative it is urged (1) that there was involved suffering to the death (3 14-16, 4 14-16); (2) that the asking for a reason of their hope was a judicial proceeding (3 15); (3) that the persecution was general throughout the world (5 9); (4) that the Christians were sought out by informers or officers of the state (5 8, 3 15); (5) that they suffer for the Name, pure and simple, not on account of actionable conduct alleged against them (4 14-16). None of these arguments save the last can be said to be cogent; and even the last is by no means conclusive, for the use of such an expression as "to bear reproach for Christ's name" is characteristic of no particular date. The use of the expression "as a Christian" (4 16) is more unusual, but can not but have been common at any date after 44 A.D. And were it state-persecution which was in the writer's mind, how could he have deferred so grave a matter to the discussion of what was of much less consequence? For undoubtedly the first mention of ill usage in the Epistle, 2 18, refers to domestic persecution. Slaves and wives (3 1) were liable to be abused by heathen masters and husbands, and it is in this connection that the exhortation is given to be ready to make answer to him that asks the reason of their hope. Bigg and Chase as well as Zahn agree that the references in the letter are to domestic and not to judicial proceedings, and Chase concludes "that the storm of the Neronian persecution had not as yet swept over the Church at Rome, and that no persecuting policy against the Church had been adopted by the Roman magistrates in Asia Minor. Not a word is found in the Epistle about men shedding their blood or laying down their lives for the gospel. None of the passages contains any reference to or any hint of an organized persecution.". The supposed acquaintance of the author with several of the Pauline Epp. must also be taken into account in the ascertainment of the date of this letter. But it remains doubtful whether the similarities cited as evidence of this acquaintance are not satisfactorily accounted for by the common Christian terminology which necessarily colored the writings of the period. That the Epistle was written between 58–64 A.D. is the conclusion of Dr. Bigg and seems to satisfy the requirements.

4. Object and Contents.

The object of the Epistle is to encourage ill-used persons to persevere in holiness and in hope. He writes to those who naturally resented the unjust treatment to which their loyalty to Christ exposed them. They feel keenly that by believing in God's Word they have separated themselves from their fellow citizens, become a people apart, and shut themselves off from many interests in life. They are no better than strangers, pilgrims passing through, seeing nothing they can call their own, nothing in which they can rest. The author reminds them that their inheritance awaits them and is altogether satisfying (1 4); that it was the lot of their Master to be rejected (2 7) and to be wronged (2 23), but that in His case this wrongful suffering was the prelude to perfect final victory (3 18-22). It is in consequence of this that we find in this Epistle such prominence given to the sufferings of Christ. They are exhibited as (1) exemplary (2 21, 3 18, 4 1). In this view certain characteristics of these sufferings are emphasized. Christ suffered wrongfully (2 22); meekly (2 23). To Peter, so swift to draw the sword and so hot to resent wrongful accusations, this remained as the most marvelous feature of his Master's suffering. He now saw what it was which enabled Jesus thus to suffer. "He committed himself to Him that judgeth righteously" (2 23). By the same means will His followers be enabled to endure (4 19). But (2) Christ's sufferings have a redemptive value. They are 'in our behalf' (2 21, 3 18). They emancipate us from moral bondage (1 18). Their purpose was 'that we might live to God' (2 24). But (3) the ransoming power of the sufferings and their impelling force are found in their expiatory character. This is declared in 1 18 f., 2 24, 3 18. In the first of these passages the blood of Christ is compared to that of a lamb without blemish, and it is called "precious," because it accomplishes perfectly, really, and eternally what the blood of the lamb symbolically effected. Ransoming with the blood of a lamb was a familiar idea to the Israelitic mind; and the truth which underlay it was that sin separates from God, or, in other words, is death; that forgiveness and restoration are possible; and that the condition or medium of return to God is the acknowledgment of sin's evil, i.e., that it deserves death and is death. Transference of guilt, transference of the consciousness of being the person who has done this or that wrong is impossible; transference of punishment is possible, and whether justifiable or not depends on circumstances. The most explicit declaration of the expiatory character of Christ's sufferings is, however, to be found in 2 24, "who his own self bare our sins in his body upon the tree, that we, having died unto sins, might live unto righteousness; by whose stripes ye were healed." Pfleiderer is followed by many in his statement that the words can only be translated as meaning that Christ "carried up our sins in His body on to the tree," and that it is solely our moral deliverance that is in view. The meaning of the contested word ἀνήνεγκεν can best be ascertained from its usage in the O T. There it is used in two senses. (1) It means 'to offer.' It is the common word in Lv and elsewhere to express the offering of a sacrifice, and the same collocation of words as here is constantly found in the LXX. (cf. Lv 4 10, ἀνοίσει ὁ ἱερεὺς ἐπὶ τὸ θυσιαστήριον), and these words are regularly rendered "the priest will offer upon the altar." This phraseology passed into the N T; cf. I P 2 5; Ja 2 21. But this precise meaning does not fit our passage; we can not say that Christ offered our sins in His body on the tree. Yet this meaning is interlaced with (2) the other common meaning in the O T. For the verb in question (ἀναφέρειν) has the sense of 'bearing' the punishment of sin. In Nu 14 33 we read, "Your children shall be wanderers in the wilderness forty years and shall bear [ἀνοίσουσιν] your whoredoms"; that is, they shall bear the punishment of your fornication (cf. He 9 28). And apparently the words of Peter are a reminiscence of those in Is ch. 53, and signify that on the cross Christ bore the punishment of our sins. The third passage in which Peter alludes to the vicarious expiatory character of Christ's sufferings is 3 18, "Christ also suffered for sins once, the righteous for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God." He suffered not for Himself, but because they had deserved it, and He suffered that they might now approach God without consciousness of guilt and without fear.

It is this statement which leads on to the affirmation of what is known as the Descensus ad Inferos.

5. The "Descent into Hades," 3 19 f.

The central thought of vs. 17 and 18, the comparison of the innocent suffering of Christ's people to the innocent suffering of their Lord, is thus expanded: As you suffer in the flesh, so also did Christ. But through this extreme and innocent suffering His Spirit remained untouched and potent. Nay, it was set free for a more immediately effective work and for a wider range of influence. In His emancipated and renewed spirit He entered the world of spirits as the herald of forgiveness and restoration to those who belonged to the generation which the Jews thought especially cursed. (Cf. Pirke Aboth V, 2.) And as after His death He "went" into the prison-house of disembodied spirits, so after His resurrection He 'went' into heaven and is now there triumphant and supreme over powers and authorities and angels.

Thus Christ is at once an illustration that suffering is the path to glory, and has through His suffering reached a position in which He is able to introduce you to glory and to God. The 'harrying [or 'harrowing,' from the old war-cry 'haro'] of hell' is introduced for the sake of showing that principalities and powers are subject to Christ, and that even those who presently blaspheme and persecute, like the overtaken generation of the Flood, may be restored, while the little band of presently believing Christians saved by baptism, i.e., by the answer or agreement of a good conscience, may be likened to the little company in the ark saved by water. The Descensus has stimulated imaginative minds from the earliest times, and allusions to it are found in the Gospel of Peter, the Gospel of Nicodemus, Ignatius, ad Magn.; it formed the staple of some early English poems and has recently been daringly handled by Stephen Phillips in his Christ in Hades.

Literature: The best commentaries are those of F. J. A. Hort (1898, on 1 1 to 2 17); Bigg in Int. Crit. Com. (1901); Monnier, La Première Epître de l'Apôtre Pierre (1900); Masterman, The First Ep. of S. Peter (1900). The Practical Commentary of Archbishop Leighton (1748) is an immortal English classic. On the Descensus there is a large literature, especially Charles, Eschatology (1899); Plumptre's Spirits in Prison (1884); Bruston, La Descente du Christ aux Enfers (1897); Halliwell, Harrowing of Hell, a miracle-play (1840); Stopford Brooke, English Lit. to Norman Conquest (1898); Dods, Forerunners of Dante (1903). M. D.

PETER, SECOND EPISTLE OF: None of the N T writings has found it so difficult to justify its reception into the Canon as this Epistle.

1. Introduction.

Eusebius unhesitatingly and necessarily reckons it among the disputed writings (HE, iii, 25). And in an earlier chapter (iii, 3) he writes: "One Epistle, that called the first, is acknowledged as genuine. And this the ancient elders used freely as an undisputed book. But we have learned that his extant second Epistle does not belong to the Canon; yet, as it has appeared profitable to many, it has been used with the other Scriptures." He then goes on to mention other writings ascribed to Peter and concludes: "Such are the writings which bear the name of Peter, of which I know only one Epistle to be genuine." The same hesitation was manifested at the Reformation. Calvin says: "Certainly, since in all its parts the majesty of the Spirit of Christ emerges, I scruple quite to repudiate it, although I do not recognize in it the style of Peter." Critics so conservative as Lechler, Bleek, and Chase refuse to acknowledge it; while Holtzmann, Harnack, and Jülicher ridicule the idea of its being accepted as genuine. It still, however, finds defenders in Spitta, Kühl, Bigg, and Zahn. Those who most patiently examine the evidence will probably concur in the judgment of W. H. Simcox: "It may at least be said, on the one hand, that no one can pretend (except on a priori theological grounds) to be certain that the Second Epistle is genuine: on the other, that a superficial student is likelier than a thorough student to be certain that it is spurious" (Writers of the N T, p. 64).

The difficulties encountered by its claim to be from the hand of Peter are: 1st. The insufficiency of external attestation. 2d. The known tendency to issue pseudepigrapha under the name of Peter. 3d. Too obvious a desire on the writer's part to identify himself with Peter. 4th. Supposed borrowings from Judc. 5th. Anachronisms which betray a later date. 6th. Difference of style from that of I Peter. (Cf. Warfield, S. Presb. Rev., January, 1882.) These must be examined in order.

The references to II P in early Christian literature have been carefully collected and scrutinized by Warfield and Chase. But they reach very different conclusions. The former, after a detailed exhibition of the passages on which he bases his results, pronounces that "Clement has it in 97 at Rome; Barnabas in 106 at Alexandria; at the same time the Jewish-Christian author of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs was reading it at Pella." But under the searching criticism of Chase (in HDB, s.v.) the appearance of reference or quotation almost entirely vanishes. After passing in review all the supposed testimonies of the 2d cent. he concludes: "If we put aside the passage from the Clementine Recognitions and that from the Acts of Peter as open to the suspicion of not accurately representing the original texts, there does not remain, it is believed, a single passage in which the coincidence with II P can with anything approaching confidence be said to imply literary obligation to that Epistle. The resemblances in thought or phrase are such as are constantly found in quite independent specimens of literature, when they belong to the same general period and deal with the same general subject." The question, therefore, arises, Are we justified in thus "putting aside" these two doubtful references? Salmon (Introd., p. 615) says: "There is a passage in the Clementine Recognitions (V, 12) which I have not seen noticed. We have only the Latin of the Recognitions; but unusquisque illius fit servus cui se ipse subjecerit looks very like the translation of ᾧ τις ἥττηται, τούτῳ και δεδούλωται (II P 2 19). Rufinus is the translator, and in one of his translations from Origen (In Exod., Hom. 12) we have unusquisque a quo vincitur, huic et servus addicitur. The difference of the Latin makes it likely that in both cases Rufinus is translating, not interpolating."

2. Insufficient External Witness.

The allusion in the Acts of Peter to which Chase refers is as follows: Dominus noster volens me majestatem suam videre in monte sancto et vocem ejus audivi talem qualem referre non possum. ("Our Lord desiring me to see His majesty in the sacred mountain and I heard His voice—such a one as I can not report.") These words are found in a 7th-cent. MS. which contains a Latin version of the original Greek of the 2d cent. "And," gues Chase, "we have no right to assume that these phrases are not due to an editor or translator." But may a translation not be supposed to be a translation until it is proved not to be so? The conclusion of Chase seems, then, to be slightly overdone, and Salmon's judgment may seem more in accordance with the evidence: "With regard to 2d-cent. testimony, the maintainers and the opponents of the genuineness of the Epistle make it a drawn battle. There is no case of quotation so certain as to constrain the acknowledgment of an opponent; but there are probable instances of the use of the Epistle in sufficient number to invalidate any argument against the Epistle drawn from the silence of early writers. But on comparing the evidence for the First and Second Epistles we have to own, however we have to account for it, that for a considerable time the latter had a much narrower circulation than the former, and was much slower in obtaining general recognition."

At the close of the 2d cent., there is positive and incontrovertible evidence that the Epistle was in existence and was known as II P. Eusebius (HE, vi, 14) tells us that Clement of Alexandria (190–202 A.D.) knew and used it. His words are: "In the Hypotyposes he has produced abridged explanations of, speaking generally, all canonical Scripture, not omitting even the antilegomena, I mean Jude and the rest of the catholic Epistles, as well as Barnabas and the so-called Apocalypse of Peter." Clement's successor, Origen, quoted by Eusebius (HE, vi, 25 8) says: "Peter has left one acknowledged Epistle, and possibly also a second, for it is disputed." Several quotations from the Second Epistle are found in Origen, but as they all occur in works of which only Rufinus' Latin version is extant, some doubt is cast upon them. There is, at any rate, no doubt that at the close of the 2d cent. the Epistle was not only known and used, but was by many accepted as a genuine work of Peter. During the 3d cent. uncertainty regarding its claim to be canonical still existed. In the Western Church no sign of its existence appears. Neither Tertullian nor Cyprian quotes it; though allusion is made to it by Firmilian, Bishop of Cappadocian Cæsarea, in writing to Cyprian. It is included in the Egyptian versions of the 3d cent., while excluded from the earliest Syriac version. In fact, until the canonicity of II P was practically determined by Jerome's inclusion of it in the Vulgate, dubiety was expressed regarding it. Jerome himself alludes to the prevailing hesitation: Scripsit duas epistolas, quæ Catholicæ nominantur: quarum secunda a plerisque ejus esse negatur, propter stili cum priore dissonantiam. ("He wrote two Epistles, which are termed Catholic, the second of which is denied by most to be his, because of the disagreement of its style with that of the former Epistle") (De Viris Illus.).

3. Tendency to Forged Use of Peter's Name.

A tendency to use Peter's name in pseudepigrapha undoubtedly existed. The Gospel of Peter, the Apocalypse of Peter, the Acts of Peter, the Tours of Peter, and others sufficiently illustrate it. But would it have existed had Peter written nothing? In any case the fact of abundant forgery is at once an evidence that some genuine writings probably exist, and is a warning to use an alert caution in admitting the claims of any professed writings of Peter. And without forestalling what must afterward be said, it may at this point be asked whether it is likely that a forger, anxious to have this Epistle accepted along with the first, would have used a name of Peter—Simon—which does not occur in the first. It must also be considered that although several pseudonymous writings appear in early Christian literature, there is no Christian document of value written by a forger who uses the name of an Apostle.

4. Desire to Pose as Peter.

The desire on the writer's part to identify himself with Peter appears in his claiming to be Peter (1 1); to have been advised regarding his death by our Lord (1 14); to have been present at the Transfiguration (1 16-18); to have written a previous Epistle (3 1) (the claim to be an Apostle, which appears in 3 2 of the TR and AV, finds no countenance in the authoritative MSS.); to be on terms of intimacy with Paul (3 15). No doubt the authors of pseudonymous writings attempted to give color to their assumption of this or that great name. But Peter was a frank, outspoken man, and that he should, in writing to persons who had some knowledge of him, allude in the casual manner of this Epistle to incidents in his own career can not be considered surprising. Basing a charge of forgery on this ground comes perilously near to charging a man with being a forger himself. No one is so good an imitation of any man as the man himself. Are we to hold that a simple, open-hearted man like Peter was never to tell any one that he had witnessed the Transfiguration and was never to make use of what he had there seen as evidence of his Lord's majesty? Chase, indeed, says "the fact that the only allusions to incidents in the Lord's life found in the Epistle are such as would support the character of one writing as St. Peter does become, in view of the silence of the Epistle as to the Passion, the Resurrection, the Ascension, and of the absence from it of allusions to the Lord's teaching as recorded in the Gospels, a serious ground for questioning the Petrine authorship of the Epistle." The force of this objection is lessened, however, by the consideration that it is the writer's purpose to scatter rising doubts by the testimony of an eye-witness, and that in a short letter like this it is precarious to argue from omissions.

The similarity between the 2d ch. of the Epistle and the Epistle of Jude is so great as to compel the supposition that the one is indebted to the other or both to a common document. The similar passages arranged in parallel columns may be seen in Gloag's Cath. Epp., p. 238 f. The whole of Jude from ver. 4 to ver. 18, with the exception of vs. 14 and 15, is represented in the 2d ch. and the first three verses of the 3d ch. of II P. The hypothesis of a common document is generally abandoned. To determine the relative priority of II P or Jude is no easy task. The idea of Kühl that the 2d ch. of the Epistle is a later interpolation is excluded by the fact that the Epistle is proved to be an integer by the linguistic peculiarities which prevail in all chapters. Chase concludes that the "various lines of argument converge, and, as far as demonstration is possible in literary questions, demonstrate the priority of Jude." Jülicher favors the same conclusion; as also do Holtzmann, Harnack, Weiss, and von Soden. The priority of II P is maintained by Spitta, Zahn, Lumby, and Bigg. The arguments in favor of the priority of Jude are: 1st. That if Jude were writing to the same persons as Peter, and in order to remind them of the Apostle's letter—and this is Spitta's idea—then it is strange that he should not have explicitly referred to that letter and that he should not have extended his reminiscences of it to more than one chapter. 2d. While Jude openly speaks of the heretics as of an existing danger, the author of II P tries to maintain the fiction that he is merely prophesying future events, but betrays the unreality of his attitude by constantly slipping back from the future (cf. 2 1 ff.) into the present (2 10, 12 ff.), and even into the past (2 15, 22). 3d. It is said that it would be a miracle of literary skill to produce out of the tortuous and difficult phrases of II P a letter "so forcible, so clearly and neatly expressed" as that of Jude.

In favor of the priority of II P it may be argued: 1st. That a priori the probability is that Jude, who so freely borrowed from the Book of Enoch and The Assumption of Moses, should also use II P. 2d. That what is future in II P is present in Jude; cf. II P 2 1 with Jude ver. 4; and especially II P 3 3 with Jude vs. 17 and 18. 3d. In connection with the last-cited parallel, it is remarkable that Jude does not indicate, as P does, the subject of mockery, the παρουσία. Indeed, the παρουσία, though playing a conspicuous part in II P, is not alluded to at all in Jude. Does this not clearly indicate a later date for Jude, a date at which the characteristically Apostolic expectation was no longer so prominent? 4th. Add to this that while both Epistles reflect an immature and as yet unorganized ecclesiastical condition, the Epistle of Jude indicates a more advanced state. This is developed by Principal Falconer, of Toronto, in an unpublished paper. 5th. There seems sufficient evidence for believing that certain of Jude's expressions were suggested by II P. Thus (a) in 5, "I desire to put you in remembrance, though ye know all things once for all," is a phrase not suggested by what he was going to tell them, but by the words of II P 1 12: "I shall be ready always to put you in remembrance of these things [i.e., the power of God, and His call to them to be partakers of the Divine nature], though ye know them." (b) Again in Jude ver. 4, the expression "written of beforehand unto this condemnation" (προγεγραμμένοι εἰς τοῦτο τὸ κρίμα) is vague, as no "condemnation" (κρίμα) has yet been mentioned, but is explained by II P 2 3, "whose sentence now from of old lingereth not" (οἷς τὸ κρίμα ἔκπαλαι οὐκ ἀργεῖ). (c) It is easy to understand why in ver. 6 Jude should use "bonds" (δεσμοῖς) instead of the "chains" (σειραῖς) or "pits" (σειροῖς) of II P 2 4; not at all easy to imagine the reverse process.

(a) Of alleged anachronisms, the first is found in 3 4, "Where is the promise of his coming? For from the day that the fathers fell asleep," etc. "Here," says Dr. Moffatt, "the early Christian age is far behind the writer and his readers, an era to be looked back upon." However, it is not the Christian age that is in view, but, as the writer himself says, the whole period 'from the beginning of creation'; and "the fathers" are not the Apostles and other primitive Christians, but, as in He 1 1, Ro 9 5, Ac 3 13, the ancestors of the Hebrews. There is no anachronism here. If it be said that the existence of such scoffers does not suit any date before 70 A.D., this constitutes a reasonable objection. But is it valid? This may well be doubted. Between the Resurrection and the Destruction of Jerusalem a whole generation of Christians expecting the Parousia had passed away. Was it in human nature not to doubt and not to scoff? (b) The other is more serious. In 3 16 the expression "as . . also the other Scriptures" (ὡς καὶ τὰς λοιπὰς γραφάς) seems to indicate that the writer reckoned the Epp. of Paul among the γραφαί or sacred writings. But it is well known that the writings of Paul were not definitely admitted to this dignity until the 2d cent. Defenders of the genuineness of the Epistle have shown that it can not be assumed that γραφάς can refer only to the O T, and not to other letters or documents; nor that λοιπάς can imply only that Paul's letters were accounted sacred Scripture. (See Bigg, Int. Crit. Com., pp. 240 and 301–302.) But the probability is that the writer did mean to class Paul's Epistles with Scripture. He knew these Epistles and saw in them evidence of the wisdom given to his "brother" Apostle; he knew they were read and highly esteemed; what should hinder that he should think of them as worthy of as much respect as the Hagiographa?

6. Alleged Anachronisms.

The style of II P is undoubtedly a difficulty. It does not exhibit the same easy mastery of Hellenistic Greek as I P. Instead of the perspicuous and elegant constructions of the first Epistle, this presents us with harsh and awkward collocations of words. The writer's fondness for what is picturesque leads him to employ words which are either rare or are used in an unusual sense; and phrases occur which, if they can not be condemned as wholly without parallel, are yet inelegant. So that, even though we dismiss Dr. Abbott's comparison of the style to baboo English, it remains true that the writer is handling an instrument with which he is not thoroughly familiar.

7. Difference in Style from That of I Peter.

There is a want of simplicity, a use of unusual words where ordinary words would better have expressed his meaning. If Peter was the author, he was not so happy in his interpreter as in the First Epistle. Thus Jerome concludes: Ex quo intelligimus, pro necessitate rerum, diversis eum usum interpretibus. "From which we perceive that, because of necessity, he used different interpreters (amanuenses?)." But here emerges another element in the problem; for, on examination, many unusual words are found to be common to the two Epistles. The favorite mannerism of the First Epistle, in giving both the negative and positive aspect of a thought, is found also in the Second Epistle (see 1 16, 2 4, 5, 3 9, 17). Lumby points out some interesting analogies between the language of this Epistle and that of Peter's speeches as reported in Ac. The analogies between the style of II P and that of Philo and of Josephus are not significant; and the conclusion to be drawn from the linguistic phenomena of the Epistle would seem to indicate that if it is authentic it was written either by a different amanuensis from the first or by Peter himself.

From such evidence it is not easy to draw any certain conclusion. On the whole, it seems impossible dogmatically to affirm that the Epistle is not Petrine. Sanday (Inspiration, p. 384) says: "While it is difficult to resist a total impression which is against the genuineness of the Epistle, every prima facie view is not necessarily the true one; and if the writer of this were to commit himself definitely to the negative conclusion, he would feel that he was leaving behind arguments on the other side which he had not fully answered, and combinations which he could not say were impossible." He quotes also the reply of "perhaps the greatest critic whom our Church has produced" to the question what he thought of the Epistle. "He replied that if he were asked he should say that the balance of argument was against the Epistle—and the moment he had done so that he should begin to think that he might be wrong" (ib. 347). The date is determined by the authorship. If the Epistle is Peter's, then it probably belongs to the year 67 or 68 A.D. If it is pseudonymous, then it may be placed later.

8. Petrine Authorship Possible, but Not Proved. Date.

The object of the author was not to initiate his readers into new truth, but to encourage them to take firmer hold of what they already knew. This purpose he explicitly announces in 1 13 and 3 1, 2. He desires them to "make their calling and election sure"; he incites them to endeavors which may win for them "an abundant entrance" into the Kingdom. Not without truth is "knowledge" (ἐπίγνωσις) said to be the key-note of the Epistle. "The knowledge of him that called you" lay at the foundation of their faith; and this knowledge, if maintained, will save their faith from decay. In view of their present condition, that which they especially need to retain in their knowledge is "the power and coming" of the Lord (cf. 1 16). It was the taunts of the scoffers which made it necessary to emphasize "the power and coming." Scoffers were saying, "Where is your Christ that was to come and do all these things for you?" The "power," says Peter, was manifested in the Transfiguration; the "coming" is certified by Divinely inspired prophecy. The exhortation runs on four main lines: 1st. The author's testimony as an eye-witness of the "majesty" (μεγαλειότης) of Christ (1 16) is to be accepted as the guaranty of the reality of what had been preached to them. 2d. They must also trust in "the word of prophecy" certified by partial fulfilment and proceeding from men under the influence of the Divine Spirit. This predicts the triumph of righteousness, the destruction of sin, and the appearance of a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness. This prophetic word is therefore to be used as a lamp in a murky place. 3d. They must be deaf to ensnaring and insidious suggestions of immoral and godless men, who are denounced in vehement language. The habits and practises which they themselves in their better moments had abandoned as unwholesome they must not return to. 4th. They must give diligence to complete and confirm their Christian character, by adding eagerly and bountifully grace to grace.

LITERATURE: By far the most thorough investigation of all that concerns the genuineness of the Ep. is that undertaken by Chase in HDB. With this should be read Salmon's Introd.[7] (1894); Zahn's Einleitung[3] (Eng. transl. 1908); Bigg in Int. Crit. Com., and Spitta's Der zweite Brief d. Petrus (1885), and his Zur Geschichte und Literatur (1901), II, 399–411. Lumby in the Expositor's Bible (1893) and in the Speaker's Bible (1878) offers much excellent material.

PETHAHIAH, peth″a-hai′ā (פְּתַחְיָה, pᵉthaḥyāh), 'J" opens': 1. The ancestral head of the nineteenth course of priests (I Ch 24 16). 2. A Levite who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 23). 3. A Levite who assisted Ezra (Neh 9 5). 4. A Jew who was the deputy-governor for the district of Jerusalem (Neh 11 24). He was responsible to the governor of the whole province. E. E. N.

PETHOR, pi′thōr (פְּתוֹר, pᵉthōr): The home of Balaam in Mesopotamia near "the River," i.e., the Euphrates (Nu 22 5; Dt 23 4[5]). It is usually identified with Pitru, mentioned by Shalmaneser II (860–825 B.C.), and with Pe-d-rū in a list of Thothmes III (c. 1500 B.C.). It is just S. of Carchemish, on the Sājūr, a few miles from its junction with the Euphrates. Some scholars, taking "the River" to mean the Nile, locate P. in Egypt. C. S. T.

PHARAOH, fē′rō (פַּרְעֹה, parʿōh, Φαραώ, from Egyptian pr'o, 'great house'): An honorific title (analogous to the modern 'Sublime Porte') given the Egyptian king during the Biblical period. It appears sometimes in association with the personal name of the king (II K 23 29; Jer 44 30) and sometimes alone (Ex 1 11, 5 1; I K 11 18-20). In the inscriptions it occurs as far back as the fourth dynasty, but not as an equivalent to the term 'king,' as in the Hebrew Scriptures. This usage dates from the beginning of the New Empire and can have passed into Palestinian modus loquendi only after 1000 B.C. Accordingly, it is absent from the Tell-el-Amarna tablets (1400 B.C.). The Pharaohs were nominally absolute monarchs by virtue of divine origin, but in reality dependent on, and directed by, the hereditary nomarchs ('governors of provinces'). A sign of their sovereignty was the double crown of Upper and Lower Egypt.

The Pharaohs alluded to in the Bible are the following: (1) A contemporary of Abraham (Gn 12 14-20). But the name is here evidently made to conform with the later usage, since it is certain that in Abraham's time the kings of Egypt were not as yet called Pharaohs. Neither is the identification of the individual Pharaoh in this case possible, in view of the great uncertainty as to the exact dates of the time of Abraham. (2) The Pharaoh of Joseph. It is quite probable that this monarch was one of the Hyksos (15th or 16th dynasty), who reigned at On (Heliopolis). But here, too, the name Pharaoh is given by accommodation, and all further identification must be a matter of conjecture, as even the Egyptian names in the Joseph narrative (Potipherah, Asenath, Zaphnath-Panneah) do not occur in the Egyptian records earlier than the 25th dynasty, and the whole record as at present cast is expressed in terms of a later period than the events. (3) The Pharaoh of the oppression was probably Rameses II. Though this identification is not beyond question, the name Raamses (Ex 1 11), as a store city built by the Hebrews, and other considerations (cf. Driver in Hogarth, Auth. and Arch., 52 ff.) render it more probable than the view that this Pharaoh was Amenophis III or IV Rameses II reigned sixty-seven years and was succeeded by (4) the Pharaoh of the Exodus, or Merenptah. (5) Solomon's father-in-law (I K 2 46, 3 1), a Tanite king of the 21st dynasty. (6) Shishak, the founder of the 22d dynasty, and invader of Judah under Rehoboam (I K 14 25), is nowhere in the O T called Pharaoh, probably because he was definitely known as a contemporary personality and singled out from among the Pharaohs in general. See also EGYPT, § 10. (7) Pharaoh Necho II of the 26th dynasty (II K 23 29; cf. EGYPT, § 13). (8) Hophra (Jer 44 30), contemporary of the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadrezzar. Besides these, there are also allusions to (9) the unnamed brother-in-law of Tahpenes (I K 11 14-22); (10) a contemporary of Sennacherib and Hezekiah (II K 18 21); and (11) father of Bithiah, who married Mered (I Ch 4 18). PHARISEES, far'i-sîz: The word "Pharisee" is derived from the Heb. root prsh. There is, however, some difference of opinion as to

1. Name. the form of the verb from which it is derived, and the meaning of 'separatist' and 'separated' both have their champions. In the time of Jesus the Pharisees constituted a society known as 'neighbors,' which numbered about 6,000.

As in the case of the Sadducees and the Essenes, they are described by Josephus as the Jewish equivalent of one of the leading schools of

2. General Tenets. Greek philosophy. According to him, they occupied a middle ground between the necessitarian position of the Essenes and the belief in absolute free will of the Sadducees (Ant. XVIII, 1 3; BJ, II, 8 14). They believed that the souls of the righteous after death entered into new bodies, but that those of the wicked were left in Sheol suffering punishment (cf. Ac 23 6). They believed also in the existence of angels and spirits, both evil and good (cf. Ac 23 7-9). Their most pronounced opinions, however, have to do with the so-called 'oral law'—a mass of halākhōth, or authoritative interpretations of the Torah, out of which finally developed the Talmud (Mk 7 5-8; cf. also Mt ch. 23). On entering their societies they bound themselves to observe the regulations governing the Sabbath, tithing, and ceremonial purity. Indeed, their endeavor to distinguish between that which was 'clean' and that which was 'unclean,' and to keep themselves 'separate,' gave them their name. They were held in high esteem by the common people, who honored them for their knowledge of the Law. The synagogue was the peculiar institution of the Pharisees as the Temple was for the Sadducees. At the same time, the Pharisees insisted on the support of the Temple and seem to have introduced certain rites which the Sadducees finally adopted, such as the libation of water brought from the Pool of Siloam. Along with legalistic development there was in Pharisaism a strikingly idealistic Messianic hope. The Pharisees, through both their religious and political sympathies, were the one party to develop this hope, although in its transcendental rather than in its political aspects. To them rather than to the Essenes is to be attributed the apocalyptic literature (q.v.), with its passionate longing for the establishment of the Messianic kingdom and the punishment of the enemies of Israel.

The Pharisees, as they existed in N T times, were the outcome of that remarkable historical development which began with the Maccabees.

3. Origin. The persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes served to draw sharp lines of distinction between those Jews who had yielded to the Hellenistic drift, represented by the high priest and the wealthy class of Jerusalem, and those who were loyal to the conception of Judaism which had been inaugurated by Ezra. The latter were a party

—if it is proper to call them by that name—known as the Chasidim, or 'Pious'; also Hasidæans or Assidæans. We do not know much in detail concerning these people, but in general they seem to have been under the influence of the Scribes and to have occupied no prominent political or social position. In fact, the revolt under the Maccabees was in many respects like the revolt of the peasants during the German Reformation, except that the 'Pious' did not at the start seek social reorganization. The 'Pious' were subjected to persecution by the Syrians because of their devotion to the Law of Moses and their refusal to compromise in any way with the royal demand for conformity with the Greek religion. It would seem that the 'Pious' gradually broke into two groups during the period of the struggle for national independence prior to John Hyrcanus (135–105 B.C.). On one side were those who stood merely for the performance of Judaism as a cult; on the other side, those who, while equally loyal to their religion, were swept into the field of politics. The first group developed into the Essenes, the second into the Pharisees.

4. Development Under the Maccabees.

It is not easy to trace the process of development of this latter party, although there are certain outstanding facts which may serve to mark its progress. Jonathan (161–142) and Simon (142–135) counted upon the assistance of these political religionists and gave them prominence in the body known as the Gerousia (or Sanhedrin). During the latter part of Simon's reign there seems to have developed a certain degree of hostility toward the Maccabæan policy of making international treaties and a tendency to apply the principles of separation to politics as well as to personal religion. About the same time also there appeared the first of those great teachers who laid the foundations for later rabbinism. This process of differentiation within the religio-political group became very distinct in the time of John Hyrcanus, who carried the international and general political policy of the Maccabæan house into an attempt to build up a state of the ordinary Syrian type. It was apparently under John Hyrcanus that the party was first called 'Pharisees,' doubtless because their idea of separateness had been developed into something like a general policy governing all aspects of life. During the reign of John Hyrcanus a sharp break came between the Maccabæan house and the Pharisees, and the latter became the party of opposition rather than the party of government. The reason for this transformation of allegiance, according to Josephus, was the suspicion thrown by a prominent Pharisee upon the right of John Hyrcanus to hold the priesthood because his mother had been a captive. The real grounds were doubtless the general opposition between the policies of the Pharisees and the Maccabees, to which reference has been made. The son of John Hyrcanus, Alexander Jannæus (104–78), pursued an extreme monarchical policy. If Josephus with his Pharisaic sympathies is to be trusted, Alexander was essentially a military ruler, bent on conquering the surrounding territory, and, following the precedent set by his brother Aristobulus (105–104), called himself king. This step served to strengthen the Pharisees' opposition, and for a number of years Judæa was rent by civil war between the people and their sovereign. The outcome of this was to solidify the opposition of the Pharisaic party to the establishment of a monarchy in Judæa, yet, paradoxically, to develop its policy to such an extent that when at the death of Alexander his widow Alexandra took his place and ruled the country ten years, hers was in reality a Pharisaic administration, under the leadership of her brother Simon ben Shetach.

5. Development Under the Romans.

With the death of Alexandra Judæa was again swept by civil war, Hyrcanus I being supported by the Pharisees, and his brother Aristobulus by the Sadducees. As a result of this internecine conflict the state came under the control of the Romans (63 B.C.), and the Pharisees were left to become an influential party, primarily religious, but possessed of great political influence. During the reign of Herod I the Pharisees were in constant opposition to the monarch, but he was sagacious enough to recognize their power in the state and not to attempt any persecution, although he punished severely any attempts at revolt. While the political influence of the Pharisees increased among the people, the party especially developed along religious and academic lines, devoting itself to building up the oral law, which was to explain and protect the Law of Moses.

6. Pharisaic Tenets.

During the half century preceding the destruction of Jerusalem (70 A.D.) the Pharisees grew increasingly influential, both among the learned and among the unlearned. Under them the Mosaic legislation was so developed as to become at once a mass of detailed statutes governing every aspect of life, and a standard of virtue which the common people could never expect to attain. It would be a mistake, however, to think of the Pharisees as always hypocritical, or as lacking genuine religious sentiment. They recognized God not only as a lawgiver, but also as loving Israel, and along with their halākhōth they developed a theory of the "evil impulse" (yetser ha-ra') and a code of morality, known as the 'Two Ways,' which appears later in the Didache. Personally, the Pharisees were inclined to be ascetic, and in the time of Jesus had begun to develop a system of fasting twice a week (cf. Lk 18 10 ff.; Mt 9 14). The criticism passed by Jesus upon them was not so much against their general moral precepts as against their general attitude toward God and religion (cf. Mt 23 1-3). With Him, God was the Father, to be obeyed through love; according to the Pharisees, God was primarily the Lawgiver, to be obeyed through fear (cf. Gal 2 3-5, 5 1, 6 13; Ro 8 14; II Jn 1 7). It should be noticed also that the Rabbis themselves divided the Pharisees into seven classes, considering five of them 'fools,' or 'hypocrites.' The highest type were called "God-loving." The Pharisees' attitude toward the revolution of 66 A.D. was one of hesitation. They finally undertook the management of the revolt, apparently with the hope of keeping it within moderate bounds. In this they were disappointed, as they were overpowered by the Zealots and other radicals. With the destruction of Jerusalem they were forced to make their home in other cities, particularly Tiberias, where their teachings were reduced by their successors into the Mishna, and the movement which they represented finally passed over into rabbinism.

PHILADELPHIA, fil''a-del'fi-a (Φιλαδελφία): A city in Lydia, at the northern foot of Mt. Tmolus, on a natural terrace overlooking the valley of Cogamus, a tributary of the Hermus. It was founded by Attalus II (see PERGAMUM). The valleys of the Mæander and Hermus form a loop round Tmolus, with a low watershed at the sources of the Cogamus. P. lies in this loop, and hence guarded the "door" or 'gateway' of the great trade-route between Sardes-Pergamum and the East, the entrance to which was "a door opened" to her as a missionary (Rev 3 8). Xerxes and Cyrus the Younger naturally passed by P., near which lay Callatebus (Herod. VII, 31), where Xerxes found the beautiful plane-tree. Plane-trees and tamarisks still flourish in the neighborhood. P. never attained the importance postulated by its strategical position. It is aptly characterized by the words "little power" of Rev 3 8. The surrounding country is very fertile, because of its volcanic character. The city is now called Ala-shehir, 'Red City,' because of the color of its soil. But its situation on the edge of a volcanic region has ever proved its bane and prevented its growth. Its people have preferred to live in safer quarters in the open country, because earthquakes ("the hour of trial," Rev 3 10) were so constant ("he shall go out thence no more," Rev 3 12) that Strabo wondered that any one should live in P. It was called "Little Athens," because paganism was especially vital there, and displayed its piety by numerous temples (cf. "I will make him a pillar in the temple of my God," Rev 3 12) and frequent religious festivals. P. changed its name twice; once to Neocæsarea (c. 17 A.D.) in honor of Germanicus, who had dispensed Tiberius' gift to the city when it was destroyed by an earthquake; another time (70–79 A.D.) to Flavia in honor of Vespasian (cf. Rev 3 12, "I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, and mine own new name"). P. was also a stronghold of a stubborn form of Judaism called the "synagogue of Satan" (Rev 3 9), because they hated the Christian Jews. It was Christianized at an early period, perhaps evangelized by Paul or his companions. It had its early martyrs (cf. "thou didst not deny my name," Rev 3 8), and eleven martyrs of P. suffered later with Polycarp (155–156 A.D.). P. suffered many sieges at the hands of the Byzantines, Crusaders, Barbarians, and was always sustained by the promises in the Apocalypse. It was captured in 1390 by the Turks after a siege of eight years; "patient" to the end, it was the last city in Asia Minor to fall into Turkish hands, and has also 'patiently' persisted in Christianity to this day. J. R. S. S.

PHILEMON, fi-lî'mǫn (Φιλήμων): A prominent Christian of Colossæ, to whom the Apostle Paul wrote a brief Epistle. Nothing authentic is known of him, except what is to be gathered from the Epistle, which is that he was a citizen of Colossæ (ver. 1; cf. also Col 4 9); that he was wealthy, for he had slaves; that he had been converted to Christianity through the efforts of the Apostle himself (ver. 19); and that he was an active Christian, possibly an officer, in the Church ("fellow worker," ver. 1). It is also clear that he was the head of a household, two of whose members are mentioned by name (Apphia and Archippus, probably his wife and son respectively). To these items tradition has added that he was a bishop of Colossæ (Apost. Const. vii, 46), and that he suffered martyrdom by stoning during the reign of Nero, together with Apphia, Archippus, and Onesimus. A. C. Z.

PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO: The briefest of Paul's Epistles and the only one apparently addressed exclusively to private individuals. Philemon is associated in the introductory salutation (vs. 1-3) with Apphia and Archippus, and "the church" in his house, a fact which deprives the letter of its merely individual character. Following the salutation, the Apostle gives expression to his thankfulness for the Christian faith and love of Philemon (vs. 4-7). This prepares the way for the main subject of the writing, which is (vs. 8-21) a request, couched in the most delicate and yet manly terms, that Philemon take back a runaway slave, Onesimus, whom Paul calls his "son" [in the spirit], doubtless because somehow during the course of his imprisonment he had come in contact with him and brought him to the knowledge of Jesus Christ. Resorting to a play on the meaning of the name "Onesimus" ('profitable'), the Apostle suggests, no doubt with reference to the unnamed wrong done by Onesimus (ver. 18), that the latter had indeed been unprofitable in the past, but would now be profitable both to his master and to the Apostle himself. He pleads with Philemon on the ground of the common faith of himself and Onesimus, which had reduced the relations of master and slave to one of brotherhood. He promises to make good whatever loss the slave had caused his master, either before or in the act of his escape.

Having made this request in as urgent and tender a manner as possible, he closes the letter with the usual salutation and benediction, adding an expression of his hope that he would speedily be free to visit Colossæ and asking Philemon to prepare a lodging for him (vs. 22-25).

The time of the writing of the Epistle was the imprisonment of the Apostle at Rome (61–63 A.D.); for it was only in such a populous center that a fugitive slave could have expected to find the conditions favorable for making his escape effective. Moreover, the letter was undoubtedly taken to Philemon at the same time as that to the Colossians by Tychicus, with whom Paul associated Onesimus as a cobearer of the two Epistles (Col 4 7 f.). This fact also indicates more precisely that the letter was written in the earlier part of the Roman imprisonment. Its genuineness was called into question by the Tübingen critics, mainly on the ground of its close relation with Col. The motive for the composition of such a letter was alleged to be the presentation through an illustrative example of the bearings of the Christian religion on contemporary social life, and the characters were said to be allegorical. A more strictly historical method of study has put this theory aside as unfounded. More recently the writing has been treated by van Manen in his characteristic way along with the other Pauline Epistles (Handl. d. Oudchrist. lett. 1900, p. 59).

PHILETUS, fi-lî'tus (Φιλητός): A certain errorist who held that the Resurrection was already past, mentioned in II Ti 2 17 in connection with Hymenæus (q.v.). J. M. T.

PHILIP (Φίλιππος), 'lover of horses': 1. Philip the Apostle, who is mentioned in all the lists of the Apostles (Mt 10 3; Mk 3 18; Lk 6 14; Ac 1 13). Nothing further is said of him in the Synoptics, but he is frequently referred to in Jn (1 43 ff., 6 5 f., 12 21 f., 14 8 f.). At the close of the 2d cent. he is clearly identified with Philip the Evangelist (see 2, below), and traces of this confusion are found even in the N T, so that independent data concerning the career of this Apostle are lacking.

Philip the Apostle is explicitly identified with Philip the Evangelist by Polycrates, Bishop of Antioch (about 190), quoted by Eus. HE, III, 31 3; V. 24. The same view is implied also by Clement of Alexandria (about 180), who in Strom. III, 30 says that Philip the Apostle gave his daughters in marriage (cf. Eus. HE, III, 31 3). Papias (about 140) quotes an incident on the authority of the daughters of Philip (HE, III, 39 4) without specifying whether the Apostle or Evangelist is meant; but inasmuch as the information collected by Papias in his book concerned the Apostles (HE, III, 39 4), and since the only daughters of Philip whom we know are those mentioned in Ac 21 9, it would seem as if the same identification were made by Papias also. Apparently, independent statements are made about Philip in the Johannine tradition, but careful examination and comparison with Ac inclines the present writer to the opinion that the two are confused even here (e.g., compare the suggestion in Jn 6 5. 7 that Philip buy bread with the appointment of Philip to care for the widows, in Ac 6 5; but especially Philip's introduction of Greeks to Jesus in Jn 12 22 with Philip's missionary activities in Ac 8 5. 26 f. Cf. Bousset, Theol. Rundschau, July, 1905, p. 293 f.).

2. Philip the Evangelist is first mentioned in Ac 6 5 as one of those appointed to oversee the distribution of alms to widows. All the persons mentioned in this list have Greek names, which would seem to indicate Philip's Hellenistic origin. This would make all the more natural his activity among the Samaritans after the persecution occasioned by the work of Stephen (Ac 8 4 f.). It accounts also for his later residence in Cæsarea, which there is no reason to question (Ac 21 8). Like some of the other Apostles, Philip was married, and according to Ac 21 9, had four daughters, virgin prophetesses. Our later information concerning him and them is derived largely from the Montanists. Proclus, quoted by Caius (about 210), says (Eus. HE, III, 31 4) that "after him [some unknown prophet] there were four prophetesses, the daughters of Philip at Hierapolis in Asia. Their tomb is there and that of their father." Polycrates (Eus. HE, III, 31 3; V, 24) mentioned only three daughters of Philip, two buried at Hierapolis, and one in Ephesus. The fourth may have died before Philip's removal from Cæsarea. The later tradition, according to which this Philip was bishop of Tralles (Menol. Basil, in Migne, vol. cxvii, col. 104, 168), is plainly an attempt to distinguish again between this Philip and the Apostle. 3. Philip the Tetrarch. One of the sons of Herod the Great by Cleopatra of Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. XVII, 1 3) and a stepbrother of Herod Antipas (q.v.). By his father's will he was assigned the territory of Gaulanitis, Trachonitis, Batanæa and Panias (Jos. Ant. XVII, 8 1; cf. Lk 3 1), with the title of tetrarch. The appointment was confirmed by Augustus (Ant. XVII, 11 4, Gaulanitis omitted and Auranitis added). Of Philip's visit to Rome at this time Lk 19 12 ff. may be a reminiscence. He married Salome, the daughter of Herodias, the wife first of his half-brother Herod and then of another half-brother (Herod Antipas), so that Herodias was really the stepmother of Philip, not his wife, as represented in Mk 6 17; Mt 14 3 [but the Philip here referred to may be the same as Herod, the first husband of Herodias, who may also have been surnamed Philip; cf. Swete, Com. on Mk, in loc.—EDS.]. His reign covered a period of nearly forty years (4 B.C. to 34 A.D.), after which his territory became a part of the province of Syria (Jos. Ant. XVIII, 4 6). Like his father, he was a great builder. He was a just man, on the whole the best of the Herods. See CÆSAREA PHILIPPI and HEROD, § 6.

PHILIPPI, fi-lip'ai (Φίλιπποι): A city and fortress in Macedonia, near the Thracian frontier, situated on a steep hill overlooking the valley of the Angites (Gangites, Ganges) river, bordered on the N. by forests, on the S. by a marsh, beyond which is the sea. Its seaport was Neapolis. Its original name is said to have been Datus, then Crenides, so called from numerous springs (κρήνη) about the hill. It was the location of an Athenian colony after 360 B.C. Crenides was captured by Philip of Macedon in 358 and renamed Philippi after himself. Its chief importance for him consisted in the gold-mines, called Asyla, in the neighboring hill of Dionysus, and P. was not far from the famous auriferous Mt. Pangæus. The only time P. emerged from obscurity was in 42 B.C., when it was the scene of the great battle between Octavius and Antony on the one side, and Brutus and Cassius on the other—each with nineteen legions. It was on the heights of P. that Cassius committed suicide after the battle, which cost him 8,000 men, while Octavius and Antony lost 16,000. Later, Augustus made P. a Roman colony with the name Colonia Julia Philippensis, which probably after the battle of Actium was changed to Colonia Augusta Julia Philippensis, when its citizens received the ius italicum (= immunitas et libertas). As a Roman colony, P. began to outstrip Amphipolis and to lay claim to the dignity and title of "first" city (Ac 16 12) when visited by Paul in 53 A.D.; Luke was probably a citizen of Philippi, and was the "man of Macedonia" who appeared to Paul in a vision (Ac 16 9-10; but see LUKE). P. was the scene of a great event in Paul's life (Ac 16 11 ff.) and the home of the first Christian church on European soil, to which ten years later (63 A.D.) Paul addressed an Epistle (see PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO). The rôle of P. in late history is insignificant.

PHILIPPIANS, fi-lip'i-anz, EPISTLE TO THE: One of Paul's Epistles, addressed "to the saints that are at Philippi with the bishops and

1. Contents. deacons." After the salutation (1 1, 2), in which Paul joins Timothy's name with his own, he proceeds, according to his custom in his letters, to an expression of thanksgiving. In this case, it is based upon his personal relations with those addressed, their fellowship in the furtherance of the gospel, and their general steadfastness in the spiritual life. The thanksgiving imperceptibly passes into a devout prayer for their spiritual progress and comfort (1 3-11). The Apostle then gives them an account of his own circumstances, including the progress of the gospel in Rome, and the results of his own efforts and those of some who preached not sincerely, but "of envy and strife" (1 12-26). This is followed by an exhortation to unity and lowliness of mind (self-forgetfulness in the service of others), taking Jesus Christ as their model (1 27–2 11) and, to stimulate them still further in this course, he appeals to them on the ground of his personal relation to them and the joy that he and they should have in one another (2 12-18). He then tells them of his intentions, the proposed visit of Timothy, and of the illness and recovery and mission of Epaphroditus (2 19-30). At this point there appears to be a rather abrupt turn from personal to more general affairs. The Apostle begins with the exhortation to "rejoice." As he has prefixed the word "finally" to the expression, it would be natural to suppose that he was about to close the letter; but either because, after an interruption involving an interval of time, he has seen the need for writing to them upon a new subject, or because, while even writing he has realized such a need, the Apostle breaks into a warning against the danger from the influence of Judaizing teaching among them. He illustrates by the contrast of the Jewish Law and the experience of grace in his own past life what he wishes them to take into account (3 1-16); but this easily leads to another implicit warning against the very opposite danger from the side of disregard of moral law as exemplified in the lives of some who observe no law but that of their fleshly natures (3 17–4 1). At this point the Apostle returns to his exhortation, asking two of the members of the Philippian Church (Euodia and Syntyche) to put their dissensions aside (4 2, 3). He exhorts all to joyfulness, to a sturdy resistance of the spirit of anxiety, and to the pursuit of all things good and noble (4 4-9). The last paragraph of the Epistle is reserved for an acknowledgment of the pecuniary contribution brought the Apostle through Epaphroditus, concluding with an expression of his assurance that the spirit of kindness which prompted his readers to this deed would have its adequate reward (4 10-20). The Epistle then ends with the usual salutations from "all the saints, especially them that are of Cæsar's household" (4 21) and the benediction (4 22).

That the Epistle was written during the period of Paul's imprisonment (59–63) is unquestionable, but

2. Date. which portion of the imprisonment? That at Cæsarea or that at Rome? Paulus (1799) attempted to prove that the Epistle was written at Cæsarea. But internal evidence points to a place where there were Christian representatives of the household of Cæsar (4 22), and it is not probable that these lived in such numbers in Cæsarea as to include among them converts to Christianity It was also a place where many were active in the propagation of the gospel, though some were moved by love and others preached out of "faction, not sincerely" (1 14-18). The mention of the "pretorian guard" (1 13), too, together with the more general indications of environment, harmonizes better with the Roman imprisonment of the Apostle. Accordingly, a general consensus of more recent scholarship fixes on Rome as the place where it was written. But if Paul wrote it at Rome, did he do so during the earlier or the later portion of his imprisonment there? The differences in subject-matter and tone between it and the other 'Epistles of the imprisonment' (Eph, Col, and Phm) are such as to warrant the assumption of an interval between them. Ph, then, must either have preceded the group of three or followed it. From the affinities of thought and spirit between it and Ro on one side, and the other Epistles of the imprisonment on the other side, shading off as they do into the Pastorals, Lightfoot (Philip. pp. 30 ff.) argued for the earlier date. Ph would thus be a connecting-link between the four great doctrinal Epistles and the later writings of Paul. On the other side, in behalf of the lateness of Ph, it has been said that the Roman imprisonment is assumed in it to be a matter of some standing (1 7, 13 f., 17); that the Apostle is looking forward to his speedy liberation (1 25, 2 23 f.); that it presupposes at least four journeys between Philippi and Rome as having taken place since Paul's arrival at Rome; and finally, that at the time of the writing Paul's companions had left the city, since he does not mention them by name in his salutations, but, on the contrary, explicitly says that he was left alone (2 19, 20). Accordingly, the great majority of later investigators (Weiss, Godet, Holtzmann, Jülicher, Vincent, Zahn) have dated the Epistle from the last days of the imprisonment (63 A.D.).

3. Occasion, Object, Characteristics.

The special occasion of the Epistle was the arrival of Epaphroditus with a gift of money from the Philippian Christians (2 25, 4 18), and its object is to express Paul's gratification and gratitude for this kindness. Whatever else may be included in the writing, such as the exhortation to harmony and self-forgetful service of one another, the warnings against Judaistic teachings and licentious lives must be regarded as incidentally introduced on account of the Apostle's solicitude for the spiritual welfare of a community dear to him because he had founded it, rather than as causes sufficient in themselves to lead him to write. Hence the characteristic of the writing is predominantly that of joy ("epistola de gaudio," Bengel). The doctrinal element in it is comparatively small; but so much of it as the Apostle has felt called upon to allude to (2 5-9) has served as the basis of a most stimulating discussion on the method of the incarnation.

4. Genuineness and Unity.

That Paul wrote the Epistle was first questioned by Evanson (Dissonance, etc., 1792, p. 263), but the real discussion of the subject was not begun until Baur classified it with some of Paul's other writings in the group of "conciliatory tendency" documents, produced toward the end of the Judaistic controversy. But though those who adopted Baur's fundamental principles (Schwegler, Holsten, etc.) for a time persisted in the denial of the Pauline authorship of the Epistle, under the repeated searching investigations given the subject from a less biased point of view (Hilgenfeld, Pfleiderer, Jülicher) its genuineness has been brought more and more clearly into view. In more recent years, an argument in favor of its pseudonomy has been attempted by van Manen (EB, s.v.; also Handl. d. Oudchrist. lett., 1900), but without any apparent impression on the majority of scholars.

But, assuming its genuineness, the further question of the unity of the writing has been raised. On the strength of an allusion by Polycarp to "epistles" by Paul to the Philippians, Le Moyne (Varia Sacra) propounded the view that the writing as extant consists of two Epistles fused into one in the process of transmission. This view has been made the basis of efforts to separate what precedes 3 1 and what follows, and to construct each into a distinct Epistle. But the language of Polycarp implies nothing more than that Paul had communicated with the Philippians by letter, the plural being, as is often the case, a more vivid form of the singular; and all efforts at the partition of the Epistle have been unsuccessful. This is also true of more recent attempts to disprove its integrity (Spitta, Zur Geschichte u. Lit. d. Urchristenthums, 1893; C. Clemen, Die Einheit d. paulin Briefe, 1894).

PHILISTIA, fi-lis'ti-a or -list'ya, PHILISTIM, fi-lis'tim, PHILISTINES, fi-lis'tinz (פְּלֶשֶׁת, p·lesheth, פְּלִשְׁתִּי, p·lishtī): A strip of fertile land including many towns between the Mediterranean and the Shephelah, beginning S. of Joppa and stretching indefinitely to the borders of Egypt. The name is the basis of the term 'Palestine,' which was later applied to the whole land. It was already given by the Assyrians as early as 800 B.C. (Palastu, Pilistu, Schrader) broadly to southern Palestine. By the Egyptians, however, only the Philistines are expressly named (Pulasata, in the monuments of the reign of Rameses III). The O T usage of the name Philistine is peculiar. In the singular it is given to individuals only (Goliath, I S 17 8, 18 6, etc.) and only in the plural to the people as a whole, differing in this from other gentilic adjectives (e.g., Hittite, Hivite, Canaanite, etc.), which are used collectively. This usage points to a sense of difference between the Philistines and other non-Israelites, and is supported by the translation of the term in the LXX. into ἀλλόφυλοι (but sometimes Φυλιστιείμ), and also by the fact that the Philistines are preeminently "the uncircumcised."

1. Name.

The foregoing considerations give good grounds for deriving the name from a Semitic root, pālash, 'to migrate' (Philistine = 'emigrant'). That those who bore the name were, like the Israelites, recent arrivals in the land is distinctly asserted by Amos (9 7; cf. Dt 2 23), and the place from which they had come is given as Caphtor. Moreover, from the fact that the Philistines are also called Cherethites (Zeph 2 5; Ezk 25 16; cf. also I S 30 14), it has been inferred that Caphtor is the island of Crete; but as Crete is known to have been populated in the earliest days by Greeks and Egyptians as well as Semites, the question still remains open whether the Philistines were originally of Semitic or non-Semitic stock. Practically, however, this question loses its importance, since even if originally Semites, on account of a long sojourn beyond the Mediterranean among non-Semites, they had become assimilated to these. At least, to the intense Hebrew they were more clearly "aliens" than any other people in the land as a whole.

2. Origin and Affiliations.

The organization of the Philistines was effected around the five principal cities of Philistia (Ashdod, Ashkelon, Ekron, Gaza, and Gath). Whatever primitive tribal distinctions may have existed among them (Caphtorim, Cherethim, Philistim) were completely displaced by this redistribution of the population according to which each principal city became the center of a circuit and gave its name to its inhabitants (Ashdodite, Gittite, etc.). These five circuits were ruled over by five lords (ṣ·rānīm, always used in pl., Jg 3 3; Jos 13 3; I S 5 8, 6 18, etc.), and appear to have been independent of one another, though they commonly acted in concert, betraying the existence of a more centralized rule not specifically named. Whether the office of "lord" was hereditary or elective, and whether it involved military as well as civil functions, and, further, what was its exact relation to that of king (e.g., Achish of Gath,

3. Organized Life. Religion.

I S 21 11, etc.; Mittinti of Askelon, and Hanun of Gath, Keilins. Bibl. II, 20), does not appear clearly. Special commanders are, however, named "princes," sārīm, more correctly 'chieftains' (I S 18 30, 29 2), who evidently had charge of the armies (I S 23 3, 28 1). Their religion, which was probably either altogether or partly borrowed from the Canaanites (the Avvim) whom they conquered, shows Semitic characteristics such as the worship of divinities in pairs (Dagon and a fish-goddess, Marna and Derketo, apud Diod. II, 4) and Semitic divine names (the foregoing as well as Baalzebub). They had soothsayers (Is 2 6) and priests and diviners (I S 6 2) as well as temples (Jg 16 26).

4. History of the Philistines.

The Philistines make their appearance in history at nearly the same time with the Israelitic invasion of Canaan. By some they are supposed to have come by way of Egypt (G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 175). The cities of Gaza, Ekron, and Ashkelon are included without mention of the Philistines (Jg 1 18) among the conquests of Judah. The assignment of this territory at the time of the settlement under Joshua is, however, to be regarded as an ideal to be realized in later days (Jos 13 3 ff., 15 45). Their prominence dates from the latter portion of the period of Judges. As they developed military strength they extended their rule over the coastland as far as Mt. Carmel and Esdraelon, and came into direct contact with Israel. In the first stage of the conflict which ensued their higher development as a military people gave them the decided advantage (Jg 10 7 ff.). In spite of temporary checks to their encroachments (Jg 3 31), they succeeded in bringing the Israelitic tribes under their yoke. The conquest was completed during the last years of Eli, when they captured and carried into their own territory the emblem of Israel's nascent national life, the Ark of the Covenant (I S chs. 4 ff.). The weakness of Israel, however, was only the result of inexperience and lack of organization, and when, under Saul, unity of action and strong leadership were attained, the Philistine yoke was shaken off, and under David the oppressors were even put under Israelitic suzerainty (II S 8 1, 21 15 ff.). For the rest of the period of their independent existence, Philistines and Israelites seem to have lived at peace with each other, except when Hezekiah led a successful campaign against Gaza (II K 18 8). The Assyrians in their invasions of Palestine found much in the Philistine cities to seize; and their monuments contain many accounts of attacks on them. In the Maccabæan age the Jews appear to be in possession of Philistia. The name Palestine was still, in the days of Josephus (Ant. I, 6 2), used mainly of Philistia, though the application of it to the whole land of Israel had already come into use (Jos. Cont. Ap. I, 22). (Cf. W. Max Müller, Asien und Europa, p. 387.)

PHILOLOGUS, fi-lol'o-gus (Φιλόλογος): A Christian in Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation (Ro 16 15).

E. E. N.

PHILOSOPHER (φιλόσοφος), PHILOSOPHY, φιλοσοφία, from φίλος, 'lover,' and σοφία, 'wisdom'): According to an ancient tradition (Cicero, Tusc. V, 3), the term was invented by Pythagoras; but there is no sufficient ground for accepting this as a fact. The earliest use of the word is in its strict etymological sense by Herodotus (1 3) in a passage where he represents Solon as traveling in search of wisdom ("philosophizing"). Plato understands by philosophy, first, the Socratic love of the truth as distinguished from and opposed to the Sophistic assertion of it (Phædr. 278, "Wisdom belongs only to God, man can be only a lover of wisdom" = 'philosopher.' Cf. also Lysis, 218). Thus at its beginning, the term was intended to point out the relativity of knowledge, and shows the existence of a consciousness of limitations in knowing. It was an expression of modesty. But as the object of the search for the truth can not be anything short of the ultimate reality, Plato goes further and defines those as philosophers who set their affections on that which in each case really exists (Rep. 480). In the Platonic system, accordingly, philosophy is identified with the more technical dialectics. With Aristotle, the first and most common sense of the word is left behind, but the technical sense develops into two branches according as the sphere of the search for wisdom is looked at narrowly or broadly. In the former case, there are many philosophies (Met. IV, 1, 1026, 18; Mathematics, Physics, Theology). In the latter sense, philosophy is the science of pure being (Met. VI, 1, 1026, 31; cf. XI, 3, 1060, 31), or as later renamed, metaphysics. The Stoics, consistently with their fundamental position that the essence of things is moral rather than intellectual, understood by philosophy a striving after virtue, which, however, they conceived broadly as including and dominating theoretical as well as practical affairs. Hence, according to them, philosophy is proficiency in physics, ethics, and logic (Seneca, Epist. 89, 3). It is distinguished from 'wisdom,' which is the science of divine and human things (Plut. De Plac. Philos. 1, Proem). The Epicurean idea is, like the Stoic, associated with the notion of the supreme good. Epicurus himself is said to have defined philosophy as 'the rational pursuit of happiness' (Sext. Empir. Adv. Math. XI, 169).

1. Origin of the Term.

2. Philosophy and Christianity.

Thus at the time of the first preaching of Christianity, philosophy had secured a recognized place as the mistress of that peculiar province of knowledge which is explored, not because of any practical need of outward life, but either from a simple desire for knowledge for its own sake, or as furnishing a unifying principle and goal for all action. As such it had been cultivated for over five centuries, and produced a number of concrete systems, each aiming to set forth the inner unity of the universe and to make ultimate reality an object of definite knowledge. The earlier of these systems (Ionic, Eleatic, Pythagorean, Anaxagorean, Atomistic, Sophistic, Socratic, Cyrenaic, and Cynic with minor varieties) had lost their hold as final and satisfactory solutions of the problem. The influence of Socrates was still perceptible through the systems of Plato and Aristotle, but these systems themselves were believed to need modification and development along certain lines.

Of the post-Aristotelian philosophies, the Stoic and Epicurean were most widely held, and it is with these that Christianity came in contact. Of the pre-Christian Greek systems, however, Platonism had already touched and measurably affected Jewish thought in Alexandria, and thus also later entered into the formulation of Christianity so far as its doctrinal content was concerned. In another way, too, Christianity and philosophy came in contact, i.e., when adherents of the former assumed an aggressive attitude within heathendom.

3. Philosophy and the N T.

The explicit allusions to philosophy in the N T (Ac 17 18; Col 2 8) are naturally related to current forms, and indicate on the one side the recognition of common ground on which an understanding must be reached between the teachings of Christianity and those of philosophy; and on the other, irreconcilable differences on the ground of which the Christian teacher must warn his pupils against its illusive attractions. The philosophers of Ac 17 18 were evidently interested in Paul's preaching, a fact largely due to their having grappled with the same problems as were presented most prominently by the Apostle in his preaching. The earlier Stoicism was pantheistic; the earlier Epicureanism agnostic, if not positively atheistic. But in the days of Paul these two types had drawn closer to each other, the former becoming more and more theistical and the latter deistical. By Epictetus (Diss. i, 9) God, without being completely detached from the universe, is recognized as Creator and Guardian and is even spoken of as Father of men. Seneca goes further, and makes conduct depend on the realization of God's personal attention to human affairs. "So live among men as if the eye of God were upon you; and so address yourself to God as if men heard your prayer" (Epist. 10). And even Providence and immortality had come to be regarded as living issues in the realm of philosophy; and, what is more important from the practical point of view, the ruling place of philosophy in life was recognized. Cicero calls philosophy "the director of our lives, the friend of virtue and enemy of vice." So far as contemporary philosophy was busied about solving these problems, the first teachers of the gospel neither challenged it nor cast suspicion on its work and influence. Their attitude toward it was that of interested neutrality. The philosophers on their side, misled by the fact that the postulates and mediate aims of Christianity were so near akin to those of their own profession, regarded it as a species of philosophy, a view which gradually worked its way into Christian circles and became the dominant one in the 2d cent. under Justin Martyr and Tatian.

4. Abuse and Distrust of Philosophy.

But philosophy had its imitations and illegitimate outgrowths. On account of these, both in the N T allusions to it and in the literature of the general period, a certain undertone of distrust is perceptible and a certain tendency to caution and discrimination in dealing with it. First of all, its votaries cultivated a quasi-Pharisaic contempt for the outside world. This gave rise to a series of personal traits and habits by which the philosopher was distinguished from the non-philosophic layman. The former was known for his long and unkempt hair and beard, his generally slovenly dress, his scorn for luxuries, and his alleged abstemiousness and self-contentment. It is upon these grounds that the satirist Lucian makes his vigorous attack on the philosophic sects of his day (Vitarum Auctio, Piscator, Hermotimus, Convivium, Nigrinus, etc.). In the persons of such men philosophy was but the mask that concealed selfishness, vainglory, greed, and sensuality. In fact, the portraiture of Lucian is based upon the existence of shameless hypocrisy in the ranks of philosophy. In another way the name of philosophy was used by schemers who exploited the region of the occult, the border-land between religion and science; and made a source of gain of the natural hunger for a true knowledge of the inner meaning of the world and its Creator. A. C. Z.

PHINEHAS, fin'ẹ-has (פִּינְחָס, pīnḥās, probably an Egyptian name, pe-neḥasi; cf. Nestle, Eigen. 112): 1. The son of Eleazar and grandson of Aaron, and high priest (Ex 6 25; Jg 20 28; I Ch 6 4, 50), distinguished for zeal in behalf of J", which he displayed by stepping forward at a critical time to punish an offender in Israel and thus stay a plague (Nu 25 7 ff.). This deed was always regarded as most deserving, and was celebrated both in poetic composition (Ps 106 30) and in the later historical records (Sir 45 23; I Mac 2 26, 54). It must be viewed not merely as an act of rebuke against mixed marriages, for such marriages were not in themselves offensive if the non-Israelite were willing to forsake idolatry and enter into the covenant of J". It was rather because in this particular case the alien insisted on bringing her religion as a seed of corruption into Israel. P. officiated as the priest in the war with the Midianites under Joshua (Nu 31 6), and was deputed to go into the land of Gilead to rebuke the tribes on the E. of the Jordan for building an altar, a step regarded as the possible beginning of disintegration for Israel (Jos 22 13). He was assigned an inheritance in the hill-country of Ephraim (Jos 24 33). 2. A son of Eli, slain in the war with the Philistines (I S 1 3, 4 4 ff.). 3. The father of Eleazar, a contemporary of Ezra (Ezr 8 33). PHLEGON, flĕ'gon (Φλέγων): A Christian of Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation (Ro 16 14). E. E. N.

PHŒBE, fĕ'bẹ (Φοίβη, Phebe AV): A "servant" ["deaconess" RVmg.] of the church at Cenchreæ, whom the Apostle Paul commends to the Roman Church (Ro 16 1). The additional item given in the description of her as "a helper" (succourer AV, προστάτις) is the feminine of a word meaning, in general, 'patron' or 'protector.' In Athens the office of patron involved the charge of the affairs of persons without civic rights. The Roman law recognized the patronus as the representative of the foreigner. Such patrons were not uncommon in Jewish communities (cf. Schürer, Die Gemeindeverfassung d. Jud. in Rom, p. 31). But Phœbe could have occupied such a place only informally and unofficially, and must have been a person of wealth and position to do so. A. C. Z.

Phœnicia, fĭ-nish'i-ą (Φοινίκη), is the name given the territory on the E. coast of the Mediterranean, that anciently extended in general from

1. Country. the Orontes River on the N. to Mt. Carmel on the S. and from the shore-line of the sea E. to the backbone of the Lebanon range of mountains and its N. and S. projecting hills. This entire stretch of shore-line is somewhat more than 200 m. long from N. to S. The plains (for there are several of them between the rivers emptying into the Mediterranean) vary in width between one and ten m. Though the Phœnicians occupied cities throughout this entire stretch of land, P. proper may be limited on the N. by the river Eleutheros, and on the S. by the Ladder of Tyre. Within these limits we find the location of the chief cities of this people. Some of these were Sidon, Tyre, Sarepta, Gebal, Byblos, Lycus, Tripolis, and Arḳa.

The name is derived from a Greek word, phœnix (φοίνιξ), which was used as a proper name to indicate something that was of a red-

2. Name. dish hue. The Greeks are said to have named the Canaanite peoples who carried to them quantities of purple dye or purple-dyed materials, 'phœnix men.' Hence the designation fastened itself on the peoples who occupied this territory, and then was extended to the land occupied by them.

There is an abundance of inscriptions in the language of the Phœnicians. These inscriptions have been found in Phœnicia itself, and in

3. Sources of Information. some of the colonies established, or trade-centers built up, in different seaports accessible to the Mediterranean. But they are nearly all short, scrappy, not historical, and comparatively late; that is, not earlier than the Persian period. Only one inscription dates from the 9th cent. B.C., and it was found on the fragments of a bowl discovered in Cyprus, but gives us no valuable information. The most useful of these brief inscriptions give us a sketchy picture of worship, lists of kings covering certain epochs, and of divinities. When we turn to the records of other countries we find more extended and more detailed information. Egyptian and Babylonian-Assyrian inscriptions contain numerous statements of prime importance scattered through their records from the 16th cent. B.C. to the Persian period. The O T, too, is a valuable source of evidence to the commercial importance of P., especially from the 8th to the 6th cent. B.C. (cf. Is ch. 23; Ezk chs. 27, 28). Josephus, Eusebius, and later Greek writers testify to the prominence of the Phœnicians. Only a beginning has been made in bringing to light the remains of that great nation, scattered as they are over a dozen different lands.

There is an abundance of tradition regarding the beginnings of Phœnicia. Herodotus tells us (1 1, 7 89) that the Phœnicians came originally

4. People. from the Red Sea, thought to have been the Persian Gulf, where there were two islands, Tylos and Arados, doubtfully the originals of Tyre and Arvad. Other traditions give us equally incredible stories. The inscriptional materials for definitely deciding this question are too scant to be of value; hence we must fall back on other evidence. Language, religion, and ethnology all come in to aid us in settling this point. Their language was a Semitic tongue, only dialectically different from the Hebrew of the O T. Their religion was almost sui generis; though we know much about its characteristic elements, next to nothing is known about its origin. Its people were properly classed with the Canaanites as far back as they are known to us, in the 16th cent. B.C. They occupied the coast-line and developed on the sea, while their brethren farther inland developed on the land, and in course of time they became almost two peoples.

The most ancient authentic records about the Phœnicians can not be dated earlier than the 16th cent. B.C., though there are many tra-

5. Early History. ditions of their immense antiquity and fabulous maritime activities. There are references to P. in Egyptian inscriptions of about 1550 B.C., which call the country Kupna (Müller, Aegyptiaca, pp. 77 ff.). The Asiatic campaigns of the Egyptian monarchy, notably of Thothmes III, give frequent references to the Phœnicians as if they were a people with very definite traits, location, and strength. The famous papyrus, Anastasi I, gives a list of Phœnician cities in existence at that day. But the most notable source of information on this period is the group of Tell-el-Amarna letters. By means of these we ascertain that several Phœnician cities were in existence and were important in the 15th cent. B.C. We find among the whole number mentioned Acco, Ḳana, Tyre (Usu in Amarna letters), Sidon (a chief city at that date), Berytus, Byblos, Arḳa (Irḳata in Amarna letters), and Simyra. These cities and towns, as shown in these letters, were subjects of Egypt in that early day. It seems that the Egyptian monarchs, soon after the expulsion of the Hyksos kings, followed up their advantage by conquering Palestine, Syria, and Phœnicia, Thothmes I extending his boundaries as far as the Euphrates. Henceforth, through the reigns of the 18th dynasty to that of Amenophis IV, the cities and provinces of Syria and P. paid tribute to Egyptian monarchs. This suzerainty was partially terminated by an invasion of the Hittites from the N., which was aided by desert peoples. Some of the cities surrendered to the Hittites, others attempted to remain loyal to Egypt, and still others became independent.

Thence down through the 19th dynasty (14th and 13th cents. B.C.) of Egypt, P. experienced varying fortunes and misfortunes, though most of the time subject to the Pharaoh. Early in the 12th cent. a great invasion of all the E. coast of the Mediterranean by sea-forces from Asia Minor and Europe resulted in the defeat of the invaded and the settlement of coast-lands by such people as the Philistines (q.v.).

When we first meet the Phœnicians in the times of David and Solomon, they seem to be an independent people with extensive maritime commerce and a notable skill as artisans. Tyre was the chief city, and its king, Hiram, was its royal director. With the Hebrews they had a reciprocity treaty for mutual gain (II S 5 11 f.; I K ch. 5).

The location of P. on the seacoast, and cut off by mountains on the land side from easy contact with other lands in close proximity, seems to have turned its inhabitants to a seafaring life. This method of travel and trade gradually led them to adjoining shores, to farther shores, to distant shores, until they had tried all waters within reasonable reach. Skilful in ship-building, in manufacturing choice articles of trade, they established with every accessible land most valuable commercial relations (Is ch. 23). On land also they had regular routes for the exportation and importation of costly wares (cf. Ezk chs. 27 and 28). When Solomon extended his commerce to distant ports, he employed experienced Phœnician sailors to man his ships. When Jonah fled from the face of the Lord, he embarked at Joppa on a Phœnician ship. They were the seamen, the Englishmen, of those days. Some of their trading-posts were Cyprus, Carthage in N. Africa, and Tarshish in Spain.

These trading-posts gradually became centers in which native Phœnicians settled in the interests of trade. Not many centuries passed before each important sea-center became a kind of colony, where commerce, religion, and politics of the Phœnician stamp took root. S. Europe, N. Africa, W. Europe, possibly E. Africa, and S. Arabia bear marks of early Phœnician influence. But colonies in the modern sense of the term these were not. Their ultimate purpose was commercial and financial. If they could secure and hold the trade of these distant lands, others might have the political and religious control of them. Tyre was the reputed mistress of the seas and of land-commerce in Solomon's day and for centuries later.

P., like Babylonia in early times, had no centralized government, but consisted of a number of city-states. Each had its king and the bond of union between them was barely visible. Claim to the throne seems to have been hereditary until a revolution allowed a usurper to be seated. Slight information has come down to us regarding the government of these cities. Some Roman writers tell us that a council of ten men, or an aristocracy, due either to early tribal prominence or to wealth, was the real governing body. In earlier times Sidon, and later Tyre, were prominent among all the group of Phœnician cities, though exercising no real authority over their inferiors.

The Phœnicians were a people overwhelmed with a crowded pantheon of about fifty divinities. Their fragmentary inscriptions, their proper names, and their language are burdened with the names of deities. These gods could have certain relations with mankind, and when they did this, men were under their perpetual protection. Of the origin of these divinities we know nothing. Some of their names occur hundreds of times, and always leave us in the same uncertainty. Some of the most prominent of these gods, either standing alone or in compounds, are: (1) Adonis, i.e., Tammuz (Ezk 8 14); (2) Asclepios, or Eshmun, extensively revered in Sidon, Cyprus, and Carthage; (3) Baal, occurring in hosts of proper names, and worshiped also by both Israelites and Phœnicians; (4) Molech, named under the form milki in many proper names; (5) Melkarth, 'city king,' the ba'al of Tyre; this name is also found frequently in Cyprus and Carthage; (6) Anath, seen in O T proper names such as Beth-anath (Jos 19 38), and Anathoth; (7) Ashtoreth, occurring often in the O T, the same as Astarte; (8) Tanith, the chief goddess of Carthage, her name being found more than 2,000 times in Phœnician inscriptions. Of her origin and nature we know almost nothing. The Phœnicians chose high places as peculiarly appropriate for worship, and there they built their temples and altars. They had their sacred streams, springs, and trees. Beside these were their most appropriate places of worship.

In the time of Solomon P. seems to have enjoyed independence, Tyre being preeminent. In the time of Ahab, Ethbaal was king of the Sidonians (I K 16 31). Gradually, however, all these coast-cities seem to have come under the authority of Tyre. This condition of things is established by the statements of the Assyrian kings, who give us a list of the Phœnician cities.

The first Assyrian ruler to invade P. was Asshurnatsirpal in 876 B.C. Of their cities he names Tyre, 12. Subject to Assyria.

Sidon, Byblos, Mahallata, Maisa, Kaisa, Amuri, and "Arvad in the sea," which brought him tribute. Shalmaneser II (860–824 B.C.) had little difficulty with them, for rather than suffer defeat and waste they quietly submitted with tribute. They did the same to Adad-nirari (811–782). But all internal administration was in the hands of the Phœnicians themselves.

The accession and aggressive policy of Tiglath-pileser III brought a new era to the Syrian lands. This great king and Sargon II name three states, viz.: Aradus, Byblos, and Tyre, the northern portion of the coast-line now being reckoned with Hamath. When Sennacherib invaded P., Lule (Elulaios) is called "king of Sidon"; Tyre lost its authority for a time over the coast-lands, and over Citium on the island of Cyprus. Sennacherib, on the flight of Lule to Cyprus, put Itubaal on the throne of Sidon, levying on him a heavy annual tribute. Under Esarhaddon (681–668 B.C.) Sidon rebelled against Assyrian authority, but was soon captured, destroyed, and its population deported (675 B.C.). Esarhaddon built a new town on another site called it 'Esarhaddon's town,' and set over it an Assyrian governor. Although the coast-land possessions of Tyre had a governor, the whole proceeding was a make-believe, for the Assyrian could neither conquer

Tyre nor force it to recognize him. The notable stele found at Zenjirli bears on its surface a gigantic figure of Esarhaddon, holding in his hand two thongs, one passing through the lip of the puppet figure of Tirhaka, King of Ethiopia, and the other through that of the king of Tyre; but this is another empty boast, for he captured neither of them. The king of Tyre, according to Asshurbanipal (668–626 B.C.), became frightened after the conquest of Egypt by the latter, and paid a heavy tribute. Some of the cities, notably Acco, were severely punished for rebellion.

13. Decline of Power.

The decline of Assyria left the Phœnician cities free for a time. But the success of Nebuchadrezzar's army in Palestine and Syria included the conquest of P., except the island city of Tyre. Some time during this period Tyre lost her political grip on her colonies, as well as over the mainland towns. The influx of Greek influence on land and sea rather weakened the power of Tyre, and let Carthage come to the front as a sea-power. For some centuries thereafter Carthage was the most prominent Phœnician city, though Tyre during all this time was an immense commercial success (cf. Ezk ch. 27). Persian domination made Sidon the first city of P. The finest ships in Xerxes' fleet were built by the Sidonians, whose king was second only to the Persian monarch. Tyre came third in honor. Under Persia, for a century and a half, this little country and all its cities prospered gloriously. A severe setback was given it in 350 B.C., when the king of Sidon joined with Nectanebos of Egypt to resist the authority of Persia. Artaxerxes III swooped down upon Sidon and almost annihilated it with sword and flame.

14. Macedonian Conquest.

The conquests of Alexander carried with them the capture of the island city of Tyre. Its partial destruction and the sale of its inhabitants into slavery gave it a paralyzing blow from which it never recovered. The story of the Phœnicians as a nation then came to an end, though the struggle of the individual cities has continued for centuries under Greek, Roman, Saracen, and Turkish rule.

PHŒNIX, fī'nix (Φοῖνιξ, Phenice AV): A place E. of Sphakia on the S. coast of Crete, the only harbor that affords safe anchorage at all seasons of the year, because of the peculiar configuration of its entrance, which opens toward the northeast and southeast winds (Ac 27 12). Strabo, Ptolemy, Stadiasmus (Mar. magn.), and Luke use the form Φοῖνιξ, while Ptolemy distinguishes between φοινικοῦς λιμήν (the harbor) and Φοῖνιξ πόλις (the city). The name of the harbor (now Lutro) was transferred to the city on the plateau 2,000 ft. above the harbor, where it still persists as Phinikia.

PHYLACTERY, fi-lac'ter-i (φυλακτήριον, the same as the טוֹטָפֹת, ṭōṭāphōth, frontlets of Dt 6 8 f., 11 18): The Gr. term means literally 'a means of preservation' either of that which it is designed to preserve (i.e., the Law in the memory) or as that which is meant to preserve the wearer from harm; hence an amulet or charm, more probably the latter. Whatever the original significance of the word, there is no doubt that it was used as synonymous with the t'phillāh (pl. t'phillīn) of later Judaism, which is approximately rendered 'prayer-band.' The use of t'phillīn is based upon four passages of the Law (Ex 13 9, 16; Dt 6 8, 11 18). These were interpreted to mean that the true Israelite should actually wear the written Law on his arm and on his forehead. The passages in Ex, however, are manifestly metaphorical. About those in Dt there is some vagueness, admitting of their being taken literally. In any case, these four texts were used as the emblem of the whole Law, and placed in the phylacteries. These phylacteries consisted of two leather pouches each fastened to a band and by the band attached to the worshiper's person. The more important of the two was subdivided into four compartments and was tied to the head so as to bring it between the eyebrows (hence "frontlet"). Each one of its compartments contained a copy of one of the passages above named as enjoining the use of phylacteries. The other phylactery, consisting of one compartment, was tied to the inside portion of the left arm in such a manner as to bring it as near as possible to the heart when the arm was bent in joining the two hands together. The date of the origin of the custom of wearing phylacteries may be approximately fixed as the 2d cent. B.C. (cf. Kennedy in HDB). The custom was fixed into a law in the Talmud (Shebu. 8, 11, etc.), directing every male Israelite after his 13th year to use them at morning prayers on Sabbaths and festivals. The wearing of phylacteries, which is perpetuated to the present day within orthodox Judaism under the technical title of "laying the tephillin," is highly ritualistic in its nature and requires rigid conformity to certain minute regulations in the construction of the pouches, in the order in which they must be put on and taken off, and in the form of words to be uttered while being put on and taken off.

Jesus, by implication, disapproved of the stress laid on the use of phylacteries by the Pharisees. He pointed this out as a sign of their love of display. "They make broad their phylacteries" (Mt 23 5). This means that they wore larger pouches than ordinary, and made the bands by which they were attached to their persons correspondingly broader. It is possible that His utterance regarding them may have been actuated by the additional consideration that phylacteries were fast becoming, if they had not already become, objects of superstition. It is certain that somewhat later they were regarded by many as means of protection against demons.

PI-BESETH, pai-bī'seth (פִּי־בֶסֶת, pī bheṣeth), 'house of Bastet,' the cat goddess: The city Bubastis, the mod. Tell-Baṣta, with extensive mounds, in Lower Egypt on the E. side of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile. It was the capital of the 18th nome of Lower Egypt, and in 1000 B.C., under the Bubastic (22d) dynasty, became next in importance to Thebes. Its temple, containing important monuments, has been recently excavated by Naville. C. S. T.

PICTURE: This word is the rendering in AV for two words, meaning perhaps 'something to look at,' both from the root sākhāh, 'to look out,' 'look for.' For (1) maskīth, RV reads "figured [stones]" (Nu 33 52), to agree with Lv 26 1, i.e., stones with carvings or pictures used as idols. Other renderings are "watch-towers," "standards" (as conspicuous); or by emendation, "ships." In Pr 25 11 ERV has "baskets," ARV "network" (carving) of silver. For (2) sḳhiyyāh, RV reads "imagery" (Is 2 16). C. S. T.

PIGEON. See PALESTINE, § 25; also SACRIFICE AND OFFERING, § 5.

PI-HAHIROTH, pai''-ha-hai'roth (פִּי־הַחִירֹת, pī haḥīrōth): The last encampment of the Israelites before the crossing of the Red Sea, near Baal-zephon (Ex 14 2, 9; Nu 33 7; we should also read "Pi-hahiroth" for "Hahiroth" in ver. 8). The location is unknown. C. S. T.

PILATE (Πόντιος Πιλάτος): Pontius Pilate was the fifth Roman procurator of Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa (26–36 A.D.). Pilate's origin was obscure; he belonged to no noble Roman family, but nevertheless was a Roman knight. One medieval tradition makes him a Gaul of Vienne, another a German hostage in Rome who joined the 22d legion, fought in Pontus (hence Pontius), and obtained the name Pilatus because of his skill with the pilum; more probably he was a descendant of a freedman (pileatus, corrupted to pilatus, from pileus, the 'felt cap' worn by manumitted slaves) formerly owned by a member of the Samnite gens of the Pontii. P. was appointed procurator by his patron Sejanus, the Jew-hating prime minister of Tiberius, and was probably instructed to crush Jewish fanaticism. His predecessor, Valerius Gratus (14–25 A.D.), had resided quietly in Cæsarea, content to enrich himself (among other ways by selling the office of high priest), and had respected Jewish superstitions. P gave offense from the outset. He transferred the headquarters of the army from Cæsarea to the palace of Herod (the Prætorium, Mk 15 16, etc.) in Jerusalem. The Roman standards, surmounted by eagles and banners with embroidered portraits of Tiberius, were held by the Jews to be a violation of the second commandment. P. had remained in Cæsarea, whither a weeping, howling mob repaired from Jerusalem and Judæa to beg him to remove the abomination from the holy city. They stormed about the palace for five days, when P. addressed them and threatened to massacre them unless they dispersed. They refused, and offered their bare throats to the soldiers. Finally P ordered the removal of the obnoxious standards, probably induced thereto by a bribe from Jerusalem. His second offense consisted in taking money from the sacred treasury (Corban) to construct an aqueduct from the Pools of Solomon to Jerusalem. Shocked at this deed, the Jews gathered before his tribunal, abused him, and accused him of embezzling a portion of the funds. In anger P had the mob butchered mercilessly. P gave a third offense by hanging up shields in Herod's palace. The Jews appealed to Tiberius, who ordered the removal of the shields to the temple of the divine Augustus in Cæsarea. In similar frequent tumults the Zealots of Galilee took a prominent part, whereupon P complained ineffectually to Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, whom he further offended by attempting to punish the Zealots in Galilee. P went to Jerusalem in 33 (or earlier; see CHRONOLOGY OF N T, § 3) to be on the ground during the Passover, because he had reason to anticipate trouble, and during this visit occurred the events that will make him notorious as long as Christians repeat "suffered under Pontius Pilate." That the Jews could be conciliated was shown by Vitellius himself, who visited Jerusalem in 35, and won the good-will of the populace by a remission of taxes, and of the priests and people by permitting the official robes of the high priest (hitherto stored in the castle of Antonia) to be deposited in a chamber of the Temple. The final offense of P. was given shortly thereafter. An impostor of Samaria claimed that he had received a revelation to the effect that Moses had concealed certain gold vessels on Mt. Gerizim. The people of Samaria, hitherto loyal to Rome, had gathered in a body (unhappily armed) to hunt for these vessels. P. sent soldiers to disperse the mob; a bloody massacre ensued and a whole village was destroyed. The governor of Samaria complained to Vitellius, who deposed P. (36) and sent him to Rome for trial. Tiberius died before P. reached Rome, and he languished in prison for some time. His case was probably never tried, and his end is enshrouded in uncertainty. Eusebius says he was banished to Vienne in Gaul, where, according to one tradition, he committed suicide to forestall execution by Caligula. Malalas says that Pilate was beheaded by Nero. According to the legend in the Mors Pilati, his body was thrown into the Tiber, but as it caused that river to flow over its banks, it was sunk in a lake on Mt. Pilatus, where it still causes storms. The Acta Pilati, P's official report to the emperor concerning the trial and crucifixion of Christ, played a great rôle in early times; Justin Martyr (about 140) appealed to them (thrice); so did Tertullian (about 180) and Eusebius (about 280). This record was destroyed, probably by Maximian (311). The extant Acta Pilati form a portion of the Gospel of Nicodemus, ascribed by scholars to the 4th cent., and were written for Jews by Jewish Christians. The Epistolæ Pilati, addressed to Tiberius or Claudius, purport to be P.'s account of the resurrection of Christ. The Paradosis Pilati tells of P.'s trial, condemnation, and execution. In this P. prays to Jesus, who forgives him. This legend formed the basis of P.'s canonization as a saint in the Abyssinian Church (June 25), while in the Coptic Church he is reckoned one of the martyrs. The Mors Pilati tells of his banishment to Vienne, suicide, and final burial in Lake Pilatus. Tradition says that P.'s wife (Procla, or Claudia Procula) was a 'proselyte of the gate' and a secret follower of Jesus. She is canonized as a saint in the Greek Orthodox Church (October 27). J. R. PILLAR. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 30.

PILLAR, PLAIN OF THE: The designation of the place where Abimelech was made king (Jg 9 6 AV, "oak [terebinth] of the pillar" RV). The Heb. mutstsabh, 'pillar,' is with Moore, Int. Crit. Com. ad. loc., to be emended to matstsebhah, and we should read "the massebah-tree," perhaps the stone set up by Joshua (Jos 24 26 f.) under the oak by the Sanctuary of J" in Shechem. C. S. T.

PILLOW: This is the rendering in AV of several words. (1) kābhīr, something 'netted' (I S 19 13, 16, "quilt" or "network" RVmg.). Michal used it "at the head" of the teraphim either to support the head or else as a net to cover it. (2) keṣeth, a band or fillet used as a charm in divination (Ezk 13 18, 20). (3) me'ra'ăshōth (fem. pl.), 'place at head' (Gn 28 11, 18). RV has here correctly "under his head"; in I S 26 7, 11, 16, "at his head" for "at his bolster" AV; in I S 26 12 "from Saul's head" for "from Saul's bolster" AV; in I S 19 13, 16, "at his head" for "for his bolster" AV In I K 19 6 the rendering is the same in both versions. (4) προσκέφαλιον (Mk 4 38) means a cushion such as was used for a seat by rowers. C. S. T.

PIRATHON, PIRATHONITE, pir'a-thon, -ait (פִּרְעָתוֹן, pir'āthōn), 'height' (?): The home of Abdon, the last of the minor Judges (Jg 12 15); also of one of David's heroes and captains (II S 23 30; I Ch 11 31, 27 14). It was in Ephraim, in the hill-country of the Amalekites, generally identified with Far'atâ, 5 m. SW. of Nablus (Shechem); by G. A. Smith as a fortress at the head of the Wâdy Fâ'rah, NE. of Nablus. A Pirathon was fortified by Bacchides (I Mac 9 50). C. S. T.

PISGAH, piz'gā (פִּסְגָּה, piṣgāh, always with the art., and always in the phrases "top of P" and "slopes ["springs," Dt 4 49 AV; ASHDOTH PISGAH, Jos 12 3 AV] of P."): A mountain summit, mentioned as a landmark and station of the Israelites in Moab (Nu 21 20; Jos 12 3, 13 20). It was noted as an outlook-point. Here Balak built seven altars for Balaam, and invited him to survey the hosts of Israel (Nu 21 14). Moses also viewed the land of promise from it (Dt 34 1). In this case it is explicitly identified with Mt. Nebo in the Abarim. If this identification be set aside as due to confusion, the exact location of Pisgah must be left undetermined. A. C. Z.

PISHON, pai'shon (פִּישׁוֹן, pīshōn, Pison AV): One of the rivers of the Garden of Eden. It compassed "the whole land of Havilah," known for its gold (Gn 2 11 f.). See EDEN. E. E. N.

PISIDIA, pai-sid'i-a. See ASIA MINOR, § 13.

PISPAH, pis'pā (פִּסְפָּא, piṣpā'): A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 38). E. E. N.

PIT: This word renders the following original terms: (1) bōr, 'a large hole made by excavating' (Gn 37 20 ff., etc.). (2) be'ēr, 'well' (Gn 14 10, etc.). (3) gēbh, 'trench' (Jer 14 3, "cistern" RV), also gebhe' (Is 30 14, "cistern" RV). (4) gūmmātz, 'ditch' (Ec 10 8). (5) paḥath, 'opening' (II S 17 9, 18 17; Jer 48 43, etc.). (6) she'ōl, 'hollow' (Nu 16 30, 33; Job 17 16, etc., often rendered "hell"). (7) shūḥāh, shḥūth, shḥīth, sheḥath, shīḥāh (all from the same root), 'corruption' (Pr 22 14, 28 10; La 4 20; Job 33 18, etc.). (8) βόθυνος, 'deep place' (Mt 12 11) and (9) φρέαρ, 'well' (Lk 14 5; and, figuratively, Rev 9 1). The term is also used metaphorically as the equivalent of either the grave (Job 33 18), Sheol (Nu 16 30, 33), or a snare. A unique usage is that of Is 15 1, where Sarah, the ancestress of the people, is so designated. A. C. Z.

PITCH: In the Bible "pitch" means bitumen, which was used in making boats water-tight. It occurs (Gn 6 14) as the trans. of kōpher, a word borrowed from the Assyr. kupru; and in Ex 2 3, Is 34 9 as the trans. of zepheth, also a loan-word. According to Ex 2 3, it was used with ḥēmār (the usual Heb. word for 'bitumen') in protecting Moses' basket from the water. In Is 34 9 it is represented as a fluid and burning. All three words may mean the same, ḥēmār alone being Heb. C. S. T.

PITCHER: This word renders (1) kadh, an earthen jar used for holding and carrying water from wells or springs (Gn 24 14 ff.; Ec 12 16, etc.). It served also as a receptacle for oil or flour (I K 17 12, "barrel" AV and ERV, and "jar" ARV), and was made with handles, by which it might be lifted and carried about, and with a mouth large enough to permit the insertion of a torch (Jg 17 16 ff.). (2) nebhel, also rendered "bottle" or "flagon" (La 4 12). (3) κεράμιον, 'earthen vessel' (Mk 14 13). A. C. Z.

PITHOM, pai'thom (פִּתֹם, pithōm): A town in Goshen, in Lower Egypt, founded by Rameses II as a store-city (Ex 1 11 [JE], treasure city AV) Its Egyptian name was pa-Tum or pa-'tum ('house of Tum,' or 'house of the setting sun'). It was situated on the banks of the canal connecting the Nile with the Red Sea (see ISRAEL, p. 371). Its ground-plan was in the form of a perfect square enclosed by strong walls. Within this enclosure stood a temple dedicated to Tum (the god of the setting sun), and subterranean chambers of various sizes, quadrangular in shape, without communications with one another, and approachable only from above. These were lined with walls and floors of brick made, some with, and some without, straw There is little doubt that they were intended for the storage of grain and other provisions (cf. Naville, The Store City of Pithom, 1885). A. C. Z.

Store City of Pithom and its Vicinity.

PITHON, pai'thon (פִּתוֹן, pīthōn): A grandson of Jonathan (I Ch 8 35, 9 41). E. E. N.

PITY (also compassion, which as the synonym of sympathy [fellow-feeling] occurs only in I P 3 1 and He 10 34; elsewhere it is always the equivalent of pity): One or both of these words are used to render: (1) ḥāmal (Ex 2 6, etc., root idea 'to spare'). (2) ḥeṣedh, 'goodness,' 'kindness' (Job 6 14 RV). (3) hūṣ (vb. Ezk 9 5; Dt 7 6, etc.). (4) ḥānan, ḥōn, 'favor,' 'grace' (Jer 22 23 RV, etc.). (5) nūdh, 'to show grief' (Ps 69 20). (6) rāḥam, rāḥămīm, 'deep emotion' (Am 1 11, etc.). (7) εὔσπλαγχνος, Ja 5 11; I P 3 8, "compassionate" RV. (8) οἰκτείρειν (Ro 9 15). The feeling of kindness toward the weak, the erring, and suffering is uniformly represented as one that exists in the heart of God toward men and is enjoined upon as well as encouraged in the Israelite toward his fellow Israelites, especially the poor (Zec 7 9; Pr 19 17), the helpless and the defenseless (Ps 146 9), and the distressed (Job 6 14); but not toward an enemy (Dt 7 16) and an alien. Yet by its association with the will of J" it takes its place in the complex of religious affections (Hos 6 6). Jesus, by obliterating all race and ritual distinctions as to those who should call forth the sentiment (Lk 10 25-37), gave the law of compassion universal breadth. A. C. Z.

PLAGUE. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5 (9).

PLAGUE: This term is frequently used to render, somewhat loosely, a number of Heb. and Gr. words: (1) maggēphāh and negeph (from nāgaph, 'to push' or 'strike'), a 'stroke,' as a punishment from God (Ex 9 14, 12 13; Nu 14 37, etc.). (2) makkāh (from mākhāh, 'to smite,' a 'smiting' or 'stroke,' Lv 26 21; Nu 11 33, etc.). (3) nega' (from nāga', 'to touch'), a 'touch,' i.e., the touch of God, by a visitation of sickness or otherwise (Gn 12 17; Ex 11 1; and especially in Lv ch. 13 f., of the "plague" of leprosy). (4) debher, 'pestilence' and consequently nearer 'plague' in the usual sense of the term than the other words so rendered (Hos 13 14). The pestilence that brings death is what is meant, and the sense of the statement is that J" Himself will be as a death-dealing pestilence to the unrepentant Israelites. (5) μάστιξ, a 'whip' or 'scourge,' used of sickness (Mk 3 10, 5 29, 34; Lk 7 21). (6) πληγή, a 'blow' or 'stroke' (Rev 9 20, 11 6, etc.). E. E. N.

PLAGUES, THE: The term usually given to the series of disasters that befell the Egyptians when the Israelites were seeking to gain their freedom. These were viewed by the Heb. writers as visitations of J″ upon the Egyptians for refusing to let Israel go and to demonstrate His almighty power (Ex 7 3 ff., 9 14, etc.). As the narrative (Ex chs. 7–10) now stands, there were ten such visitations: 1, blood; 2, frogs; 3, lice; 4, flies; 5, murrain of cattle; 6, boils; 7, hail; 8, locusts; 9, darkness; 10, death of the first-born. But this narrative is composite (see EXODUS, § 4 f.), and it is probable that no one of the three original narratives gave the full list of ten. The list of J was the longest, comprising seven (Nos. 1 [which in J is viewed as foul water in the river, not blood], 2, 4, 5, 7, 8, 10). That of E comprised five (Nos. 1, 7, 8, 9, 10), while that of P also included five (1, 2, 3, 6, 10). Those given in all three documents were apparently only Nos. 1 and 10, but it is possible that in E and P the lists were longer than is now apparent. In Pss 78 and 105 also there are lists of the plagues, seven in each case, of which six are identical, but the order is different. These facts show that there were variant traditions in Israel respecting the number, the tendency perhaps being to consider seven as the correct number (cf. the apocalyptic use of this number in Rev 15 1 ff., 21 9, "the seven last plagues").

In each of the narratives (J, E, P) a miraculous character is assigned to the plagues, but in different degrees. In the oldest narrative (J) the representation is such that only the general exercise of His control over nature by J″ is assumed. It is J″ that brings them about, but how is not told, except by suggesting the use of some natural agency, as the wind in connection with the locusts, 10 13, 19 (cf. the same view of the recession and return of the waters of the Red Sea in J in 14 21). In P, and to a less degree in E, the marvelous character is made more prominent in that the plagues are brought by the stretching out or touch of Aaron's (P) or Moses' (E) rod, and it is in P's narrative that the plagues as wonders or signs are especially emphasized (see the analysis of the narrative in EXODUS, § 4 f.). It is reasonable to infer, therefore, that in the earliest form of Israel's tradition the 'natural' side of the plagues was recognized and that which made them so remarkable was their occurrence in connection with Israel's struggle for freedom in which their prophetically gifted leader was enabled to interpret and use them as signal manifestations of J″ in favor of His people. And that in those times, when every extraordinary natural phenomenon was referred directly to Divine action, such would be the interpretation not only of the Israelites but even of the Egyptians is altogether probable.

It would not be surprising, then, if a close study of the narrative of the plagues in connection with what has been observed regarding natural phenomena in Egypt would reveal that certain of them seem to be connected in a sort of natural sequence, all of which serves to render the narrative more intelligible to the modern reader and at the same time actually adds to its historical probability. The results of such observations have been gathered and convincingly presented by Prof. A. Macalister in HDB, s.v., who is followed in the main by McNeile in his recent Com. on Exodus (1908, Westminster Commentaries). The Nile often becomes a dull red after reaching its height (in August), and the water might easily, under special circumstances, become foul, as the red color is due to immense numbers of minute living organisms. Such conditions would be favorable for the appearance of unusually large numbers of frogs, plagues of which have occurred a number of times in Egypt, generally in September. The decomposition of the dead frogs would favor the breeding of innumerable swarms of flies and other insects, and produce unhealthful conditions likely to bring about pestilence among beasts as well as men. Hail-storms, very rare in Egypt, have been known to occur in January, which is about the time demanded by what is said about the injury done to the crops by the hail (9 21). In the wake of the hail-storm the east wind brought with it locusts (a common plague in SW. Asia). The darkness that could be "felt" (10 21) might easily have been caused by the terrible ḥamsin wind which brings with its hot blast sand and fine dust so that even breathing is difficult. The last visitation, the death of Egypt's first-born, connects itself naturally with the general pestilential condition of the country at that time. Thus, there were, in general, but two great natural agencies at work to cause such a series of disastrous visitations, the presence of an unusually large quantity of decaying animal matter, and an unusual degree of atmospheric disturbance, bringing violent storms of wind and hail. That a tradition, centuries old before it was written down, should be an exact account, correct in every detail, of such a series of occurrences is improbable. The tradition gradually took its present form under the influence of dominant religious and other conceptions. But its historical basis is not thereby overthrown, nor is it necessary to give up the essential correctness of its view that these visitations were, under God, convincing demonstrations of His power and of His care for His people Israel.

PLAIN: This term is used (in the AV) for seven Heb. and one Gr. words or expressions. (1) 'ābhēl, 'meadow,' always in compound names of places (as Jg 11 33, "Abel-cherammim" RV, "meadow of vineyards" RVmg.). (2) 'ēlōn, 'oak' ("terebinth" RVmg.), only found in this form in names of places (Gn 12 6, 13 18, 14 13, 18 1; Dt 11 30; Jg 4 11, 9 6, 37; I S 10 3; cf. Jos 19 33). (3) biq'āh, 'open, broad valley,' used as the opposite of hills or mountains, often rendered "valley" (Dt 8 7, 11 11; Ps 104 8; Is 41 18, 63 14), used of level land (Is 40 4; Ezk 3 22 f., 8 4; cf. 37 1, "valley"), for the "plain" of Babylon (Gn 11 2; cf. Dn 3 1), of Ono (q.v., Neh 6 2), of Aven (Am 1 5, "valley" RV) between the Lebanon and Antilebanon, for the Jordan Valley (Dt 34 3), and for other "valleys" (cf. Jos 11 17, 12 7; Zec 12 11; II Ch 35 22; Jos 11 8). (4) kikkār, 'circle'; always rendered "plain," and, except in I K 7 46, II Ch 4 17, in RV with a capital P. It designates the Jordan Valley south of where it broadens out at the Jabbok, as far as and including the Dead Sea, if the 'cities of the plain' (Gn 13 12) were S. of the Dead Sea (Gn 13 10 f., 19 17 ff.; Dt 34 3; II S 18 23; Neh 3 22, 12 28; cf. Mt 3 5, "region round about the Jordan." (5) mīshōr, 'level country' (Ps 27 11, 143 10 ARVmg.; Jer 21 13; Zec 4 7; I K 20 23, 25; cf. Is 40 4, 4 16; Ps 26 12). "The plain" is the technical term for the table-land of Moab or Reuben (Jos 20 8) from the Arnon to Heshbon (Dt 3 10, 4 43; Jos 13 17, 21; II Ch 26 10; Jer 48 8, 21), called also 'P. of Medeba' (Jos 13 9, 16). (6) 'Ărābhāh, 'steppe,' 'desert-plain.' The technical term for the hollow or depression (Dt 1 1 RVmg.) of the Jordan Valley, the Dead Sea, and S. to the Gulf of Akabah. El-Ghôr is the modern name from the Sea of Galilee to 6 m. S. of the Dead Sea, below that el-'Ărăbah. The AV renders by "plain" or "plains," except (so also RV) in Ps and the Prophets, where a desert or wilderness is intended. The RV retains "plains" in some cases (Nu 22 1, etc.; Dt 34 1, 8; Jos 4 13, 5 10, 13 32; II K 25 5=Jer 39 5 = 52 8); elsewhere in RV it is "Arabah." RV emends the text in II S 15 28, 17 16 to read "fords." (7) shᵉphēlāh, 'lowland,' the technical term for the low hills between the Mts. of Judah and the Maritime plain, S. of the vale of Aijalon (I Ch 27 28; II Ch 9 27; Jer 17 26, etc.). It is distinguished from the mountains, the Arabah, the Negeb (south), and the plain by the sea (Dt 1 7; Jos 9 1). See PALESTINE, § 7 (b). It is often rendered (in AV) "vale," "valley." RV has uniformly "lowland." In Jos 11 2 it refers to the lowland W of Carmel, and near the coast. (8) τόπος πεδινός (Lk 6 17 RV, "level place").

PLANE. See ARTISAN LIFE, § 5.

PLANET. See ASTRONOMY, § 3.

PLANE-TREE. See PALESTINE, § 21.

PLANK. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

PLASTER: (1) sidh (n. and vb.), 'lime,' 'whitewash.' In Dt 27 2-4, the stones were to be covered with a preparation of lime, to provide a surface on which writing might be inscribed with a pigment, as was done in Egypt. (2) gīr (Aram.), the plaster on a wall (Dn 5 5), similar to sidh above. (3) ṭūaḥ (vb.), 'to overlay,' 'smear,' the walls of a house with a mud plaster (Lv 14 42; cf. vs. 43, 48). (4) mārah (vb.), a medical term, 'to smooth' or 'smear' a boil or sore with a plaster (of figs in Is 38 21). C. S. T.

PLATTER: The rendering of two Gr. words: (1) παροψίς, lit. 'a side-dish' (παρά, 'by the side of,' and ὄψον), i.e., a dish "in which delicacies are served up" (Thayer, Gr. Lex. of N T) (Mt 23 25 f.). (2) πίναξ, 'a board' or 'tablet' and here a flat dish or "platter" in the ordinary sense (Lk 11 39; charger AV in Mt 14 8 ff.; Mk 6 25 ff.). Such a dish could be of earthenware or of metal. "Charger" is also used in AV to render qᵉ'ārah (Nu 7 13, etc.) and 'ăgarṭal, prob. 'bowl' (Ezr 1 9), both "platter" RV. E. E. N.

PLAY: (1) nāghan, which means 'to play on a stringed instrument' (I S 16 16, etc.; II K 3 15; Ps 33 3; Ezk 33 32). (2) tsāḥaq (Piel) in Ex 32 6, to enjoy oneself with singing and dancing, after sacrificing (cf. vs. 17, 19; and παίζειν in I Co 10 7). (3) sāḥaq (Piel), to 'play' or 'sport,' by singing and dancing with music of stringed instruments (I S 18 7; II S 6 5, 21; I Ch 13 8, 15 29), of the playing of children (Zec 8 5), of contending in a tournament (II S 2 14), of playing or sporting with something (Job 40 20, 41 5 [40 29]). (4) Shā'a', Pilpel, 'the playing' of a child (Is 11 8). C. S. T.

PLEAD. See LAW AND LEGAL PRACTISE, § 4.

PLEDGE: An article given as security for the restoration of money borrowed. In early Heb. society such articles were apt to be garments, or a utensil of some sort (Ex 22 26; Dt 24 6-17; Job 24 3, etc.). In later times fields and houses were mortgaged (Neh 5 3) and outside parties were invoked as security (Pr 6 1, 11 5, etc.). In all periods the way was open for the cruel oppression of the poor by the rich in respect to pledges. Both the Law and the prophets sought to mitigate the evils and inculcate a more humane spirit (see reff. above; also Am 2 8; Ezk 18 7). The wise men warned against the risk involved in becoming a surety (Pr 6 1, 11 15, 22 26, etc.). The word pledge has, however, other meanings, as in I S 17 18, a 'token' to assure those at home of the safety of those in camp. In Gn 38 17-20 the meaning is self-evident. In II K 18 23, Is 36 8, "give pledges to" should be "make a wager with"; so RVmg. See also LAW and TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3. E. E. N.

PLEIADES, plī'a-dîz or plī'ya-dîz. See ASTRONOMY, § 4.

PLOW: The plow in common use in Palestine even to-day is a very primitive instrument, as will be seen by the accompanying illustration (cf. also Plate under AGRICULTURE). The framework is rudely constructed and not of great strength. The plowshare ('ēth; cf. Is 2 4; Jl 3 10; Mic 4 3) is almost flat (rather than upright) and merely breaks up the surface of the soil to the depth of three or four inches, instead of turning it over in deep furrows as is the case with the plows used in Europe and America. The word maḥărēshāh [from ḥārash], 'to cut in,' is also rendered "share," I S 13 20, and "mattock" in ver. 21, while 'ēth is rendered coulter, but as the Oriental plow has no coulter this is certainly wrong. According to the LXX., maḥărēshāh should be rendered "sickle." The passage has probably suffered in transmission. In plowing, the single handle is held with the left hand, leaving the right free to use the goad. See also AGRICULTURE, § 4. E. E. N.

PLUMB-LINE, PLUMMET. See ARTISAN LIFE, § 4.

PLUNDER. See WARFARE, § 5.

POCHERETH, pok'ē-reth, HAZZEBAIM (haz"-zē-bā'îm הַצְּבָיִם, pōkhereth ha-tsᵉbhāyīm, P. of Zebaim AV): The name of a subdivision of "Solomon's servants" (Ezr 2 57; Neh 7 59). E. E. N.

POET (ποιητής): This word is used only in Ac 17 28 by Paul in introducing a quotation to his Athenian audience from a Stoic writing (Cleanthes, Hymn to Zeus). But as the same sentiment is expressed by Aratus (3d cent. B.C.) in the more precise form in which he reproduces it (Phenomena), the Apostle uses the plural "poets." Paul quotes another Greek poet (Tit 1 12), though calling him after the Hebrew fashion a prophet (Epimenides, On Oracles). In I Co 15 33 there is a trace of poetic form, but as no author is named, the presumption is that the words were a popular proverb. A. C. Z.

The N T is composed entirely in prose, with the exception of quotations from previous poetical writings and possibly liturgical formulas used by the earliest Christians in worship. Such may be the Magnificat (Lk 1 46b-55) and the Song of Zacharias (Lk 1 68-79 and I Ti 3 16). The effort to reduce the sayings of Jesus to the parallelistic forms of Hebrew poetry (Briggs, New Light on the Life, etc.) can at best apply only to the Aramaic originals of those sayings. This leaves the whole Greek portion of the Bible, historical, didactic, and apocalyptic, in prose.

1. The N T in Prose.

In the O T, however, at least six whole books and large portions of others are poetic, not only in form but in contents (Ps, Pr, Job, Song, Ec, and La, to which may be added Sir and Wis of the Apocrypha). The Hebrews were no exception to the rule that all races in their earlier stages of development express their inner life in verse. Before they began to write the records of their tribal or national achievements, they had already become possessed of a collection of songs and epic accounts of ancient leaders, small portions of which have been embodied in the Biblical text. The lost books of Jashar (q.v.) and the Wars of Jehovah (q.v.) were undoubtedly poetic. The Song of Lamech (Gn 4 23 f.), the Blessing of Jacob (Gn ch. 49), the Blessing of Moses (Dt ch. 33), the Song of Deborah (Jg ch. 5), the Songs of Moses and Miriam (Ex 15 1-18), and several smaller fragments are probably specimens of a large number that did not survive.

2. Poetic Form in O T.

The effort, however, to make an exhaustive list of the poetic portions, large or small, of the O T is rendered futile by the obvious difficulty of drawing a clear line between highly artistic prose and rather commonplace poetry. While it is easy to say in general that the difference between poetry and prose lies in the fact that the former possesses the two cardinal peculiarities of imaginative conception in subject-matter and versified expression, this general characterization is not sufficient to enable one to discriminate in every particular case. It might be a question, for instance, whether the prologue and epilogue of Job were prose or poetry. What can be done is to indicate in general the types or classes of poetic composition, and some of the technique of versification. But in doing this we must abandon the strict use of the ordinary classification and nomenclature of classic poetic literature as epic, lyric, and dramatic. These are usable only in a modified form when applied to Semitic lore. A new element, too, must be taken account of in dealing with the poetry of the Hebrews. This is the religious feeling which characteristically pervades and dominates it almost without exception.

3. Distinction Between Poetry and Prose.

The term lyric, so far as it denotes the poetry that springs from a highly wrought state of feeling, is indeed perfectly adapted to describe a large portion of Hebrew versified composition. But of the lyric form there are many varieties; the most common is the psalm, or religious lyric, used in ordinary worship either as a hymn of praise or as a prayer. This, of course, is true of its strict and pure type. The Hebrew poet does not, however, limit himself to the mere expression of feeling addressed to God; he permits his sentiments toward other men to mingle with his individual relation to God and thus, in addition to the hymn and prayer, a third type of psalm arises, i.e., the exhortation (warning, encouragement, historic portraiture, or love-song). All these, with the song of thanksgiving for special victory over an enemy (pæan), occur in the Psalter.

4. The Psalm: Its Varieties.

A special class of lyrics is that of dirges in which expression is given to overwhelming grief, either for a private or for a public calamity. The laments of David over Saul and Jonathan (II S 1 19-27) and over Abner (II S 3 33, 34), and especially the Book of Lamentations, furnish fine specimens of this form.

5. The Dirge or Qīnāh.

Poetry whose object is to admonish and instruct the young was also evidently from the earliest ages quite common. It was developed into many subordinate varieties, such as the riddle, the fable, the parable, the proverb, and the epigram, whether of the philosophical or the political type. Of the riddle the story of Samson contains a distinct and typical illustration (Jg 14 14, 18). The fable is represented in Jotham's story of the trees seeking a king (Jg 9 8 ff.); and of the maxim in all its forms, the lines ascribed to the poets Agur and Lemuel in Pr ch. 30 f. furnish abundant examples. This type is sometimes called Gnomic poetry. But when it takes an extensive, elaborate, and discursive form it is proper to entitle it didactic. This is the prevailing type in the Wisdom Literature. Outside of Pr, Job chs. 28 and 31 may be cited as outstanding illustrations within the Canon, and the Book of the Wisdom of Solomon (of the Apocrypha) carries it out to its perfect development. See also PARABLE; PROVERB; PROVERBS, BOOK OF; and WISDOM, WISE MEN.

6. Didactic Poetry.

Whether there is any dramatic poetry in the O T has been seriously questioned. The controversy hinges on the definition of the word dramatic. If the term be made to imply all that it does in the Greek literature, it must be admitted that there is no Hebrew drama; but if it be used as a general word to denote the representation of action and life not necessarily for reproduction upon a stage, there are dramatic passages in the prophetic writings as well as in the Psalms, and the Book of Job and the Song of Solomon are certainly dramatic. Ps 24, at least from vs. 7 to 10, is constructed in the form of a trilogue, ver. 7 being uttered by one person, or by a chorus, 8a by another, and 8b by a third, and the whole series is repeated in vs. 9 and 10.

7. Dramatic Poetry in O T?

Strictly speaking, the utterances of the Prophets, so far as they express emotion of the most exalted type, would be classified as lyrics; but as they grow into an importance and form of their own, it will be proper to separate them into a class by themselves under the specific title of Prophetic Poetry. These utterances are in some respects analogous to the orations, or public discourses, of the Greek political leaders. But whereas the latter are framed in and occasioned by purely political settings, those of the Prophets were spontaneously produced under Divine inspiration, and worked out their own frame and setting according to circumstances, being of course always addressed to specific needs.

8. Prophetic Verse.

It goes without saying that these various types were at times blended, resulting in poetry that may be classified under one or another name, according as one takes into consideration one or another of the different aspects and characteristics as predominant. An adequate name for these is that suggested by Professor Briggs, "composite poetry" (cf. Briggs, Introd. to Holy Scripture).

9. Mixed Forms.

Poetic forms, like standards of excellence, differ very widely among different peoples. But there can be no true poetry without some effort at cadence and musical expression, i.e., versification. Among the Hebrews it appears that versification was aimed at mainly in two ways, i.e., parallelism and accent. Parallelism has been called the great formative principle of Hebrew poetry. The use of it in the O T was first brought into view with some measure of fulness by Bp. Lowth (De Sacr. Poesi. Hebr. XIX, 1753). He called attention to three kinds: (1) Synonymous parallelism, (2) antithetical parallelism, (3) synthetical parallelism. Later investigators have discovered three others, i.e.: (4) introverted parallelism (Bp. Jebb), (5) emblematic or comparative parallelism, and (6) climactic parallelism, in which the last word of each line becomes the first of the next. The use of parallelism satisfies the instinct for symmetry. It divides the expression into parts, and balances these one with another, creating a correspondence between them. At the same time it is a great help to the memory in the committing and repetition of what has been written.

10. Versification. Parallelism.

Parallelism, however, only establishes symmetry in the construction of sentences or clauses. Hebrew poetry went further than this in introducing rhythm into the clauses themselves. Just how this was accomplished has been brought to light by the investigations of Ley and Briggs, made independently and simultaneously. These investigations show that it was not the quantity of the vowels but the natural accent of the words, including, in rarer cases, secondary accents in longer words, that were taken into account in securing rhythm in Hebrew poetry. This was facilitated by that peculiarity of the Hebrew language that makes the grouping of words of one syllable possible, and thus affords a considerable freedom to the versifier in grouping accents.

11. Rhythm.

The metrical unit, therefore, in Hebrew poetry was furnished by counting the accented syllables of the clause. The further question whether the unaccented syllables were also counted has been answered by Bickell in the affirmative, who also holds that only one unaccented syllable must follow or precede the accented one. In such a case only iambic or trochaic measures are possible. As against this, Ley and Briggs contend that only the accented syllables were counted, allowing of dactylic and anapestic measures. The length of the measures thus constructed was variable. Most common is the trimeter distich, or measure consisting of 3+3 accents. Josephus calls this the hexameter. It is the prevailing measure in Job. The tetrameter distich or measure of 4+4 accents is also common, especially in the Prophets. The shorter dimeter distich of 2+2 accents is rare. By dropping one of the accents in the second member of the trimeter distich the measure 3+2 was developed, and has been called by some scholars the pentameter. This seems to have found favor, especially where a highly wrought state of feeling was struggling for expression. It is the prevalent measure in Jeremiah (cf. also Is 40 1-4, 9-11; Ps 23, 27 1-6). Budde has called this the qīnāh, "dirge," from its occurrence in La. But the theory has not found universal acceptance (cf. Duhm in EB and Briggs, Introd. to Holy Scripture). See also PROVERBS, BOOK OF, § 3.

12. Meter.

The arrangement of these measures in strophes or stanzas, in spite of the controversy on the subject, is put beyond doubt by the frequent occurrence of refrains at regular intervals in certain poems. Babylonian and Egyptian poetry also have clearly marked strophical arrangements, and it is not improbable that they influenced Hebrew methods of composition. The simplest and commonest strophe in Hebrew is constituted by the doubling of the distich (so in Ex ch. 15). When this strophe is doubled, the larger strophe of eight lines is made up: and by the addition of another or by putting three strophes of four lines together, the strophe of twelve lines is obtained (cf. Is 9 8 ff., where the refrain shows this construction). The refrain of two lines additional brings the great strophe of fourteen lines into view, which is as far as now known the longest in use in Hebrew poetry, and is to be found in Job ch. 28 and Am 1 3–2 10.

13. Strophe.

Rime is only occasionally used by the Hebrew poets. In Ps 105 it has been put to good service in heightening the effect of the expression. Rime, however, is of the nature of word-play or word-painting, and it never attained in Hebrew the importance given it in Arabic, where its constant use necessitated the elaboration of a set of rules to govern it. In Pss 6 and 110, and especially in Is chs. 24–27, word-play of the nature of rime is used with somewhat of the realism of modern music.

14. Rime.

Acrostics were another artifice to which the Hebrews resorted to heighten the effect of poetic expression. In one case, the author of verses has succeeded in weaving his name into them (Pedaiah, Ps 25 22, 34 23). Of more frequent occurrence is the alphabetic poem in which each verse or measure begins with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet (Ps 25 34; La chs. 1, 2, 3, and 4). Ps 119 consists of 22 sections, each section constructed upon the plan of eight successive measures or verses beginning with the same letter of the alphabet, all being arranged in the regular order of the Hebrew letters.

POLL: As a noun the term polls is used to render the pl. of gulgoleth, 'skulls,' 'heads,' as 'round' (Nu 1 2, 18, 20, 22, 3 47; I Ch 23 3, 24) in the sense of individuals, when numbering a people; as a verb the AV has "poll" for (1) gāzaz (Mic 1 16) in the sense of making the head round, by 'shaving' off the hair, as a sign of mourning; ARV reads "cut off the hair." (2) gālaḥ, to 'shave' the hair (II S 14 26, "cut off" ARV). (3) kāṣaṣ (only Ezk 44 20, "cut off" ARV). (4) qātsats, 'to cut off' (Jer 9 26 [25], 25 23, 49 32; "polled" ERV). In these passages the AV "utmost corners" is due evidently to a misunderstanding of the Heb.

POLLUX, pȯl'ux. See Ships and Navigation, § 2.

POMEGRANATE, pȯm'gran-ẹt or pum'gran-ẹt. See Palestine, § 21.

POMMEL, pum'el: The Heb. gullāh (rendered "pommel," II Ch 4 12 f. AV) refers to the bowl- or globe-shaped part of the capitals of the two brazen pillars of the Temple (cf. RV, and also I K 7 41 f.).

E. E. N.

PONDS: A term found only in Ex 7 19 RV ("pools" AV), rendering miqweh, 'a collection' of waters (in artificial cisterns, reservoirs, etc.). In the same verse the AV "ponds" (=RV "pools") renders the Heb. 'ăgām, 'stagnant water' (left by the receding Nile). On Is 19 10 (AV) cf. RV. See also Pool.

E. E. N.

PONTIUS, pȯn'ti-us or pȯn'shi-us. See Pilate.

PONTUS, pȯn'tus. See Asia Minor, § 14.

POOL, POND: Several Heb. words are thus rendered in EV (1) 'ăgām denoted especially, though not always, a collection of stagnant water (Ex 8 5; Is 14 23), which was apparently contrasted with (2) a miqweh or 'gathering together' (cf. Gn 1 10; Lv 11 36) of water in a storage-pond (Ex 7 19). (3) An artificial reservoir was commonly called a b'rēkhāh (Arab. birket, N T κολυμβήθρα, Jn 5 2 ff., 9 7 ff.). These reservoirs were supplied with water by surface drainage, by springs, or, more rarely, by a conduit from a distant source. The smaller pools were usually rectangular excavations lined with cement. The largest, like 'Solomon's Pools' near Bethlehem (cf. Ec 2 6), were constructed by damming up some narrow valley. The Bible mentions particularly the pools at Gibeon (II S 2 13), Hebron (II S 4 12), Samaria (I K 22 38), Heshbon (Song 7 4), and Jerusalem (q.v., § 13 f.).

POOR: A variety of words is used both in the Heb. and Gr. to characterize those in need. The most important are the following: (1) rāsh (ptcpl. of rūsh, to which the N T terms πένης, πτωχός, correspond), which is the distinctive word to mark poverty in the common use of the term (I S 18 23; II S 12 3 f.; Pr 10 4, 13 8, etc.). (2) 'ebhyōn (represented in the N T by πένης, πτωχός, ἐνδεής) denotes one who is in want either of means or of help, and so may be translated either "poor" or "afflicted" (Ex 23 6, 11, etc.). (3) dāl (represented in the N T by ἀσθενής, πένης, πτωχός, ταπεινός), which signifies 'thin,' 'reduced,' 'feeble,' and describes not only those who are literally in want, but also those who are reduced in social condition, oppressed, or miserable (Gn 41 19; Ex 23 3, etc.). (4) 'ānī (in the N T πένης, πτωχός, πραΰς, ταπεινός), translated in our English versions mostly by "afflicted" or "poor," denotes one who is 'miserable' more perhaps from ill treatment and oppression than from actual poverty, though, of course, the latter kind of misery is included. The three terms 'ebhyōn, dāl, and 'ānī are used with a religious connotation, i.e., while those who are described (particularly by the term 'ānī) are in some form of wretchedness, they may be looked upon as the godly, the servants of Jehovah. This use of the term appears in the Psalms in the recurring phrase "the poor and needy," which refers to those who elsewhere are called "the godly," "the righteous." (See Driver in HDB, vol. iv, p. 19.) One other word requires attention and this is 'ānāw, which signifies humble-minded toward God, and is usually rendered "meek" (represented in the N T by ταπεινός, πτωχός, πνεύματι, πραΰς). It is in the prophetic and poetic books of the O T that these words appear with a wider range of meaning than that of mere material want (Ps 10 17; Is 61 1, etc.).

1. Terms Used to Describe the Poor.

As at all times and among all peoples, so in Israel the poor were always to be found. They were not forgotten in the provisions of the Law, and the spirit of true religion was set forth as one of kindliness and helpfulness. The Law, in the interests of the poor, provided for the right of gleaning (Lv 19 9, 10; Dt 24 19, 21); for the prohibition of usury

2. Treatment of the Poor.

(Lv 25 35, 37); for portions from the tithes to be shared by the poor after the Levites (Dt 14 28); for the daily payment of wages (Lv 19 13), and by other like regulations for relieving the hopelessness of poverty. According to Israelitic law, no Jew could lose his freedom through poverty, and there came to him stated periods of "release" a time when he could redeem his property (Lv 25 39, 47). Selfishness and greed once and again defeated the claims of righteousness in these matters, and the Prophets were earnest in their warnings and rebukes. The spirit of the O T is exalted in its attitude toward the worthy poor. Proverbs and Ecclesiastes have much to say in regard to the poverty which comes through wilful folly, but they equally set forth the blessings of him who helps the needy and honors God in a wise charity. In the N T Church the poor became from the first the object of earnest care (Ac 4 34 ff., 6 1; Ro 15 26; Gal 2 10; Ja 2 2-6). See also MEEK, MEEKNESS. J. S. R.

POPLAR. See PALESTINE, § 21.

PORATHA, pō-rē'thā or pōr'a-tha (פּוֹרָתָא, pōrāthā', a Persian word): One of the sons of Haman (Est 9 8). E. E. N.

PORCH: In Jg 3 23 the word misdᵉrōn, rendered "porch," is of uncertain meaning, and it is not known to what part of the house it refers. In Mk 14 68 the προαύλιον is probably the 'vestibule' of the αὐλή, or 'court,' situated at the πυλών, or 'gateway' ("poreh" in Mt 26 71). The word στοά (Jn 5 2, 10 23; Ac 3 11, 5 12) means a covered colonnade protecting those walking, or standing, from the sun and rain. See also TEMPLE, §§ 10, 23, 25, and SOLOMON, § 5. E. E. N.

PORCUPINE. See PALESTINE, § 24.

PORT: This term is used once (Neh 2 13 AV) for shaʿar, which elsewhere in AV (and RV here) is rendered "gate." C. S. T.

PORTER: The rendering of shōʿēr (Aram. tārāʿ, Ezr 7 24). In II S 18 26, II K 7 10 it refers to the 'gatekeeper' of a city gate. The former passage we should perhaps emend so as to read "at the gate" for "unto the porter." In II S 4 6, it is used of a doorkeeper (female) of a house. Elsewhere the term refers to the gatekeepers in the Sanctuary. It is often used in Ch, Ezr, Neh, and usually rendered "porter" in AV, but RV has "doorkeeper" in several passages in Ch (I Ch 15 18, 16 38, etc.). In Ezr and Neh the doorkeepers and singers are distinguished from the Levites (cf. Ezr 2 41 ff.; Neh 7 44 ff., etc.), but in Ch they are called Levites (I Ch 23 1 ff., etc.). According to I Ch 23 5 the porters numbered 4,000; they were "sons" of Korah and Merari (I Ch 26 19). C. S. T.

PORTION: The rendering of (1) ʿāḥūz, 'what is laid hold on' (Nu 31 30 AV, but "one drawn out of" RV). (2) dābhār, 'thing,' 'affair' (II Ch 31 16 AV, also EVmg.; but "duty" RV; Job 26 14 AV and RVmg., but "a small whisper" RV). (3) ḥebhel, 'line' (Jos 17 5, 14, 19 9, "part" AV, "line" RVmg.; Ezk 47 13). (4) ḥēleq, ḥelqāh (Aram. ḥᵉlāq, Dn 4 15; Ezr 4 16), 'share,' especially in the division of inheritance (Gn 14 24, 31 14; "Naboth's portion," II K 9 21). (5) ḥōq, denoting the orderly or lawful share, as if determined by 'statute' (ḥōq) (Gn 47 22 AV and RVmg.; Pr 31 15; "tax" RV). (6) maḥalōqeth, 'section,' 'subdivision' (Ezk 48 29). (7) mānāḥ, menath, 'part' (I S 1 4; Ps 63 10). (8) pī-shenayim, 'mouth of two,' i.e., enough to fill the mouth of two persons = double share (Dt 21 17; II K 2 9). (9) shᵉkhem, 'shoulder' (Gn 48 22, "mountain-slope" RVmg., a significant way of denoting a piece of land in a hilly country). (10) pathbag, 'delicacy' (Aram., Dn 1 8 f.). (11) μέρος, 'part' (Mt 24 51; Lk 15 12). (12) σιτόμετρον, 'measure of wheat' (Lk 12 42). In EVV "portion" is used either absolutely in the sense of 'part,' as of a whole, or relatively, of what may fall to one out of a common mass, such as a meal (Est 9 19; Ps 63 10), or patrimony (Lk 15 12). In the latter case, the exact sense is that of 'share.' From this usage arises a more specific one, viz., since a share in an ancestral estate is regarded with feelings of peculiar appreciation, and since rights in it are inalienable, "portion" expresses Israel's rights and privileges in its God ("He is the portion of his people," Ps 119 57, 142 5; Jer 51 19; La 3 24). The obverse of this is also true, i.e., Israel is J"s portion (Dt 32 9; Zec 2 12). (Cf. also "portion of a weak man," Job 20 29, 27 13; Is 17 14.) A. C. Z.

POSSESSION. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 8.

POST: The rendering of the Heb. rūts, 'runner,' which, in such passages as II Ch 30 6, 10, Est 3 13, etc., Job 9 25, Jer 51 31, denotes the swift messengers used to carry royal messages. In the Persian service they were mounted on the swiftest horses, and were noted for their speed (cf. Herodotus, 8 98). See also HOUSE, § 6. E. E. N.

POT. See FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 11.

POTIPHAR, pot'i-far (פּוֹטִיפַר, pōṭīphār, abbreviated from "Potiphera," q.v.): The name of the "officer of Pharaoh's, the captain of the guard" ("chief of executioners" RVmg.), who bought Joseph from the Midianites (Gn 37 36, 39 1). The name of the office he occupied (sar haṭṭabbāḥīm) is evidently given not in its exact Egyptian form, for it does not correspond with any one of the numerous court positions known to be attached to Egyptian royalty, but in its equivalent in Palestinian and E. Semitic terminology. The Heb. term sāriṣ (rendered "officer") means eunuch; but Potiphar was a married man (Gn 39 7 ff.), and, accordingly, the word is probably used in a general sense not involving sexual disability, which is sometimes the case, though married eunuchs are not unknown to history (cf. Burkhardt, Arabia, I, 290; Ebers, Aegypten, p. 299). A. C. Z.

POTIPHERAH, po-tif'ē-ra (פּוֹטִי פֶרַע, pōṭī pheraʿ): Priest of On, Joseph's father-in-law (Gn 41 45, 50). The Egyptian meaning of the word is "he whom Ra gave." With the omission of the article (in Egyptian) it becomes Potiphar. A. C. Z.

POTSHERD, pot'sherd": The rendering of the Heb. ḥeres, 'a piece of pottery' either a whole piece or its broken fragments: the latter in Job 2 8 41 30; Is 30 14 ("sherd"); Ezk 23 34; the former in other instances. See also POTTERY. E. E. N.

POTTAGE. See Food and Food Utensils, § 3.

POTTER, POTTERY: From the earliest historic times pottery has been made in Palestine. Excavations have brought to light many specimens, showing the usual development from the more crude to the more finished products as time advanced. Most of the vessels used in the Hebrew household were made of pottery. Their frailty is used by the O T writers to illustrate human helplessness before God's power (Ps 2 9; Is 30 14; Jer 19 11) and the power of the potter over his clay to illustrate the Divine sovereignty (Is 64 8; Jer 18 2 ff.; Ro 9 20-24). See Artisan Life, §§ 7–9, and Plates I and II of Household Utensils. E. E. N.

POTTER'S FIELD. See Jerusalem, § 46.

POUND. See Money, § 9, and Weights and Measures, § 9.

POWER: This term renders Heb. and Gr. words as follows: (1) 'ēl, 'strength' (in the phrase "it is in the power of my [thine, their] hand," Gn 31 29; Pr 3 27; Mic 2 1). (2) gebhūrāh, 'might' (a poetic word, Ps 21 13, 71 18, 145 11; Job 41 12, "strength" RV). (3) zerōa', 'arm' (Ps 79 11). (4) ḥāyil, 'force' (I S 9 1, "valor" RV; Ezr 4 23). (5) yādh, 'hand' (Dt 32 36). (6) kōaḥ, 'strength' (Gn 31 6; Ex 15 6). (7) kaph, 'palm' (Hab 2 9, "hand" RV). (8) memshālāh, 'dominion' (II Ch 32 9). (9) 'az, 'ōz (Gn 49 3; Ps 62 11). (10) 'izzūz, 'strong one' (Is 43 17, "mighty man" RV). (11) shilṭōn, 'authority' (Ec 8 4, 8). (12) ta'atsmōth, 'substance' (Ps 68 35). (13) tōqeph, 'energy' (Est 10 2). (14) 'ēl yādh, 'power of hand' (Neh 5 5). (15) ἀρχή, 'rule,' 'authority' (Lk 20 20, "rule" RV). (16) δύναμις, τὸ δυνατόν, 'power' (Mt 24 30; Lk 9 1, etc.). (17) ἐξουσία, 'authority' (Mt 9 6; Rev 2 26, "authority" RV; Ro 9 21; Jn 1 12, "right" RV). (18) ἰσχύς, 'force' (II Th 1 9; II P 2 11, "might" RV). (19) κράτος (Eph 1 19; He 2 14). (20) The word "power" sometimes appears without a definite equivalent in the original, but as a necessary complement of the thought as in Rev 13 14 f. AV, "had power to," etc., where RV more literally renders "it was given him to," etc. A. C. Z.

PRÆTORIAN GUARD, PRÆTORIUM. See Pretorium.

PRAISE: The term "praise," as descriptive of sacred utterance, has two uses which are usually blended, though sometimes distinguished. The first of these regards the content of the utterance, denoting such expression toward God as is highly charged with jubilant sentiments like adoration and thanksgiving. The second regards rather the manner of the utterance, denoting the poetic and musical formulas in which these sentiments are liturgically embodied. In the first usage "praise" is more or less contrasted with "prayer" in its narrow sense (humiliation and supplication). In the second usage "praise" is sometimes extended so as to cover any musical form of worship, even if not Godward in direction or not jubilant in tone.

1. Preliminary Definitions.

The Biblical concept of "praise" is chiefly conveyed by the frequent use, especially in the Psalms and the later histories and prophecies, of such words as hālal, 'praise,' yādhāh, 'give thanks,' shābhaḥ, 'praise,' bārak, 'bless,' zāmar, 'sing praise,' 'ānāh, 'sing,' shīr, 'sing,' rānan, 'shout,' gīl, 'rejoice,' etc., with their derivatives. The exact shades of meaning in some of these are uncertain, and indeed do not seem to be consistently observed (hālal apparently contains the notion of making brilliant, yādhāh that of extending the hands in protestation, bārak that of kneeling, zāmar that of playing an instrument, 'ānāh that of antiphony, gīl that of circling in a dance, etc.). Evidently the Hebrew idea of social worship included the excited and vociferous outpouring of feeling in words and tones, in which the conspicuous mental elements were the objective laudation or magnifying of God and the declaration of subjective loyalty and zeal on the worshiper's part. In the N T the principal terms are εὐλογεῖν, αἰνεῖν, ἐπαινεῖν, and ὑμνεῖν and their derivatives, emphasizing the ideas of 'eulogy,' 'glorification,' and 'song.'

2. References in the O T.

The distribution of the O T references to "praise" in these technical senses suggests that the practise was chiefly developed from the time of the Exile onward. For example, hālal (relating to God) occurs about seventy-five times in Pss, twenty in Ch, five in Ezr and Neh, and seven elsewhere—all probably late. The Hebrew name of the Psalter is t'hillīm, 'praises.' One of the types or ceremonies of sacrifice was the tōdhāh, commonly rendered 'thanksgiving,' but probably more a protestation of loyalty than of gratitude. A frequent ejaculation is hall'lu-Yāh, 'Praise Yāh' (see Hallelujah). It would seem, therefore, that with the development of a fuller cultus came the necessity for these poetic and musical elements. Praise was essentially a social act, performed normally in the Temple (or synagogue) as a part of the stated ritual. (For many references as to details, see under Music.) The Psalter takes its name from the fact that most of its contents were formulas for such use, though the difference in texture between its poems is considerable (see under Psalms, §§ 4 ff.). Characteristic psalms of praise are 24 7-10, 28 6-7, 47, 67, 92, 93, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 113, 116, 117, 118, 145, 148, 150, with many more in which reflective or historical elements are interwoven (such as 18, 46, 65, 103, 104, 107, etc.). Books IV and V are particularly strong in this regard, but praiseful introductions, conclusions, refrains, and episodes occur in all parts of the collection. Notable examples of poems of praise outside the Psalter are the Song of the Exodus (Ex ch. 15), that of Deborah and Barak (Jg ch. 5), that of Hannah (I S ch. 2), that of 'David' (II S ch. 22 = Ps 18), that of Jonah (Jon ch. 2), and that of Habakkuk (Hab ch. 3)—with the poems preserved in the N T (Lk chs. 1–2). Although the materials of some of these are apparently early, they all have been at least reworked in the style of the Psalter. The same praiseful spirit is clear in the many doxologies (see § 4, below) scattered through the N T (Gal 1 5; Ro 1 25, 9 5, 11 33-36, 16 25-27; II Co 11 31; Ph 4 20; Eph 3 20-21; I Ti 1 17, 6 15-16; II Ti 4 18; I P 4 11, 5 11; II P 3 18; Jude vs. 24-25; He 13 21; Rev 1 5-6, 4 8, 11, 5 9-10, 12, 13, 7 10, 12, 11 17, 15 3-4, 16 5-7, 19 1-2, 6-7).

So familiar are most of the classical passages of Biblical praise that the many aspects and implications of their thought are not always clearly perceived. Their great and most essential topic is the infinite nature of God, especially His supremacy, holiness, truth, justice, and wisdom.

3. Favorite Topics and Sentiments. These regal attributes are dwelt upon with such singular richness of feeling and vigor of expression that the Biblical phraseology is a treasury from which all liturgies have drawn constantly. Interwoven with these ascriptions of power and moral perfection are abounding recognitions of God's goodness and mercy in the constitution of the world, in the course of national history, and in personal experience. Adoration thus passes over into thanksgiving. Further, the thought of what God is and how He manifests Himself awakens exclamations of enthusiasm and confidence in the soul that feels itself the chosen object of His care. Hence out of adoration and thanksgiving grow exultation, loyalty, and zeal. And all these bring with them a greater or less degree of trust and assurance for the future. If God is everlasting and unchangeable, then beneath His care all life, present and to come, is safe and full of peace.

4. Doxologies. Literally, a doxology is an ascription or acclamation of 'glory' to God, but usually extended to cover various liturgical-concluding formulas of adoration and thanksgiving. As a rule, doxologies include some phrase like 'forever,' emphasizing the eternity of God and of His praise, and they are customarily accompanied by the response 'Amen.' Doxologies differ from benedictions in that they declare or exhort to the veneration of God instead of invoking blessing or favor from Him. Striking illustrations in the O T are the doxologies appended to the 'books' of the Psalter (see PSALMS) and those in the N T Epistles and Apocalypse (see § 3, above). Several Psalms conclude in a doxologic strain (as 7 17, 18 49, 21 13, 24 7-10, 30 12b, 45 17, 52 9, 57 5, 11 [refrain], 79 13, 145 21), and several begin in a similar way (as 9 1-2, 18 1-2, 29 1-2, etc.). Ejaculations like "Hallelujah" (q.v.), "Blessed be God" (Ps 68 35), "Bless the Lord, O my soul" (Ps 103 1, 22, 104 1, 35) and "His loving-kindness forever" (Ps 118 29, 136 1-26, etc.) belong to the same general class. The Gloria of the Angels (Lk 2 14) and the ascriptions of the Heavenly Hosts in the Apocalypse are notable. All these have been extensively utilized in Christian liturgies. W. S. P.

PRAYER: In every religion that has a clear conception of a personal God there will be attempts at verbal and vocal intercourse with Him.

1. Preliminary Definitions. Such intercourse is prayer in the general sense. It is usual, however, to distinguish between "prayer" proper, which is in prose and spoken, and "praise," which is poetic and sung (see PRAISE). It is usual, also, to draw a line between conversational or 'ejaculatory' prayer, which is closely mingled with common activities, and 'formal' prayer, which implies some withdrawal from such activities and a greater degree of rhetorical order and finish. The most common O T term for praying is pālal (Hithp.) and for prayer, tephīllāh, the root-meaning of which is disputed. It seems to contain some notion of 'cutting' or 'separating,' whence come conjectures that it may suggest an old Semitic custom of self-mutilation in petition, or that of dividing and arranging a sacrifice, or even the habit of self-scrutiny in the Divine presence. Most of the other O T words suggest entreaty or supplication, which was the predominant element of the general Hebrew conception, though the formal prayers preserved contain many other elements. The commonest N T word is εὔχεσθαι, which seems to emphasize the notion of 'calling aloud,' of vociferous appeal, while in other frequent terms, like δεῖσθαι and αἰτεῖν, 'petition' is uppermost. For the 'giving of thanks' the standard term is εὐχαριστεῖν.

2. Summary of References. The whole Bible, but especially the O T, abounds in references to the practise and the subject of prayer. The O T histories and prophecies frequently represent men as speaking freely to God, as He does to them (as in the stories of Gn chs. 3–4; Ex chs. 3–4; Is ch. 6; Jer ch. 1, etc.). Most of these are simply cases of the literary anthropomorphism which is a familiar characteristic of Hebrew style. But the practise of deliberate prayer is also extensively noted or implied (see § 3, below). There are many extended prayers, which, though embedded in the narratives, are very highly formulated, as if shaped by mature liturgical practise, so that they seem to be samples of the styles belonging to public worship (see examples below). In the N T the Gospels offer something concerning the prayers of Jesus, with some specific teachings from Him, and in Paul's writings especially the purport or sum of his habitual prayers is often indicated. Under "prayer" may also be grouped various formulas of benediction, malediction, greeting, and farewell that are couched in devout language

3. Places, Times, and Attitudes. In early times the place of prayer was probably wherever sacrifice was offered, the two forms of worship being closely interdependent (Gn 12 8, 26 25, etc.). But while the relation between the two was not forgotten, they were later often separated. Thus in the Temple ritual it is not clear that there was much public prayer by the priests, though private prayer by the onlookers was customary (Lk 1 10). Naturally for the devout the Temple became the place of prayer par excellence, toward which, if at a distance, the face should be turned (I K 8 30, 33, etc.; Ps 5 7; Is 56 7; Mk 11 17; Ac 3 1), and its site has since retained this significance. But as synagogues developed, they also became "houses of prayer," since in their services prayers replaced the sacrifices of the Temple. From their usages the first Jewish Christians undoubtedly patterned their social services (Ac 2 42, 6 4). The προσευχή, place of prayer, at Philippi (Ac 16 13), was probably not a building, but simply a retired spot in the open air, such as Jews often used in places where there was no synagogue. Private prayer, of course, might occur anywhere, as within a chamber (Dn 6 10), on the housetop (Ac 10 9), or at a street-corner (Mt 6 5). The times of sacrifice at the Temple—morning, noon, and evening—naturally gave rise to similar times for prayer, though of these not much mention is made (Dn 6 11; Ps 55 17, 141 2; Ac 3 1, 10 30). The instinctive conception of prayer is reflected in the bodily attitudes adopted, all of which imply respect, humility, or eagerness, such as standing (Hannah, I S 1 26; Solomon, I K 8 22; the Pharisee, Lk 18 11), kneeling (Ezra, Ezr 9 5; Jesus, Lk 22 41; Stephen, Ac 7 60), or bowing toward the ground, and even prostration (Eliezer, Gn 24 26; Elijah, I K 18 42; the people, Neh 8 6). In the first two attitudes the hands were usually extended upward (Ps 141 2) or spread out (Ps 143 6).

4. Some Special Types.

One of the earlier types of prayer was that of "inquiring"—seeking some token as to the wisdom of an action or the truth of an opinion —which is common in primitive stages of religion generally. It is not clear how the reply to such inquiries was usually obtained — probably through some form of lot. Besides many instances that are explicit (Eliezer, Gn 24 12-14; the people, Jg 1 1, 20 18, 23, 28; Gideon, Jg 6 36 f., 39; Saul, I S 14 37, 41, 45; David, I S 23 10-12, 30 8; II S 2 1, 5 19, etc.), it is not unlikely that a similar sense is hidden under many vague references to "seeking Jehovah." The Hebrew mind was naively ready to turn to God in prayer at all sorts of practical junctures, as to a protector and friend. Very notable are the prayers attributed to Jeremiah. The longer examples (Jer 10 23-25, 12 1-4, 14 19-22, 15 15-18, 17 12-18, 18 19-23, 20 7-13, 32 17-25), besides many brief ejaculations, seem organically part of the narrative in which they stand, though the last may have been editorially expanded in accordance with liturgical usage. It is not clear whether certain other cases in the prophecies should be classified here or under the next head (Is 63 7–64 12; Mic 7 14-20; Hab 1 2-17). The question of their exact interpretation depends upon the theory of the structure of the books in which they appear. Scattered through the histories are rather numerous prayers, often marked by great richness of form and contents. Among these striking examples are Jacob's petition when in fear of Esau (Gn 32 9-12), the intercessions of Moses (Ex 32 11-13, 31-32; Dt 9 26-29; Nu 14 13-19, etc.), David's reception of the promise regarding Solomon (II S 7 18-29; I Ch 17 16-27), Solomon's petition for wisdom (I K 3 6-9; II Ch 1 8-10), and his great prayers at the opening of the Temple (I K 8 23-53, 56-60; II Ch 6 4-6, 14-42), Hezekiah's appeal against Sennacherib (II K 19 15-19; Is 37 16-20), the confessions of Ezra (Ezr 7 6-15), Nehemiah (Neh 1 5-11) and the people (Neh 9 5-38), and Daniel's thanksgiving and intercession (Dn 2 20-23, 9 4-19), besides many similar passages in the Apocrypha (as To 3 2-6; Wis ch. 9, etc.). It is evident that most, if not all, of these are to be ascribed to the editorial period in which the various books took their final shape; but even so, they offer striking evidence of the literary development of liturgical prayer in the age of Judaism. This remark applies also to the traditional formulas of the modern synagogue. Besides all these, there are numerous prayers in poetical form, both in the poetical books, like Job, Psalms, and Ecclesiasticus, and embedded in the histories and prophecies. Several of the Psalms are called "prayers" (Pss 17, 85, 90, 102, 142, and cf. 72 20 and Hab 3 1), and the same term is often used in the text as if applying to the utterance in general (Job 16 17; Ps 61 1, etc.). See PRAISE.

5. Effect Upon Christian Usages.

The forms of thought and expression found in the prayers of the O T have had an incalculable influence upon all Christian usages, both because they are marked by a singularly elevated and comprehensive spirit of worship, and because their literary embodiment is full of dignity, warmth, and richness. If they are carefully examined, they are found to illustrate more or less all the main constituents of prayer in general—humiliation, profession or declaration, supplication (including intercession), thanksgiving, and adoration. Every historic liturgy has been powerfully influenced by them, as well as the myriad utterances of free prayer.

6. Jesus' Habit and Teaching.

The Gospels often mention Jesus' habit of prayer, usually in connection with important junctures in His ministry, as at the Baptism (Lk 3 21), before the first preaching tour (Mk 1 35; Lk 5 16), when the Twelve were set apart (Lk 6 12), at the feeding of the 5,000 (Mt 14 19, 23; Mk 6 41, 46; Lk 9 16; Jn 6 11, 23), at the feeding of the 4,000 (Mt 15 36; Mk 8 6), at Cæsarea Philippi and before the Transfiguration (Lk 9 18, 28-29), at the return of the Seventy (Mt 11 25-26; Lk 10 21), as the occasion for a teaching (Lk 11 1), at the raising of Lazarus (Jn 11 41-42), in blessing the children (Mt 19 13; Mk 10 16), regarding the Holy Spirit (Jn 14 16), at the Last Supper (Mt 26 26-27; Mk 14 22-23; Lk 22 17, 19, 32; I Co 11 24-25), in the Intercessory Prayer (Jn ch. 17), at the Agony (Mt 26 36, 39, 42, 44; Mk 14 32, 35-36, 39; Lk 22 41-44), and on the Cross (Lk 23 34; Mt 27 46; Mk 15 34; Lk 23 46). Though all these references may not have exactly the same historic texture, we surely infer from them that prayer was a frequent feature of Jesus' daily life, yielding an incessant refreshing of His spirit. Among the recorded teachings of Jesus are several concerning prayer, almost wholly upon its supplicatory side, as, for example, regarding simplicity (Mt 6 5-8), regarding God's fatherly attitude (Mt 7 7-11, 21 22; Lk 11 5-13, 18 1-8), regarding unity in asking (Mt 18 19), urging intercession for enemies (Mt 5 44; Lk 6 28; Mk 11 24-25), and for helpers (Mt 9 38; Lk 10 2), besides the suggested model, or Lord's Prayer (see below), and the striking promises to those who stand in perfect fellowship with Him and ask "in his name" (Jn 14 13-14, 15 7, 16, 16 23-24, 26). These passages differ somewhat in significance. None is more weighty than this: "If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ask whatsoever ye will, and it shall be done unto you" (Jn 15 7), if the force of the conditional clause be duly noted. The so-called Lord's Prayer appears twice (Mt 6 9-15; Lk 11 1-4), in two somewhat different forms. Though its phraseology was derived from current Jewish usages, the collocation of thoughts was new, and we must believe that Jesus filled the familiar words with a fresh depth of meaning. Just what was His intention as to the use of the formula by His followers is disputed, since οὕτως οὖν, "after this manner," may mean 'in these precise words' or 'in this general style' or 'with this spirit.' From the variations in the two texts and the striking paucity of clear references to the prayer in the rest of the N T, we infer that no exact verbal prescription was meant. See also LORD'S PRAYER.

7. In Apostolic Usage. Among the early Christian converts the habit of social prayer is recorded as a matter of course (Ac 1 14, 24, 2 42, 4 31, 6 4, 6, 12 5, 12, 13 3, 14 23, 21 5; I Co 11 4-14), besides being implied in many exhortations. The use of prayer is attributed to the Apostolic leaders, especially to Peter, John, and Paul (Ac 3 1, 6 4, 8 15, 9 11, 40, 10 9, 11 5, 16 13, 16, 25, 20 36, 22 17, 28 8). In Paul's Epistles are extensive suggestions of how broad and deep was the scope of his personal thanksgiving and supplications on behalf of those among whom he worked (I Th 1 2-3, 2 13, 3 9-13; II Th 1 3, 11-12, 2 13-14, 16; I Co 1 4-8; II Co 1 3-4; Ro 1 8-10, 10 1, 11 33-36; Ph 1 3-11; Col 1 3-13; Eph 1 3, 15-21, 3 14-21; Phm vs. 4-6; I Ti 1 12, 17; II Ti 1 3-5, besides many brief references). The injunctions about prayer in the Apostolic writings are also abundant and urgent (I Th 5 17-18; II Th 3 1-2; I Co 11 2-16, 14 2-17; II Co 1 11; Ro 8 26-27, 12 12, 15 30-32; Ph 4 6; Col 4 2-4; Eph 6 18-20; I Ti 2 1-2, 8; Ja 1 5-8, 4 2-8, 5 13-18; I Jn 3 21-22, 5 14-16). From all these it is plain how vital and fruitful the exercise of prayer was known to be in the early stages of Christianity's development. To this the number and character of the formal salutations and benedictions distributed through the N T add further instructive witness, though the date of some of them may be later than that of the documents with which they appear. PRAYER, LORD'S. See LORD'S PRAYER.

PRAYER, PLACE OF. See PRAYER, § 3.

PREACH, PREACHING: In Biblical usage these terms refer to the proclamation of ethical or religious truth. In this sense qārā', 'to call,' 'proclaim,' 'cry,' etc., is used frequently of the prophetic message (cf. Mic 3 5 of false prophets) in its various aspects, as denunciation (Jon 1 2), revelation of the Divine will (Jer 11 6), and Messianic promise (Is 61 1). It is used even of a political propagandum set forth by the Prophets (Neh 6 7). In two passages bāsar, 'to declare good news,' is found (Ps 68 11; Is 61 1). With the gradual disappearance of spoken prophecy during and after the Exile, qārā' came to be used of written messages (Zec 1 14), until finally, with the increased prominence of the written tōrāh and the disappearance of Hebrew as a spoken language, the function of the preacher became largely that of interpretation methurgemān; cf. Neh 8 8).

1. In the O T.

With the development of the synagogue, 'application' (derāshāh, lit. 'inquiry') as well as interpretation of the tōrāh became essential (Philo, De Septentario, ch. 6; Quod Omnis Probus, ch. 12). But preaching, especially in the sense of fervid appeal, had become a secondary matter.

2. In Later Judaism.

To the extent that the new era, beginning with the Baptist, was a revival of prophecy (Mt 11 9), preaching resumed its old character and meaning. Consequently, the terms κηρύσσειν, 'to proclaim as a herald,' and κήρυγμα, 'preaching,' are frequent in the N T. Jesus' mission was essentially one of 'proclamation' (Mk 1 14), of good tidings concerning the Kingdom of God (Mt 4 17). This is often expressed by εὐαγγελίζειν, 'to announce good news.' At the same time, He continued to "preach" or "teach" in the synagogues in the traditional manner indicated above (i.e., by reading, interpreting, and applying the Law and the Prophets, Mk 1 39; Lk 4 16 f.). The earliest Apostolic preaching was essentially prophetic in character, consisting of testimony concerning the Resurrection of Jesus and His early return for judgment (cf. Ac 2 32, 36; I Co 15 1 f.; I Th passim), which soon came to include the ethical implication of these facts (notably in Paul's preaching; cf. I Th 4 1 f.), indicated in such terms as εὐαγγελίζειν, καταγγέλλειν, 'to announce,' 'declare,' and λαλεῖν, 'to speak.' In the original custom of the early Church the preachers were those who had been witnesses (μάρτυρες) of what Jesus had said and done. With the spread of the gospel and the lapse of time, the office was taken up by others, especially those endowed with "the word of wisdom" and "of knowledge" (I Co 12 8). These formed a distinct order in the early Church, known as Prophets (cf. Eph 4 11), who with their office as preachers sometimes combined certain other functions of a predictive character (Ac 11 27). In the Pastoral Epistles and in the Didachē preaching seems to have become the distinctive function of the bishop (I Ti 3 2; Did. xv, 2). See also CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, §§ 6, 7. J. M. T

(3) tsāw, 'maxim' (Is 28 10), a specification of a general law made brief and easy for purposes of instruction. (4) ἐντολή, 'charge' (Mk 10 5; He 9 19 AV, "commandments" RV). A. C. Z.

PREDESTINATE, PREDESTINATION: These words are used in theological discussion for the doctrine that God has from eternity determined upon all those individual human beings who shall be saved by His grace. The word "predestinate" does not occur at all in the English of the O T and only four times in AV of the N T, where in RV it is replaced by the word "foreordain" (Gr. προορίζειν, Ro 8 29, 30; Eph 1 5, 11).

According to the school associated with the names of Augustine and Calvin, the idea of predestination is supposed to lie behind or above that of election (see ELECTION). The term 'election' stands for that act or process in time through which the grace of God reaches and grasps and does its effectual work upon communities (as Israel) and individuals; 'predestination' stands for that eternal purpose which was in the mind of God before time began. Already the whole program of the universe lay before that Mind, completely willed and foreseen in all its minutest details. The processes of time are but the realizing, objectively to God, of that absolutely perfect plan of them which proceeded from His will and was, as it were, subjectively foremirrored in His thought in eternity. This must include not only the quiver of every leaf but every sin of every soul, and the final destiny of each individual soul. That destiny God has willed eternally, whether it be salvation or destruction. The doctrine that the fate of the lost was irrevocably fixed in eternity is known in theology as the doctrine of preterition (passing over). In support of this general position appeal is made both to Scripture and to reason, and these sources of authority are applied to three main elements in the situation: (1) All who believe in God at all believe in His eternal power and wisdom as well as in His righteousness and love. He is the Being from whose will and plan the actual universe takes its rise. He can not be conceived of as ignorant of His own designs at any point, or as unable to fulfil them. Nor, on the other hand, can any fact or event be conceived as existing or occurring apart from His will; that would be simply a partial atheism. Moreover, the Scriptures fully reveal and attest this conception of God. Even the O T announces Him as the Creator of all, whose wisdom is the source of the universe and controller of all its events (Gn ch. 1; Pr 3 19, 20, 8 22-31; Ps 104 27-30; Jer 10 12; Is 40 12, 13), who thoroughly comprehends the inner life of man (I S 16 7; Ps 139; Jer 17 9, 10) and directs his whole course of experience (Job 5 11-15; Pss 90, 91; Pr 16 33). And all this is abundantly confirmed and illumined in the N T. The teaching of Jesus rests on the idea of God's complete sovereignty over nature and man (Mt chs. 5–7); and so it is with the Apostolic teaching. God is not to be pictured "acsi in specula sedens exspectaret fortuitos eventus" (Calvin). (2) The universal human consciousness is aware of a guilt it can not remove, a thraldom in sin which it can not break. This, too, is assumed, asserted, expounded throughout Scripture (see Sin). This carries with it the conviction that man can never gain any merit before God's righteousness. His only just desert is the extremity of punishment (Is 1 28; Ezk 18 4; Ro 3 9-20, 6 23, 7 24; I Jn 2 16, 17). If God were to destroy the whole race, the act would be a just one in view of man's universal sin. (3) But Scripture describes what man's reason could never have discovered, viz., the working of the redeeming grace of God: (a) This loving-mercy of the righteous Judge selected Abraham and his race after him as the first instruments of a glorious purpose. Throughout the O T we are made to see that God always takes the first step, always chooses the person whom He would use or bless, whether as prophet or king, or private saint, even a heathen king (Ezr 1 1; Is 44 28). Moreover, the rise of the Messianic hope means that God caused His ultimate purpose to be reflected in broken beams upon the hearts of His prophets and prophet bards. (b) The sending of Christ was predetermined in eternity (Eph 1 4; cf. Jn 17 24); the individual man in Christ had his place assigned him in the same eternal plan of God (Ro 8 29, 30, 9–11; Eph 1 4-11). There is nothing more fully and variously insisted on in the N T, or more constantly confirmed in the experience of believers than this, that salvation is the unmerited and gracious gift of God. Mercy from its very nature never can be deserved, never can be earned, never can be explained. Its root lies always deep in the mystery of His character and of His purpose who grants the mercy. Even the atonement which reveals, secures, and pledges this mercy to those who are "the called according to His purpose" does not explain the grace from which it sprang, nor confer any right, even on "the called," which is outside of that grace itself. (c) But further, this mercy which is eternally foreordained can not be defeated in time. That the grace of God is irresistible is also said to be witnessed alike by the N T and the universal Christian consciousness. The very act of faith in which this grace is realized is self-abandonment to the final power of God and is itself His gift (for which Eph 2 8, with questionable exegesis, is usually cited). If the grace is irresistible through which the elect one passes into the life of Divine fellowship, the doctrine of final perseverance follows with an inevitable necessity.

The doctrine which has been sketched above took its rise in the mind of Augustine, who was stimulated to formulate and develop it by the

2. Opposing Systems. positions taken by one who is known in Church history as Pelagius. (1) The Pelagian doctrine was an extravagance in its conception alike of man's freedom and of Divine grace. The former is exaggerated to the extent of maintaining that every man is absolutely free at every moment to decide between right and wrong, that there is no inheritance of sinful conditions, that habit is no bond, and that, therefore, the grace of God is a mere adjutorium, an auxiliary to the native power of man to do good. (2) A mediating position is that occupied by the various degrees of semi-Pelagians (including the Roman Catholic Church since the Council of Trent), otherwise called Synergists, who hold that the human will cooperates with the Divine grace; this need not imply that man has any merit in salvation, since, as Melanchthon put it, his will leads him to seek that power from God without which salvation is impossible, and that power flows from sheer and undeserved mercy. (3) A third method adopted, for example, by J. B. Mozley (A Treatise on the Augustinian Doctrine of Predestination, 1883[3]), consists in assuming an agnostic position on philosophical grounds. This whole matter lies in a region where our ideas are both true and indistinct. We may start from the fact, and fact it is, that God makes the first approach to every individual in pure and unmerited grace, or from the other equally sure fact that man is conscious of desiring and seeking God and conscious of deliberate choice when he accepts mercy, and then we may make deductions regarding the ultimate relations between that Divine will in eternity and man's will in time; but these deductions must inevitably be inadequate and therefore false. We are inherently incapable of thinking from these two bases—the eternal plan and the human will—so as to discover their harmony.

No helpful criticism of the Augustinian doctrine is possible which does not fully acknowledge the extraordinary speculative strength and the deep religious spirit of that system. It founds and centers all on God; and in this it immeasurably surpasses the puny homocentric systems which have their brief day. Religion is the discovery that man needs God absolutely, and the gospel is an answer wholly out of God's will of love to that infinite need. The Augustinian system is an attempt to do full honor to that human need and that Divine will. Hence criticism which weakens man's sense of complete indebtedness to grace or which so insists on his freedom as to involve the notion of a self-wrought righteousness is a wound to the heart of the Christian consciousness. But the Augustinian system has been opposed by innumerable evangelical Christians at two points: viz., in its doctrines of preterition and of irresistible grace. The true predestinarian can not conceive of saving grace except as irresistible, and hence he maintains that to the non-elect, to the souls that perish, it was never intended to be applied. Those are the main points of attack. And the arguments may be conveniently set forth as follows:

3. Bases of Criticism of Predestinarianism.

(1) Regarding the passages which are cited above as the principal Pauline passages on the subject, the following facts seem to be important: (a) In Ro 8 29, 30, the writer's imagination carries him forward to the state of glory, to review the entire process from the final result. Looking backward, the perfected soul must attribute all its stages to the loving will of God. No human self-will has place or merit or praise in that wondrous retrospect. And all is traced ultimately to Him who in His eternal will foreordained what has come to pass. Nothing is said here either about the relation of this will to the lost or the function of the human will in the process. And yet this function is abundantly recognized elsewhere as a reality both stern and essential. (b) In Ro chs. 9–11, the discussion is concerned primarily with national life and destiny, but the Apostle does not avoid direct statements which must apply primarily to the individual (9 19-24). And there it is that the preteritionist can find verbal support for his position (esp. vs. 21, 22). But, on the other hand, the same great passage contains statements which attribute full responsibility for the disaster to the human action: (a) Israel sought righteousness by "works" and not by "faith" (9 30, 31); (b) the very "zeal for God" being bound up in their minds with a false conception of God's righteousness led them astray (10 2, 3); (c) yet some did hearken, though not all (10 16; cf. 3 3); (d) when Christ was preached certain branches were broken off "by their unbelief" (11 20); (e) and "God is able to graft them in again" (11 23, 24)—in a passage where the thought fluctuates constantly between the idea of the nation rejecting Christ and the individual doing so; (f) even the decree which "shut all up unto disobedience" was teleological, and its aim is uttered in the astonishing statement, "that he might have mercy upon all." (c) The remaining passage (Eph 1 3-14) is again concerned with the fact that in Christ Jew and Gentile are made one in the new community which is called the Church, and which is so richly described in this Epistle. As to this passage, emphasis must be laid upon the fact that no decree is described which is not conditioned by the name of Christ. Nor is the phrase "the good pleasure of His will" left undefined, as if some end beyond all conception lay concealed in His redemptive act. Rather is it quite clearly described as "the praise of the glory of his grace." Grace, the holy and loving will of God, is as such the source, and its exercise is the end, of the whole process. To be gracious—to be love—is God's nature, and to fulfil that nature in His relations to man, under the conditions of His righteous character, is the object of the redemption in Christ.

(2) Scripture as a whole assumes that man exercises choice toward the will of God, whether that will appear as law to be obeyed or as grace to be accepted. In each case the result, whether of blame or praise, is attributed to the attitude of the human soul (e.g., Ro 2 1-16). Hence Israel's unbelief is the real ground of Israel's rejection; not original sin, but this climactic sin of despising grace. To this the whole course of the Christian consciousness bears witness. It carries in its life the two elements of dependence on God and action upon that dependence, of choice toward God and surrender to His choice. Neither can be ignored without damage to the conscience and the will of man. Paul is conscious of God's call (Gal 1 15), but does not shrink from saying that he fights against his lower nature lest he should be "rejected" (I Co 9 26, 27). The Philippians must work out salvation because God is working in them (Ph 2 12, 13). Throughout, the appeal of the gospel is to men who can act upon it, and throughout it is the sincere appeal of God's love to all men. There is no darker side to the doctrine of preterition than its seeming attribution of insincerity to the assertions that God loves the world, that it is not His will that any soul should perish, and that He offers mercy without respect of persons.

(3) The preteritionist is open to attack on other grounds, drawn from the wider range of Christian doctrine. One or two points only can be noted here. (a) The statement of Augustine that the lost are passed over in order to display God's justice and the elect are saved in order to display His grace has lost its point since the rise of the fuller doctrine of a vicarious Atonement. The very nerve of that doctrine is that in the saving of men by the Cross God has revealed His righteousness. Punishment is no longer necessary for that. (b) Again, the statement, that if faith is itself a determining factor in God's choice then salvation is of merit, has also lost its point; for we no longer look on faith as a work which secures merit. It is in its very nature the denial of personal merit and the acceptance of a Divine righteousness and a Divine strength. (c) Yet again, when Paul passes from the agony of the particular situation in which Israel is placed, to regard the cosmic or universal meaning of Christ in Eph ch. 1 and Col ch. 1, he does not present the eternal will of God as unconditioned. The Son of His love conditions the purpose of God (Col 1 33 ff.). Everything is foredetermined in relation to His Person and in the name of that eternal love. Human history is seen in the light of this love, as it were through the conditioning person of the Son. But in this case it must be human nature as it is acted upon by Christ and as it reacts toward Him, that God eternally planned. Destiny is not fixed by ancestral sin, or by any fact apart from, or in addition to, the redemption in Christ, but by the supreme sin, which is unbelief—the rejection of His supreme grace.

PREFER: John the Baptist bore witness that, though Christ was temporally his successor, yet, owing to His possessing an eternal priority, He had come to take precedence over him (ἔμπροσθέν μου γέγονεν, Jn 1 15, 27, 30, "become before me" RV, "preferred" AV), who was simply the "forerunner." S. D.

PREPARATION DAY (παρασκευή): This term signifies in general any day which preceded a great feast. The usage is somewhat analogous to that of the English 'eve' (Christmas eve, New-year's eve, etc.). In a very narrow sense, it came to be the name of the single day of the week which precedes the Sabbath. Between these two extremes of usage lie the N T occurrences of the term (Mt 27 62; Mk 15 42; Lk 23 54; Jn 19 14, 31, 42). In the Synoptics the day indicated is presumably Friday. Mark even explains by adding "that is, the day before the Sabbath" (προσάββατον). John uses the qualifying expression "of the Passover" as if the day preceding the Passover was customarily called "the preparation of the Passover," irrespective of whether it fell on Friday or any other day. The rabbinical designation of the day was 'erebh happesah, "eve of the Passover," which is not exactly equivalent to John's usage. Accordingly, John must have meant it either as the Synoptics did—that is, of the Friday of Passover week—or in a sense in which the etymological and primitive meaning coalesces with the conventional and specific one. That Friday was called the Preparation is very clear from Josephus (Ant. XVI, 6 2) and the ecclesiastical usage of the first half of the 2d cent. which undoubtedly followed that of the Jews (Did. 8). See also FASTS AND FEASTS, § 7. A. C. Z.

PRESBYTER, PRESBYTERY. See CHURCH, § 8.

PRESENCE: In most instances the occurrences of this word in EV need no discussion. But where the "presence" of God is meant, the meaning is, in some cases, not immediately obvious. In all such instances the Heb. term is pānīm, 'face' (in various forms, 'face of,' 'my face,' etc., often rendered "before me," etc., in RV). (1) In one group of passages it is the invisible, but not less real, indwelling of God (or J") in His sanctuary that is meant (II Ch 20 9; Ps 95 2, etc.). (2) In other cases it is the manifestation of the power of J", in nature, war, pestilence, etc., that is in mind, ancient thought assigning such things to the immediate action of Deity (Ps 68 8; Is 19 1, 64 2 f., etc.). (3) Those parts of the earth to which He was supposed to be particularly near, or in which He was particularly interested, or where He was accustomed to manifest Himself were 'in His presence' (Gn 3 8, 4 16; Jer 52 3, etc.). (4) More generally, His omnipresence is sometimes in mind (Ps 139 7, etc.). (5) The spiritual communion with God, felt as a blessed and present reality, is spoken of as His "presence" (Ps 16 11, 31 20, 51 11, etc.). (6) The personal presence of God in His heavenly abode or court is referred to at times (Job 1 12, 2 7; I Ch 16 27 [?]). (7) Finally, we have the most significant use of the term in Ex 33 14 f. Moses, not satisfied with the promise of the "angel" (Ex 32 34, 33 2), begs for a fuller and closer manifestation of J", and this is the reply, "My presence shall go" ("with thee"), to which Moses responds, "If thy presence go not up, carry us not up hence." In other words, "presence" here means the personal presence of J" in the midst of His people. The whole passage with its sequel in 34 6 ff. is one of the most elevated and spiritual in the O T. E. E. N.

PRESENT. See GIFT, and TAX, TAXATION.

PRESIDENTS (סָרְכִין, ṣārᵉkhīn, probably a Persian loan-word, Dn 6 2-7): A title of administrative officers whose duties, however, are not defined, though the incumbents seem to have been in a position of authority over the satraps. A. C. Z.

PRESS, PRESS-VAT. See VINES AND VINTAGE, § 1.

PRETORIUM: The Gr. word πραιτώριον may mean (1) the headquarters of the 'pretor' or general in a camp; (2) the residence of the governor of a province; (3) any mansion or large villa, and (4) the Pretorian Guard. Its significance varies, accordingly, in the N T passages in which it is found. (a) In the Gospels (Mt 27 27, common hall AV; Mk 15 16; Jn 18 28, 33, 19 9, judgment-hall AV). In Jerusalem the procurator had as his temporary residence, or "pretorium," the palace of Herod in the western part of the city, near the Jaffa gate, though some identify it very improbably with the castle of Antonia, the massive citadel and barracks that overhung the Temple, the headquarters of the troops in the city. (b) In Ac 23 35: Here the reference is to the magnificent palace of Herod the Great in Cæsarea, used by the Roman procurators of Judæa as their official residence. (c) In Ph 1 13, Pretorian Guard ("palace" AV, but no instance occurs of the word being used for the imperial palace on the Palatine, or for the barracks of the Imperial Guard): The rendering of the RV has good historical support. In this case Paul was chained to the soldiers of the guard. But Ramsay, following Mommsen, interprets the word as meaning "the supreme Imperial Court, doubtless in this case the prefect, or both prefects, of the Pretorian Guard together with the assessors and high officers of the court." R. A. F.

PREVENT: This word is used, in its more archaic sense, in the AV as the translation of qādham (in Pi'el and Hiph'il), προφθάνειν and φθάνειν. It means: (1) 'To be before,' 'anticipate' in time (Ps 119 147 f.; Job 41 11 [3]; Mt 17 25; I Th 4 15). (2) 'To bring timely help,' 'to succor' (Ps 21 3 [4], 59 10 [11], 79 8; Is 21 14). (3) 'To frustrate,' "to come upon" RV, with hostility (II S 22 6, 19 = Ps 18 5 [6], 18 [19]; Job 30 27; Am 9 10). In Job 3 12 RV reads "receive me," i.e., care for me so that I do not die.

C. S. T.

PREY: This term renders the following Heb. words: (1) bāzaz, 'to rob' or 'to spoil,' and its derived nouns baz and bizzāh, 'spoil,' 'plunder,' nearly always used of the spoil, persons or property, taken in war (Nu 14 3; Dt 2 35; Neh 4 4, etc.). (2) ṭereph, 'that which is snatched' or 'torn,' used mainly of the prey of wild beasts (Gn 49 9; Nu 23 24, etc.). (3) shālal, and its noun shālāl, usually rendered 'spoil'; the common word for the spoil of battle (Jg 5 30; Jer 20 5, etc.). (4) malqōaḥ (from lāqaḥ, 'to take'), 'that which is taken' (Nu 31 11 f., etc.). (5) 'adh, 'booty.' This term occurs in the present Heb. text in three places (Gn 49 27; Is 33 23; Zeph 3 8), in but one of which (the first) is its meaning certain. (6) 'ōkhel, 'food' (Job 9 26, 39 29). (7) tsayidh (from tsādh, 'to hunt'), 'food gained by hunting' and then 'food' in general (Job 38 41). See also WARFARE, § 5.

E. E. N.

PRICKS: In the O T this word is used in Nu 33 55 to translate the Heb. sēkh (pl. sēkkīm), meaning anything sharp, LXX. σκόλοψ (cf. II Co 12 7). In the N T the same word is found in Ac 9 5 AV, as a translation of κέντρα, 'goads,' which, however, lacks good textual authority in this place. It occurs, however, in the account of Paul's story of his conversion before Agrippa in Ac 26 14.

1. Introductory Statement.

The subject of the Israelitic priesthood is involved in much obscurity. Its investigation is complicated, first by the nature of the evidence; this is contained in a number of sources belonging to different periods, some of them only imperfectly preserved, many of them of uncertain date, all furnishing a number of data impossible to unite in a perfectly consistent and satisfactory presentation. In the second place, investigation is complicated by the fact that during the whole period of the existence of the priesthood in Israel (nearly 1,500 years) conditions were constantly changing, and this progressive movement is only imperfectly represented in our sources, some of which describe the conditions of an earlier time, others lay down principles to be put in force at some future day, others set forth ideals never realized, while in but comparatively few cases, probably, do they describe things as they actually were at the date of writing. No discussion of the priesthood of Israel can hope to arrive at more than tentative conclusions, at least on many points. In the following article the historical development of the priesthood will receive most attention, other aspects of the subject being subordinated to this.

2. The Priesthood in the Earliest Documents.

In the earliest documents of the O T the priesthood is generally mentioned only incidentally, not discussed specifically. The usual Heb. (and Phœnician) term for priest was kōhēn. Among the early Arabs the related term kāhin signified 'seer,' and it is likely that in the earliest (pre-Mosaic) period the Heb. kōhēn and the Arab kāhin were very much alike, especially since our earliest evidence (see below) regarding Israel's priests emphasizes their 'prophetic' functions even more than their 'priestly,' in the ordinary sense of that word. A satisfactory etymology of kōhēn has not been found (cf. Köberle in *PRE*³, vol. xvi, p. 32), although the sense 'the one who stands [to officiate as priest]' has many advocates. The term kemārīm, chemarim, found a few times (II K 23 5; Hos 10 5; Zeph 1 4) as a designation of idolatrous priests, was probably a foreign word.

(a) The Priesthood in J and E and the Older Portions of the Historical Books Jg–II K.

Very little is said regarding priests in the old narratives J and E. The patriarchs offer sacrifice as heads of their families or clans (Gn 12 8, 15 9 ff., etc.). Rebekah goes (to a sanctuary with a priest?) "to inquire" of J″ (Gn 25 22). In the former case the act is not thought of as specifically priestly. Incidentally, in Ex 19 22 (J) priests are mentioned as present in the camp, but who they were, whether the priests of the several tribes, or "Levites" as Aaron was (cf. Ex 4 14), is not stated. On the other hand, in the account of the ratification of the covenant in 24 5 (E), instead of priests, "young men of the children of Israel" were sent by Moses to offer the sacrifices. The difference here may be that of the view-point of the two documents, E seeming to be little interested in the organized priesthood. In the old accounts of the Mosaic legislation in Ex 20 22–23 33 and 34 10-26 nothing whatever is said of priests. But the implied references to sanctuaries (20 24, 22 29, 23 14-19, etc.) assume a priesthood as existing. The passage which (though only a fragment) gives us practically our only early information regarding the regular priesthood in Israel is Ex 32 25-29 (J), where the "sons of Levi" are represented as being rewarded for their loyalty to J″, at the time of the great defection of the mass of the people, by the priesthood; for this is the meaning of the technical expression (ver. 29) "consecrate yourselves to Jehovah" (lit. 'fill your hand to J"'; cf. Jg 17 5; also Ex 28 41, etc.). The same event is referred to in Dt 10 8 (based on JE), where, more explicitly, it is said: "At that time Jehovah set apart the tribe of Levi, to bear the ark of the covenant of Jehovah, to minister unto him and to bless in his name." In the notice about the making of the Tent of Meeting (Ex 33 7-11, E, also a fragment) it is rather surprising to read that Joshua (instead of 'priests' or 'Levites') was appointed by Moses to have charge of the Tent. In the JE sections of Joshua, which have been subjected to a pretty thoroughgoing 'Deuteronomic' revision (see HEXATEUCH, § 20, and JOSHUA, BOOK OF, § 5), priests, or, as is said in 3 3, "the priests the Levites," carried the Ark at the crossing of the Jordan (ch. 3) and at the siege of Jericho (ch. 6), which is in agreement with Dt 10 8. In Jg the only reference to priests is in the old and instructive story in ch. 17 f. regarding the foundation of the sanctuary at Dan in the most northern part of the land. In this story we learn that two of the important functions of a priest were caring for a sanctuary and consulting the oracle (i.e., being the medium through whom the Divine will was to be ascertained). We learn further: first, that it was possible in ancient Israel for one to set apart one of his own family to act as a priest (17 5; cf. I S 7 1) though himself not of a priestly family, and second, that a "Levite" was, however, considered the legitimate person to be a priest (17 13). It is also interesting to note that the "Levite" spoken of here hailed from Bethlehem-judah, as though he were a Judahite by blood and a "Levite" by profession, i.e., the term "Levite" may not be used here in the tribal sense. This "Levite" was looking for a permanent home (17 9), and was evidently glad to accept the offer made him by Micah, and still more content to become the priest of the tribe of Dan (18 19 f.). According to 18 30, he was none other than a grandson of Moses, but it is probable that this notice is to be distinguished from the main story as containing a separate tradition.

The information concerning the priesthood given in the early narratives in I and II S is of the highest value, although not as full or clear as we might wish. With Eli, "the priest" at the sanctuary in Shiloh, were associated his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, who seem to have had the active management of the sanctuary largely in their hands (I S 1 3, 9, 2 12 ff., etc.). The sanctuary at Shiloh was a "temple," not a tent. The arrangements appear to have been quite simple. There was easy access on the part of the worshipers to the immediate vicinity of the door of the sanctuary (1 9 ff., 2 12 ff.). Instead of a large body of ministering "Levites" (as required in the Priest's Code; see § 9, below) we read only of a priest's "servant" attending to the cooking of the sacrifices (2 13). While there seem to have been well-known customs regarding the method of sacrifice, the priest's portion, etc., anything like the elaborate preseribed ritual of P is conspicuous by its absence (2 12 ff.). Nothing is said of the genealogy of Eli in the earlier portions of the narrative (in I S chs. 1–6). As priest, Eli had charge of the sanctuary, exercised prophetic functions, and acted also as local judge. As Shiloh was the sanctuary where the Ark was kept, it was the most important sanctuary in Israel. At the same time, the whole narrative seems to be altogether inconsistent with the idea of one only "high priest," the head of a hierarchy such as is described in PC. (see § 9 (b), below).

In the story of Samuel's leadership of Israel (I S chs. 7–12) there is no mention whatever of priest or Levite. Samuel was, technically, neither, though, with the exception of being stationed permanently at a sanctuary, he exercised all priestly functions (cf. especially I S 9 13). In the stories of Saul's campaign against the Philistines (I S 14 3, 18 f.) and of David's struggle with Saul (I S 23 6-10) priests appear as bearers of the ephod (q.v.), by which the will of J" was ascertained. In the first of these references it is Ahijah, son of Ahitub the grandson of Eli; in the second, it is Abiathar, son of Ahimelech, also son of Ahitub, and therefore either a brother of, or identical with, Ahijah. In either case the descent from Eli is to be noted (though it rests solely on the notice in 14 3). The story of Saul's massacre of the eighty-five priests at Nob is of interest mainly for its intimation of the large number of priests at that sanctuary, all of them belonging apparently to the same family, or, better, clan. The story is late in its present form, however, and may not represent accurately the actual occurrence. The account of David's experience with Ahimelech at Nob (21 1-9) is interesting mainly as implying that at this place there was a very important sanctuary, where the holy showbread was placed before J", and where David's trophy, the sword of Goliath, was laid up "behind the ephod." It is usually assumed that Nob succeeded Shiloh as the residence of the priestly family of which Eli was the head when Shiloh was devastated (or threatened) by the Philistines, but of this there is no direct evidence. It is more likely that at Nob there was an old independent sanctuary with its own body of priests, as was the case at Gibeon (I K 3 4), Bethel (I S 10 3), and many other places.

When David became king and removed the Ark from its obscurity at Kiriath-jearim to his new capital, Jerusalem, it was natural that he should put his companion and friend in exile, Abiathar, in charge (II S 8 17, 20 25). With him was associated Zadok (lineage not given). No special mention is made of these priests in the entire account of David's reign, not even in the account of the removal of the Ark to Jerusalem. On the contrary, David himself, on important occasions, does not hesitate to assume a priestly attitude and perform priestly acts (II S 6 14-19; cf. the similar attitude of Solomon, I K 8 22 ff.), and even appointed certain of his sons to act as priests (II S 8 18). The subordination of the priests to the royal authority is assumed throughout the history of the kingdom. This is clearly evidenced in Solomon's deposition of the aged Abiathar and banishment of him to his patrimony at Anathoth (I K 2 26 f.). In the account of the dedication of Solomon's Temple the priests are merely mentioned as the ones who transported the Ark from David's sanctuary to its new resting-place (I K 8 3 ff.). The part taken by the king, who acted the part of a priest-father to his people, was so conspicuous that nothing but mere routine work was left for the priests to do.

In the account of the innovations introduced by Jeroboam I in N. Israel, it is said that he "made priests from among all the people, that were not of the sons of Levi" (I K 12 31). The point of view here is evidently that only "sons of Levi" (not "sons of Aaron" as in PC) were legitimate priests. Jeroboam himself is represented as officiating at the altar as priest-king (I K 12 33, 13 1-4).

The remaining passages where mention is made of priests in I and II K, down to the account of the reign of Josiah, add little to our information. It was "the priest" (i.e., the head priest of the Temple) Jehoiada, whose wife was a king's daughter (according to II Ch 22 11), who organized the revolt against the usurper Athaliah and placed the legitimate heir Joash on the throne (II K 11 4 ff.). Jehoiada here appears as the steadfast upholder of loyalty to J″ against the attempt of Athaliah to force Baal-worship on Judah. The account in II K ch. 12 regarding the collection of funds for repairs on the Temple incidentally reveals the presence of a number of priests in attendance at that sanctuary, but the administration of affairs appears to have been somewhat lax. There were regular sources of income (ver. 4) but careless supervision of the uses to which it was put. It is interesting to observe that the king's word was supreme. The priests were his subordinates and obeyed his commands. The same subserviency to the royal will is to be noted in the case of Urijah, head priest of the Temple under Ahaz, at whose command a new altar, after a heathen model, was made to displace the old altar used by Solomon (II K 16 10 ff.).

(b) The Attitude of the Eighth-Century Prophets Toward the Priests.

The great prophets of the 8th cent., Amos and Hosea in N. Israel, and Isaiah and Micah in Judah, dealt with the religious conditions of their times frankly and courageously.

Amos rebukes the masses, especially the upper classes, for their excessive zeal for formal religion coupled with lack of regard for morality, and for corrupt practises at the sanctuaries (2 7 f.); for their selfish delight in sacrifices, free-will offerings, and tithes (3 4 f.), and in pilgrimages to famous shrines (5 5); and for their idea of the supreme importance of such forms of worship (5 21 ff.). Amos could not have had a high opinion of the priests of the sanctuaries where such ideas were fostered. As the signs of the gracious providence of J″ in the past history of Israel he names prophets and Nazirites (2 11), but (significantly?) omits priests. His reply to Amaziah, the priest of the "king's sanctuary" at Bethel, deals with him as an individual rather than as a priest (7 10 ff.).

In Hosea the N. Israelite priesthood is severely arraigned. It is not the illegitimate (i.e., non-Aaronic, or even non-Levitic, as might be expected from I K 12 31) character of these priests that is condemned, but their gross neglect of known duty. This duty, according to Hosea, was mainly to teach the people to know J″ (4 4-9) aright. Instead of doing this, the prophet declares "they feed on the sin of my people and set their heart on iniquity" (4 8). That is, they were content with the rich income they derived from the elaborate cultus, which was full of gross corruptions, and only encouraged such things instead of rebuking them (cf. also 5 1 ff., 6 9). For cultus itself, i.e., sacrifices, etc., Hosea, like Amos, seems to have had little respect (cf. 6 6), and therefore the "law" (4 6) which the priests were to teach Israel was the moral and spiritual element of the religion of J″, not the ceremonial. In Isaiah (28 7) and Micah (3 11) two charges are made against the priests, drunkenness and teaching "for hire," indicating that the Jerusalem priests were in as sad need of reform as were those of N. Israel.

(c) The Evidence of Dt 33 8-11.

This passage in the ancient poem entitled "The Blessing" of Moses is so important as to demand the closest attention. At whatever date the poem was written, it expresses the view of the priesthood entertained by devout followers of J″ at that time. The main points emphasized here are the following:

(a) The priestly class is designated as "Levi" and counted as one of the tribes of Israel. (b) Their devotion to J″ is set forth in the strongest terms and stated to have proved itself in a test at Massah and Meribah. (c) Their loyalty is further shown by the fact that they have placed fidelity to J″ above all other claims, even those of kindred. (d) Their peculiar privilege is that to them is entrusted the "Thummim" and "Urim" of J″. (e) Their priestly duties are, in the main, three: to make known the will of J″ through the sacred oracle or lot ("Thummim" and "Urim"), to teach Israel the law and ordinances of J″, and to officiate at the altar of J″. (f) Finally, the more secular aspect of "Levi" is revealed in ver. 11, where the prayer is that J″ may bless His substance and put down His enemies.

But the date and the interpretation of this important passage are open to debate. To the present writer an early date, perhaps as early as the days of Samuel or Saul, rather than a later one seems more probable. The reference to a 'testing' at Massah and Meribah (ver. 8) suggests the events recorded in Nu 20 10-13 (cf. Ex 17 2-7), but the tradition is not identical. What is said in ver. 9 is probably to be explained by Ex 32 27 ff. (see above). The "Thummim" and "Urim" are referred to in I S 14 41 (according to the true Heb. text) and in 28 6, and there can be little doubt that it meant the sacred lot which it was the priest's special privilege to understand how to "cast" and interpret.

It is on the basis of a correct interpretation of these early notices that a true view of Israel's priesthood must rest. The most difficult phase of the problem is that relating to the connection between the tribe of Levi and Levi as the priestly element in Israel. The notice in the ancient poem (Gn 49 5 ff.) shows clearly that there was a tribe Levi, but there it is purely secular and is condemned, while in Dt 33 8 ff. it is religious and praised. Aaron is spoken of as "the Levite" in a sense other than tribal in Ex 4 14. We are here in the presence of an insoluble difficulty. Conjectural solutions abound, but none is satisfactory. Whatever the original tribal connection of the Levites may have been, this much seems certain—that from Moses' time on until after the Exile the priestly class in Israel was spoken of as "Levites." The etymological significance of the word lēwī is unknown, and no theory can be based on conjectures regarding it. It was to reward their loyalty to J″ that Moses constituted the Levites of his day the priests of the newly organized people. This meant originally not the exclusive right to offer sacrifices, for that could be done by almost any one in ancient Israel, but rather the guardianship of the Ark, the care of any sanctuary of J″ in Israel, the custody of the sacred lot, and the duty of making known the principles and practises of the religion of J″ to the people. This is actually about all that can be asserted with confidence regarding the priesthood as organized by Moses. The early sources leave us in almost complete ignorance regarding the position of Aaron. He is mentioned in both J and E, but rather as a mere assistant or subordinate of Moses, and in the story of the organization at Sinai he is assigned no special place. And yet it is probable that in comparatively early times the priestly family at Shiloh was considered to be descended from Aaron. Through Abiathar these claims may have become attached to the sanctuary at Jerusalem and then later transferred to themselves by the Zadokite priests who came to be in exclusive possession of that sanctuary.

When the tribes of Israel settled in Canaan and distributed themselves over its territory they made use of a large number of sanctuaries, scattered in different parts of the land (see HIGH PLACE). While the most important of these was, perhaps, Shiloh, because the Ark was finally there, many others were held in high esteem, e.g., Gilgal, Bethel, Beer-sheba, Hebron, etc. It is necessary to suppose that at each of these permanent sanctuaries there was a priesthood and that this priesthood was composed (mainly) of Levites. In addition, there were probably many Levites who were not attached to any particular shrine and maintained themselves as best they could. Only as a Levite was attached to a sanctuary was he, under normal circumstances, actually a priest.

The establishment of the Davidic sanctuary at Jerusalem proved to be an event of most decisive influence on the priesthood of Israel. Here, especially after the Temple of Solomon was built, was the most magnificent sanctuary in Israel. While it is true that the early record in I K does not give us many details regarding the priesthood here, and, on the other hand, that the accounts in I and II Ch regarding David's elaborate arrangements of priests and Levites and other ministers of the sanctuary is doubtless but a projection back into the Davidic Age by the priestly author of Ch of the ideas and institutions of his own day, still it is altogether likely that from the first the arrangements at this royal sanctuary were somewhat elaborate—that is, there were a number of priests, the leading family being that of Zadok, and these were graded into several classes as the 'great,' or chief priest (II K 12 10, 22 4, 8, 23 4), and the priests of the "second order" (II K 23 4, 25 8), and the three (or more) "keepers of the threshold" (II K 23 4, 25 8). In addition, there were probably a number of subordinate Temple servants, such as "hewers of wood and drawers of water" (Jos 9 21 ff.), consisting mainly of people of foreign blood, as captives in war or remnants of the old Canaanite population now reduced to servitude (cf. I K 9 20 f.), who were the ancestors of the later and more formally organized groups known as "Nethinim" (q.v., and cf. I Ch 9 2; Ezr 2 43, etc.), and "the children of Solomon's servants" (Ezr 2 55, etc.). But of the details of the whole organization and the methods of their administration of their office, little is positively known.

The status of the priesthood in the Kingdom period was high. Probably, there was no other class in ancient Israel whose influence was so great. The glowing eulogy in Dt 33 8 ff., which states this in its most favorable terms, reveals the priesthood at its best, and it is altogether probable that at many a sanctuary in ancient Israel the priesthood were revered as the exponents of the Law of J″ and the guides of the people in the way of His judgments.

The support of the priesthood was derived mainly from the various kinds of offerings, as those portions which were unconsumed on the altar or by the worshipers were the share of the priests. There were other sources of income such as tithes (cf. Am 4 4), and presents of money or provisions (cf. Gn 28 22; I S 10 3). The earlier notices say almost nothing about this, but in the later codes the income of the priests is quite definitely prescribed, doubtless in accordance with ancient usage.

With the passing away of the Northern Kingdom in 722 B.C., the future of the priesthood became dependent entirely on the fortunes of Judah and Jerusalem, especially the latter, and from this time on the history of the priesthood becomes practically that of the priestly organization at Jerusalem. Here was the center of the organized religious life of the nation, and the customs followed here would be likely to be imitated in the other sanctuaries of Judah, of which there were many, until the reform of Josiah (621 B.C.) abolished them all and made the Temple in Jerusalem the sole public sanctuary in Judah.

4. The Priesthood in the Code of Dt.

This brings us to the view of the priesthood set forth in the Code of Dt, which was compiled some time near 650 B.C. (see DEUTERONOMY, § 5) and made the basis of Josiah's reform of 621.

In the introduction to the Code (10 8) the tribe of Levi is spoken of as having been "set apart" by J″ to bear the Ark, to "minister" before J″, and to "bless" in His name, and in accordance with this the tribe had no special territory, like the other tribes, but was scattered here and there throughout Israel and dependent largely upon the good-will and charity of their fellow Israelites (cf. also 18 1 ff.).

In this Code the standing expression for the priests is "the priests the Levites" (18 1 and passim), i.e., the Levites (viewed in Dt as the members of the tribe of Levi) are the priestly element in Israel and as such every Levite is de jure a priest, although he might not be one de facto. This view is fully stated in 18 1-8, which must be interpreted for its historical significance in the light of the preceding prescriptions in ch. 12, in which the position is taken that there is to be but one sanctuary in the land where the sacrifices can be legitimately offered and priests officiate and the people assemble for their social worship. The officiating priests at this sanctuary (which was the Temple, although never expressly so named) were Levites, and to this sanctuary any Levite dwelling in any part of the land had the right to come and officiate as a priest (18 6-8). This regulation, apart from the view that underlies it, is probably to be understood as intended to cover those cases that were likely to occur whenever the Code should become generally observed. It is not likely that the Code has in mind a constantly shifting priesthood at Jerusalem. It can hardly be doubted that, when the Code was compiled, the Jerusalem priesthood was fairly well organized. This is implied in the Code itself, incidentally, in the phrase "the priest that shall be in those days" (26 3). It is of utmost importance to observe that in Dt "priest" and "Levite" are practically equivalent terms. There is no trace of the idea that the Levites were the servants of the priests. The only distinction is that not all Levites were actually officiating as priests at the sanctuary.

The support of the priests is provided for in 18 3 f. thus: "And this shall be the priests' due from the people, the shoulder, and the two cheeks, and the maw. The first-fruits of thy grain, of thy new wine, and of thine oil, and the first of the fleece of thy sheep shalt thou give him." Other provisions in the Code, such as we find in 12 12, 18, 14 27, 29 (where the Levite is to receive a share of the tithes every three years as also in 26 12 ff.), 16 11, 14, indicate that these gifts were not always brought to the sanctuary, but could also be distributed to the Levites, who, like the "stranger," were to be found "within thy gates" in all the cities of the land. What were the duties of these numerous Levites, who were scattered here and there throughout the land, is not very clearly indicated in the Code, probably because the ideal of the Code (all priests at the one only sanctuary) and the actual conditions at the time (many Levite-priests scattered over the land at the various sanctuaries) were somewhat in conflict and no clear statement was possible. The importance of the Levites in the local communities is perhaps indicated in 17 9, 12, 19 17, and 21 5, where it is implied that they constituted a part of the local judiciary.

5. The Effect of the Reform of 621 B.C.

Such were the general conditions when the reform of 621 brought about a change with far-reaching consequences. In general, the immediate effect of this reform was that the provisions of the Code of Dt were now made binding on the religious life of the nation (II K ch. 23). Everything was now concentrated in Jerusalem. The many sanctuaries (called "high places") of the different cities of the land were destroyed, and the Temple was made the only legitimate place of worship. The effect was, naturally, to greatly enhance the prestige of the priesthood of the Temple. However, the priests of the old local sanctuaries who now flocked to Jerusalem were not allowed "to come up to the altar of Jehovah at Jerusalem" (II K 23 9), i.e., they were refused the full privileges accorded them by the Code (Dt 18 6-8), but were allowed "to eat unleavened bread among their brethren." Here we are to find, in all probability, the beginning of that formal distinction, unknown to the Code of Dt, within the ranks of the Levitical body, between the "priests" proper and the remaining Levites, who, while retaining certain priestly privileges and entitled to support, were not allowed to officiate at the altar. The priestly body which was in actual possession of the Temple at the time of the reform tenaciously clung to its privileges, and henceforth counted itself as the only legitimate body of priests. They could claim descent from Zadok, and the tendency as time passed was to emphasize this as the test of legitimacy. It is not likely that the Temple priests were able to carry out this program with complete success, and in spite of their efforts the ranks of the priesthood were probably quite materially increased by country Levites, who asserted their rights and were able to maintain them. This will account for the relatively large number of priests in post-exilic days.

The references to the priests by Jeremiah, whose work was contemporary with the reform movement, are mainly to the effect that they were delinquent in the fulfilment of their duty as the teachers of righteousness (1 1, 18, 2 8, 26, etc.). The organization remained, as before, subservient to the royal will and was as willing to sanction the policy of the corrupt Jehoiakim and Zedekiah as to approve that of their righteous father, Josiah. Incidentally, references in Jer (19 1, 20 1, 29 25 f., 52 24) show that the priesthood was well organized up to the fall of Jerusalem (586 B.C.).

6. Ezekiel's Theory of the Priesthood.

The leniency with which the exiles were treated enabled the priests to maintain their organization and made it possible for them to plan for the measures to be taken when the restoration should take place. The prophet Ezekiel, himself a priest, stated his views in his ideal sketch of the future community (Ezk chs. 40–48). The Levitical priesthood is to be divided, according to Ezekiel, into two classes: the one, the "sons of Zadok who from among the sons of Levi come near to Jehovah to minister unto him" are to be "the keepers of the charge of the altar" (40 46). These alone are to be priests in the full sense of the word (44 15 ff.). The other group, designated as "the Levites, that went far from me when Israel went astray," could minister in the sanctuary, "having oversight at the gates of the house, and ministering in the house; they shall slay the burnt offering and the sacrifice for the people and shall stand before them to minister unto them." But "they shall not come near unto me to execute the office of a priest unto me, nor to come to any of my holy things, unto the things that are most holy; but they shall bear their shame. Yet I will make them keepers of the charge of the house" (44 10-14). The reason assigned for this prescription, viz., that the Levites "went astray," must be taken to refer to the "high-place" worship, which had been put under the ban by Dt, and which was doubtless largely tainted with idolatry, although under Manasseh at least, if not at other times, the "sons of Zadok" in Jerusalem must have been guilty of the same thing.

The functions assigned to the priests by Ezekiel are set forth most fully in 44 15-31. They alone were permitted to enter the sanctuary and minister at the "table" (i.e., altar). When so doing, they were to be clothed with appropriate (linen) vestments, which were not to be worn at other times. They were to keep their hair trimmed, but not shaven. They were to abstain from wine when ministering within the inner court. In their marriage relations they were to be circumspect. They were to teach the people of J" the difference between the "holy" and the "common," the clean and the unclean. They were to be the judges of the people, and they themselves were to observe all the commands. Their income and support were to be derived entirely from their office. They were to eat the vegetable offerings, the sin-offering, and the trespass-offering. All "devoted" things were to be theirs, also the first of the first-fruits, and the heave-offerings, and the first meal for baking. A strip of territory in the center of the land 25,000 cubits long by 10,000 wide was to be reserved for them and their families. In the center of this was the sanctuary (500 cubits square). To the N. of this was to be another like strip assigned to the Levites, while S. of it a narrower strip (5,000 cubits wide) was for the "city." To the E. and W of this square (25,000 by 25,000 cubits) was to be the territory of the "prince," whose main duty was to provide the offerings (45 1-8). These specifications show that to Ezekiel the future community was viewed from a purely theocratic point of view—a church rather than a state. At the center was to be the sanctuary, and next to that the priesthood, the holy portion of the community, standing between the community and God.

It is remarkable that in all these details there is no mention made of a high priest or of gradations in the priestly body. Further, there is no reference to Aaron, or to the "sons of Aaron" as a designation of the priests. All the other Levites are considered to have had a legitimate title to the priesthood, but to have forfeited it through their misconduct. In all these respects the differences between Ezekiel and the Priest's Code are noteworthy.

7. The Priesthood in the Holiness Code (Lv chs. 17-26).

Parallel in many respects to the Code of Dt and Ezekiel's ideal constitution is the code now generally known as the Holiness Code (HC) in Lv chs. 17–26 (see HEXATEUCH, § 23, and LEVITICUS). Here the tendency so marked in Ezekiel is found elaborated more fully. The rules of ceremonial purity to be applied to the priests are laid down with much detail (21 1–22 16). In distinction from, and possibly intended as an advance upon, Ezekiel's position in HC we find distinct mention (21 10-15) of the "high priest among his brethren, upon whose head the anointing oil is poured, and that is consecrated to put on the garments." This priest, above all others, is to be most careful of his conduct (ceremonially). In HC also the priests are spoken of not as Levites, but as "sons of Aaron" or "the seed of Aaron," and, apparently, the priesthood is restricted to these. But many scholars regard this as a later addition to the original form of HC. All that can be said with certainty is that among the priestly scribes of the exilic and post-exilic times, who busied themselves with the task of perfecting the Law as the constitution of the new community, the position that descent from Aaron was necessary in order to be a priest finally became so well established that it was regarded as indisputable. The passages exhibiting this view in HC are probably later than Ezekiel, whatever may be said of the date of this Code in its original form.

8. The Priests at the Time of the Return.

In the lists of the returned exiles preserved in Ezr and Neh it is said that 4,289 priests returned, belonging to four main families: Jedaiah-Jeshua, Immer, Pashhur, and Harim (Ezr 2 36-39; Neh 7 39-42). Apparently, these represent the four main families into which the whole body of priests had been divided in the Exile period. This number was later increased—finally to twenty-four. In addition to the priestly element that returned, there were 74 Levites, 148 "singers," the children of Asaph, and 138 "porters" representing six families. The small number of Levites in comparison with the priests is remarkable. Ezra, seventy-five years later, also found the Levites unwilling to leave Babylonia for Palestine; only by earnest effort did he secure eighteen to go with him (Ezr 8 18 f.), and with them 220 Nethinim.

The priests, then, made up a large proportion (approximately one-tenth, according to the figures given) of the returned exiles. At the head of this body was Joshua, the son of Jozadak, grandson of Seraiah, the chief priest of the Temple at the time of the fall of Jerusalem. To this official is accorded a very high place by the prophets Haggai (Hag 1 1, 12 ff., 2 1 ff.) and Zechariah (Zec 3 1 ff., 6 11 ff.). Here we find the high priest coordinated with the governor appointed by the Persian king in the exercise of authority in the community. Zechariah recognizes him as worthy of a crown, and thus imputes to him something of an ideal or Messianic significance. Thus we see that one phase of Ezekiel's program, the subordination of the civil to the priestly authority, came to be realized in the post-exilic period and almost immediately after the Return. While exact data are wanting as to the details of the development, all conditions were favorable to bringing about the result we find set forth, a more or less ideal point of view, in the legal or 'priestly' portions of Ex, Lv, Nu, and, later, presupposed in the narrative of the Chronicler (I and II Ch, Ezr, Neh), written about 300 B.C.

9. The Priesthood as Set Forth in PC.

The theory of the priesthood in PC is set forth partly in the form of historical narrative and partly in the form of legal prescription. In general, the narrative portion serves mainly as furnishing a convenient background for the laws. The perplexing and difficult problem of the relation of the different strata discoverable in PC to one another can not be discussed here. It may suffice to state that most critics to-day distinguish three main elements in the composition of PC, viz.: (1) the purely legal element consisting of laws of various dates; (2) the main narrative outline in which the theory is most completely set forth; and (3) supplementary material, which was added from time to time with a view either to force practise into more perfect conformity with theory or to adjust the formal law to a more close harmony with actual practise. Consequently, the representation of the priesthood found in PC is marked by many apparent discrepancies and inconsistencies. The prescriptions were never all in operation at any one time, and some of them, probably, were never actually practised.

The theory of the priesthood in PC may be considered conveniently under the following points:

(a) The Distinction Between Priests and Levites. The priests are limited strictly to Aaron and his male descendants. Other members of the tribe of Levi are simply Levites, not priests. Aaron and his sons alone can "come nigh unto the vessels of the sanctuary and unto the altar" (Nu 18 1-7; cf. Ex 29 9). According to Nu 3 5 ff., the Levites were 'given' to Aaron and his sons as their ministers. Thus from the old view that "priest" and "Levite" were equivalent terms, the advance was made to the position that the "Levite" was no priest at all, only the priest's servant. In the emphasis on descent from Aaron as the indispensable qualification for the priesthood, the condition laid down by Ezekiel, descent from Zadok, is carried back to its ideal starting-point, Aaron himself. In other words, the descendants of the Temple priesthood of Josiah's day who successfully resisted the provisions of the Code of Dt, which would have placed all the Levite-priests on the same level, and who were supported by Ezekiel (in the distinction he made between them as "sons of Zadok" and the others as priests who "went astray" and therefore, though Levites, were not to "come near" to J" to minister unto Him (Ezk 40 46, 44 9 ff.)—these priests, as "sons of Aaron," are viewed in PC as the only legitimate priests. But what of the large number of representatives of old priestly families who failed to make good any claim to be regarded as "sons of Aaron"? These are viewed as "Levites" merely—more than mere laymen, but not privileged to be priests. The attempt to put such a theory into practise must have met with many difficulties and perhaps aroused hard feeling. Possibly, the peculiar story in Nu ch. 16, regarding Korah (without the passages referring to Dathan and Abiram), was intended to teach that any resistance to the exclusive claims of the Aaronite priests was a most serious matter.

(b) The Importance Attached to the High Priest. In PC there are but two kinds of priests: the main body, with no distinctions between its members, and over these, with peculiar privileges and responsibilities, "the high priest among his brethren, upon whose head the anointing oil is poured, and that is consecrated to put on the garments" (Lv 21 10). Although the anointing is here considered a peculiar privilege of the high priest (as also in Ex 29 7; Lv 6 20 ff., 8 12, 16 32), yet in other passages not only Aaron, but his sons are represented as anointed (Ex 28 41, 29 21, 40 13, 15; Lv 7 35 f., 8 30). The high priest was viewed as the lineal descendant of Aaron through his son Eleazar and Eleazar's son Phinehas (Nu 20 23-29, 25 10-13). Strange as it may seem, no special provision is made in PC for the transmission of this important office from father to son, though the detailed description of the investiture of Aaron and his sons (Ex ch. 29; Lv chs. 8 and 9) with the sacred office and the notice of Eleazar's succession (Nu 20 23-29) may be intended as giving all necessary directions (cf. Ex 29 29 f.). The high-priestly dress is described minutely in Ex 28 1-38, 29 5-9, 39 1-31; Lv 8 6-9 and 16 4, 23. Like other priests, the high priest wore an undergarment, or coat and breeches of linen (Ex 28 39, 42). Over these was worn a robe of blue elaborately decorated, and having a number of golden bells attached to its skirt (Ex 29 31-35). Over the robe the costly ephod was worn. This was a garment something like a waistcoat or vest. As worn by ordinary priests, it was of plain white linen. The high-priestly ephod was joined together at the shoulders, and also girded or fastened on the body with a girdle of the same elaborate workmanship as the ephod itself. To each shoulder-piece an onyx stone, engraved with the names of the tribes of Israel (six on each stone), was attached, held in place by a golden setting (ouches AV) (Ex 28 6-14). Over the ephod the high priest wore on his breast the breastplate, described in detail in Ex 28 15-30 (see STONES, PRECIOUS, § 2). In the breastplate, which therefore must have been something like a pocket, were placed the Urim and Thummim (q.v.). On his turban, or miter, there was a golden plate engraved with the words קדש ליהוה, "HOLY TO JEHOVAH," in which the whole theory of PC regarding Israel as the "holy" people, and of this people as represented in their high priest, was significantly expressed. On the Day of Atonement the high priest, when officiating within the sanctuary, wore a special dress consisting only of linen breeches, coat and girdle, and miter (Lv 16 4, 23). On the solemn service of this day the mediatorial office of the high priest was most clearly exhibited (Lv 16 11 ff.).

(c) Priests' Duties and Privileges.

In PC the priests' duties are mainly sacrificial (cf. the manual of worship, Lv chs. 1–7, etc.). They and they alone could officiate at the altar and enter the sanctuary and care for its holy things. In the time of PC, the old idea that any Israelite could offer a sacrifice had entirely passed away. The priest was viewed as completely 'separated' unto J" and as such must be especially particular against contracting any ceremonial defilement, so that practises allowable to other Israelites were forbidden to the priests (cf. Lv 10 8 f., 21 1-24). Though laying greatest emphasis on the sacrificial duties of the priesthood, their old function of teaching is not entirely overlooked (Lv 10 11, although even here the ceremonial law seems to be mainly in mind). To the priest alone belonged the duty (or privilege) of blessing the people, and in so doing he was to use a prescribed formula (Lv 9 22; Nu 6 22-27). The revenue of the priesthood is in PC supposed to be derived wholly from the offerings (inclusive of first-fruits, tithes, redemption money, etc.). On this subject PC simply expanded and defined more exactly what had been traditional practise from time immemorial. The various prescriptions relating to this matter will be found in Ex 29 27 f.; Lv 2 3, 10, 6 16-18, 26, 29, 7 6-10, 31-36, 10 12-15, 24 9; Nu 5 9 f., 6 19 f., 18 8-32.

(d) The Levites, as Distinguished from the Priests. The legislation of PC is all formulated with the use of the legal fiction of the Mosaic Tabernacle (q.v.) as the standard sanctuary. The main duty of the Levites is the "charge" of the sanctuary (Nu 3 5 ff.). As no Levite could enter within the sanctuary (Nu 4 20), their duties were confined to the court and its furniture. Nowhere, perhaps, is the purely ideal character of much of the legislation of PC revealed more clearly than in its representation, in Nu chs. 3 and 4, of the service assigned to the more than 22,000 Levites in the care of that small Tabernacle and its few articles of furniture. But PC was legislation intended really for the Second Temple and the religious commonwealth of the returned exiles, and, understood as such, the prescriptions in Nu chs. 3 f., 8, and 16 had a real significance. The Levites in PC signify the great body of Temple servants who waited on the priests and performed the more menial tasks connected with the Temple service. PC recognizes no other class of sanctuary servants as legitimate (cf. Nu 3 10 f.). As all the Levites were not needed at the Temple at any one time, it was prescribed that forty-eight cities with their adjacent territory should be set apart in different portions of the land as Levitical cities (Lv 25 32-34; Nu 35 1-8; Jos 21 1-42; I Ch 6 54-81). The Levite's period of service at the sanctuary was to extend from his 25th to his 50th year (Nu 8 23-26, but cf. 4 3).

In PC (Nu ch. 3 f.) the Levites are organized, on the genealogical principle, into three great divisions, each descended from one of the three sons of Levi, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari. Each of these main groups was further subdivided into a number of smaller groups, on the same principle, the priests proper forming one of the divisions of the Kohathites.

Nothing is said in PC of any kind of service to be performed by the Levites other than that of assisting the priests in the care and transportation of the Tabernacle. But in I Ch 6 31 ff., 9 14-34, 15 5-24, and, more fully in chs. 24–26, we find a number of references, not all in perfect agreement, in which the musical service of praise is assigned to the Levites, besides their duty as doorkeepers, apparently quite important, and the other duties in connection with the care of the building (see MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 4). What we find in Ch thus represents a stage of development later than that in PC, although we can not be sure whether all that is given in Ch represents the actual conditions at the time of the Second Temple. The representation in Ch that all these arrangements were in force in David's time is, in the light of the narrative in I and II K, certainly unhistorical (see CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF). The Levites thus constituted a very important, numerous, and well-organized element in post-exilic Judaism, in spite of the fact that a large number of them were at first quite reluctant to return from the land of captivity (cf. Ezr 8 15 ff.).

At the time of the Return there were two other small bodies of Temple servants, the Nethinim (q.v.) and "the children of Solomon's servants" (Ezr 2 43-58 = Neh 7 46-60), who were counted as clergy, not as of the laity (cf. Ezr 7 21), who are not mentioned in PC and but once in Ch (I Ch 9 2). It was contrary to the theory of PC to count any one but a Levite as qualified to serve at the sanctuary, and the silence of Ch may be accounted for by the supposition that by 300–250 B.C. these bodies had come to be recognized (genealogically) as Levites and had been absorbed into the general body of Levites on which Ch lays so much importance.

10. The Priesthood in the Later Persian Period.

The actual condition of the priesthood in the later Persian period is obscurely revealed in the record in Ezr and Neh. The high priest was the religious head of the community, but not until after Nehemiah, when the hold of Persia on the western provinces of the empire was weaker, does he seem to have been recognized as its civil head, and then, possibly, because the Persian Government consented to have him act as governor in lieu of a separate Persian official appointed for the purpose. Ezra, who was entrusted with the authority of governor (cf. 7 25), and Nehemiah, who had the title as well as the authority, seem to have paid little attention to the high priest in their day. This was perhaps because the high priest, with many of the common priests, was opposed to Ezra's program of reform. Nehemiah had the assistance of Eliashib, the high priest, in the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem, other priests aided the work in the same way (Neh 3 1, 3, 21 f., 28 f.), and priests assisted and cooperated in the great work of promulgating and adopting the Law as the constitution of the community (Neh 8 4 ff., 10 1-8). Certain priestly families consented also to take up their permanent abode in the city, the others, presumably, continuing to reside in the country and coming into the city only as their duties at the sanctuary required. In process of time this led to a subdivision of the whole priestly body into the twenty-four courses, or relays, which are described in I Ch 24 1-19. The basis of the classification here is, as usual, genealogical, sixteen courses being reckoned to the descendants of Eleazar and eight to those of his brother Ithamar. This arrangement continued in force until N T times (cf. Lk 1 5; Jos. Vita, 1).

Notwithstanding the formal adherence of the priesthood to the new order instituted by Ezra and Nehemiah, there were many who were secretly in favor of a much less rigorous policy and even some who cared little for the more ideal and sacred aspects of their office. Evidence on this point is found in the severe arraignment of the priesthood by the prophet Malachi and in the account in Neh 13 4 ff., 28 f., of Nehemiah's conflict with the high priest and certain members of his family.

11. The Priesthood in the Greek and Roman Periods.

Of the history of the priesthood from Nehemiah (c. 432 B.C.) to the Maccabæan revolt (168 B.C.) very little is known. The list of high priests given in Neh 12 10 f. carries the succession down to Jaddua, who was in office when Alexander conquered Asia. From notices in Josephus the list can be continued as follows: Onias I (son of Jaddua), Simon I (son of Onias I), Eleazar (another son of Onias I), Manasseh (uncle of Eleazar), Onias II (son of Simon I), Simon II (son of Onias II), Onias III (son of Simon II), who became involved in difficulties with his sovereign Selcucus IV of Antioch, and, according to one account (II Mac 4 1-6), was held in captivity near Antioch until slain by the usurper Menelaus

(II Mac 4 33 ff.); but according to another account he fled to Egypt, where he founded the rival temple at Leontopolis (Jos. BJ, I, 1 1; VII, 10 2). Very little is known of the administrations of these high priests. Simon I was known as "the just," and Simon II has a sure place in Jewish history through the warm eulogy upon him in Sir 50 1-21. This passage contains, perhaps, our most reliable information regarding the priesthood in this period, and shows it in its most attractive aspect.

In the great contest between Hellenism and Jewish patriotism and conservatism which led to the Maccabæan revolt, large numbers of the priests were found ready and even eager to throw down the barriers and open the doors to the most radical and corrupting influences of Hellenism. The story told in II Mac chs. 1–7 need not be repeated here. Jason, the brother of Onias III, faithlessly abused the trust reposed in him by his brother and bribed the infamous Antiochus IV to confer upon him the office of high priest (c. 175 B.C.). But Jason was soon supplanted by the still baser Menelaus, who offered the king a higher sum than Jason was paying. This man held the office when the aged Mattathias, also a priest (I Mac 2 1), raised the standard of revolt. Numbers of the priests still remained faithful, as did also the mass of the people. With Menelaus, who lost favor and was executed by order of Antiochus V (c. 164 B.C.), and his successor Alcimus (q.v.), who died about 160 B.C. (I Mac 9 54 ff.), the Maccabæan party would have nothing to do. When Judas Maccabæus restored the worship of J″ at Jerusalem (165 B.C.), though "he chose blameless priests" (I Mac 4 42) to officiate, there was no recognized high priest and the office was vacant until the Feast of Tabernacles (153 B.C.), when Jonathan, brother of Judas, accepted the royal appointment and assumed the office. On Jonathan's death (143 B.C.) he was succeeded by his brother Simon.

Onias III was the last of the old line of high priests in legitimate succession, as Jason, Menelaus, and Alcimus were only usurpers. With Simon a new line began, since the people voted to make the high-priesthood hereditary in his family (I Mac 14 41). Both Jonathan and Simon were not only high priests, but also held the chief political authority. As president of the Sanhedrin (q.v.), which now became more important than ever before, the high priest was virtually the chief justice of the nation. This union of two distinct offices in one man was continued with Simon's successors, who later (first with Aristobulus I, 105–104 B.C.) assumed the title of "king." The Maccabæan, or Asmonean, line of priests came to an end virtually with Hyrcanus II, whom the Romans deprived of political authority in 63 B.C., allowing him to retain his high-priestly office. Hyrcanus was carried into exile by the Parthians in 40 B.C. From the time of the accession of Herod the Great (37 B.C.) until the Fall of Jerusalem (70 A.D.), the high priests were set up and deposed entirely at the caprice of the Herods or of the Roman governors. The twenty-eight high priests who held office during this period of 107 years were selected, in most cases, from four or five leading families. One who had once held the office was even after his deposition accorded a dignity and honor which raised him far above the level of the ordinary priests. To such men the title "high priest" was still given, and perhaps also to other members of the most prominent priestly families, even though they may never have actually held the high office. This will account for the somewhat loose use of the term "high priest" in the N T and also in Josephus.

The political aspect of the office of high priest, which became so prominent in the Maccabæan period, never lost its prime importance. The revenue of the Temple, which was controlled and used by the priests, was enormous. The priesthood culminated in an aristocracy (see SADDUCEES) possessed of immense wealth and great influence. It was inevitable that they should be deeply interested and involved in politics, and their policy was, in general, that of submission to the Herodian or Roman authority, in order that they might not be disturbed or dispossessed of their wealth and position by a popular revolt. More and more, after the supremacy of the Law was established by the efforts of the priest-scribe Ezra, but especially after the Maccabæan war, the old teaching function of the priests was taken over by the scribes (q.v.), most of whom were Pharisees, while the priestly party was known as the Sadducees. Between these two parties no love was lost. But the priesthood was too strongly intrenched behind the walls of tradition and the popular devotion to the Temple and its services, which, according to the Law, were in their hands exclusively, to be uprooted except by the most violent catastrophe. This came at last with the destruction of the city and Temple in 70 A.D., in which sanctuary and priesthood, so long allied, went down together, never to be revived, while scribism survived and remains even to-day.

PRINCE: This word renders sixteen Heb. and three Gr. words: (1) 'ăḥashdarpənīn, Aram. from the old Persian, meaning officials over several small provinces, "satraps" RV (Dn 3 2, 3, 27, 6 1 ff.; in Ezr 8 36; Est 3 12, 8 9, 9 3, where the Heb. form of the same word is used; AV has "lieutenants"). (2) hashmannīm (Ps 68 31), 'ambassadors, 'nobles, conjectured from the text. Briggs renders "swift messengers" (from past ptcpl. of hūsh, 'to hasten'). (3) kōhēn, 'priest' (Job 12 19 AV), as representatives of an important order in the community. (4) nāgīdh (lit. 'one in front'), hence a 'leader, 'ruler,' or 'prince' (Job 31 37; Ps 76 12 [13]; Pr 28 16); used of the king of Israel (I K 14 7, 16 2, etc.), always in RV [mg. 'leader'] for the king of Israel where AV has "captain" (I S 9 16, etc.) or "ruler" (II S 6 21, etc.); for foreign rulers (Ezk 28 2; Dn 9 25 f.); for the high priest (Dn 11 22). The same word is used for other high Temple officials and translated variously "ruler" (I Ch 9 11, etc.), "governor" (II Ch 28 7 AV), also for a military officer (II Ch 32 21, "leader" RV). (5) nādhībh, 'willing' or 'noble' in character, then in rank; a poetic term for nobles or princes

(I S 2 8; Job 12 21; Ps 107 40, etc.). (6) nāṣīkh, a late word perhaps from Assyr. nasîku (vb. nasâku, 'to anoint' or 'install') (Jos 13 21, "dukes" AV; Ezk 32 30; Mic 5 4; Ps 83 11 [12]; Dn 11 8 AV, "molten images" RVmg. correctly). (7) nāsī', 'one lifted up,' 'a chief prince.' It is used of Solomon (I K 11 34); elsewhere (except in Ex 22 27) it occurs only in Ezk, P, and Ch, for which AV usually has "prince" but also "captain" and "chief" in P. RV renders almost uniformly by "prince." In Ezk it is used of Zedekiah (7 27, 12 10, 12, 21 30, 19 1); of chief men of Judah (21 17, 22 6, 45 8, 9); of the future Davidic king (34 24, 37 25), and theocratic ruler (44 3, etc., chs. 48 f. often); and of foreign princes (26 16, 27 21, 30 13, 32 29, 38 2, 3, 39 1, 18). In P it is used of non-Israelite chiefs (Gn 34 2; Nu 25 18; Jos 13 21), of Abraham (Gn 23 6); heads of Ishmaelite tribes (Gn 17 20, 25 16); elsewhere in P and Ch of rulers of the congregation (Ex 16 22; Jos 9 15, 18, 22 30, 34 31, 35 27; Lv 4 22; Jos 9 18b, 19, 21, 17 4, 22 14, 32) and especially of the tribal chiefs and representatives in their religious organization (Nu 1 16, 44, 2 3, etc.; fifty-seven times, especially in Nu chs. 2, 7, and 34; I Ch 2 10, 4 38, 5 6, 7 40; II Ch 1 2; I K 8 1; II Ch 5 2). (8) sᵉghānīm, a loan-word from Assyr. sâknu (vb. sâkânu, 'to set,' 'appoint'), which means the 'prefect' of a conquered province (Is 41 25 AV, "ruler" RV, "deputy" RVmg.). For other renderings of this word cf. Ezk 23 6, 12, 23; Jer 51 23, 57. (9) partᵉmīm (from the old-Persian fratama, 'first') (Dn 1 3, "nobles" RV; cf. Est 1 3, 6 9). (10) qātsīn, 'decider'; used of a military chief (Dn 11 18 AV, "captain" RVmg.; cf. Jos 10 24; Jg 11 6, 11); more generally, of a man in authority (Mic 3 1, 9 AV, 'rulers' RV; Pr 25 15 AV, "rulers" RV, "judge" RVmg., where Toy reads qetseph, 'anger'; cf. Is 1 10, 22 3; Pr 6 7). (11) rabh, 'chief' (Jer 39 13, 41 1 AV, "chief officers" RV) (see OFFICER (7)). (12) rabhrᵉbhān (Aram.), 'lords'; used of Babylonian kings (Dn 5 2, 3 AV, "lords" elsewhere). (13) rāzōn, 'a potentate,' parallel to 'king' (Pr 14 28). (14) rōzēn, ptcpl. of rāzan, 'be weighty,' 'commanding' (Jg 5 3; Pr 8 15, 31 4; Hab 1 10, parallel to "king"; Is 40 23, parallel to "judges"; cf. "rulers" in Ps 2 2). (15) sar, 'ruler,' 'captain,' 'prince' (corresponding to Assyr. sărru, 'king'). This term occurs very often, more especially in the later O T literature, for various officials of high rank under foreign kings; of Ammon (II S 10 3; Am 1 15; I Ch 19 3); of Assyria (Is 10 8, 31 9); of Babylon (II Ch 32 31; Ezr 7 28; Jer 38 17, 18, 22, 39 3, 50 35, 51 57); of Edom (Is 34 12); of Egypt (Gn 12 15; Is 19 11, 13; Jer 25 19); of Elam and Media (Is 21 5; Jer 49 38); of Gilead (Jg 10 18); of Greece (Dn 10 20); of Midian (Jg 7 25, 8 3); of Moab (Nu 21 18, 22 8 ff., 23 6, 17; Am 2 3; cf. Jer 48 7, 49 3); of Persia (Est 1 3, etc.; Dn 10 13, 20, and in RV 8 9, 9 3); of the Philistines (I S 18 30); of Succoth (Jg 8 6, 14); for officials under kings of Israel and Judah (never for king's sons); under David (I Ch 22 17, 23 2, 24 6, 29 24; Ezr 8 20); Solomon (I K 9 22; I Ch 23 2); Jehoshaphat (II Ch 17 7); Ahab (I K 20 14 ff.); Hezekiah (II Ch 29 30, 30 2 ff., 31 8, 32 3); Josiah (II Ch 35 8); Jehoiachin (Jer 24 1 = II K 24 12, 14); Zedekiah (II Ch 36 18; Jer 24 8, 34 21); in general (Job 3 15, etc.; Ps 45 16 [17], etc.; Pr 8 16, etc.; Ec 10 7, 16, 17); for officials of Judah or Israel (II Ch 12 5, 6, 21 4, 22 8, etc.); of the tribes (Jg 5 15, Issachar; I Ch 28 1); of the post-exilic community (Ezr 8 25 RV, 29, 9 1, 2, 10 14; Neh 11 1, 12 31 f.); of the host of Jehovah (Jos 5 15 RV, "captain" AV); of the sanctuary (I Ch 24 5 ff., "governor" AV). The RV often renders it by "captain," for a military officer ("prince" AV; e.g., I Ch 27 22; II Ch 21 9, etc.). (16) shālīsh, 'military officer' (Ezk 23 15), but elsewhere rendered "captain." (17) ἀρχηγός, 'chief leader,' used of Christ (Ac 5 31; cf. the same word in Ac 3 15, "author [RVmg.] of life"; He 2 10, 12 2, "captain" AV, "author" RV). (18) ἄρχων, 'ruler' (Mt 20 25; I Co 2 6, 8; Rev 1 5, all AV). The "prince" of the evil spirits is referred to (Mt 9 34, 12 24; Mk 3 22; Lk 11 15, "chief" AV), the ruler of the irreligious world (Jn 12 31, 14 30, 16 11; Eph 2 2). (19) ἡγεμών, 'first,' 'chief' (Mt 2 6, quoted from Mic 5 2 [1], which reads: 'among the thousands ["families" mg.] of Judah'). The Heb. 'alphē, 'thousands of,' was read as 'allūphē, 'chiefs of.' C. S. T.

PRINCES, THE SEVEN: Seven men named in Est 1 14 as those who were privileged to see the king's face and sit "first in the kingdom." Their names are given as "Carshena, Shethar, Admatha, Tarshish, Meres, Marsena, and Memucan, the seven princes of Persia and Media." Though these names are not evidenced otherwise, they seem to be of Persian formation, and the statement in the book may thus rest on a historical foundation. E. E. N.

PRINCIPALITY, PRINCIPALITIES (ἀρχή, ἀρχαί): Angelic beings which, according to Jewish speculations current in N T times regarding the world of spirits, were arranged in different ranks, and were denoted by the term ἀρχή (pl. ἀρχαί). Paul makes use of this terminology (Ro 8 38; Eph 1 21, 3 10; Col 1 16, 2 10, 15), without implying to what extent he accepted such speculations as true. In Eph 6 12 the ἀρχαί are evil powers. In Tit 3 1 powers of this world are meant. See also ANGELOLOGY, § 5. E. E. N.

PRISCA, pris'ca (Πρίσκα, or in some places the dim. form Πρίσκιλλα): The wife of Aquila (q.v.) and always mentioned with him. Since in Ac 18 2 it is only affirmed that Aquila was a native of Pontus, from the form of Prisca's name in Ac (Priscilla), we are justified in assuming her Roman origin (cf. the Cœmeterium Priscillæ at Rome), if indeed the name of Aquila also be not that of a Roman freedman (CIL, VI, No. 12,273). From the fact that when the two are mentioned the name of Prisca often precedes that of her husband (less often in D), it has been inferred that she was the more important personage of the two (Ro 16 3; II Ti 4 19; Ac 18 18, 26). According to Harnack (ZNTW, 1900, pp 16–41) Aquila and P. (mainly the latter) were the possible authors of He. There is, however, no positive proof of the hypothesis. J. M. T.

PRISCILLA, pri-sil'a. See PRISCA.

PRISON: A term used for several Heb. and Gr. expressions: (1) bēth hā-'ăṣūrīm ('ăṣīrīm Qᵉri), 'house of the bound [i.e., prisoners]' (Ec 4 14); Jg 16 21, 25. Moore (Int. Crit. Com. ad loc.) would read pl. of 'ēṣūr, 'bond'; cf. the following. (2) bēth hā-'ēṣūr,

'house of the bond' (Jer 37 15). (3) bēth hak-kele', 'house of confinement' (I K 22 27=II Ch 18 26; II K 17 4, 25 27; Jer 37 15 18; Is 42 7, 22; Jer 37 4 [cf. Q^ri and K^thibh], 52 31); cf. "prison [kele'] -garments" (II K 25 29=Jer 52 33), lit. 'garments of imprisonment.' (4) bēth ṣōhar, 'the round house': a tower(?), the name of or for a prison in Egypt (Gn 39 20-23, 40 3, 5). Ṣohar is perhaps a Hebraized Egyptian word. (5) bēth hap-p^equddāh, 'house of visitation' (i.e., punishment) or 'oversight,' in Babylon, in which King Zedekiah was imprisoned (Jer 52 11). (6) mahpekheth, 'stocks,' an instrument in which legs and arms were confined, compelling a crooked posture. They were used as a punishment for Jeremiah (Jer 29 26, "stocks" RV; cf. Jer 20 2, 3) and for Hanani (II Ch 16 10, "house of the stocks" RVmg.). (7) maṭṭārāh, 'guard,' 'ward,' used with ḥatsar, "court of the guard" RV (Jer 32 2, 8, 12, 33 1, 37 21, 38 6, 13, 28, 39 14, 15; Neh 3 25), except Neh 12 39, "gate of the guard." This court was in the king's palace, and Jeremiah was placed there to keep him from working against the king, perhaps also to protect him (Jer 38 28; cf. vs. 24 ff.). (8) maṣgēr, 'dungeon' (Is 24 22), a figure for exile (Is 42 7, "dungeon" RV; Ps 142 7 [8]). (9) 'ōtser, 'coercion' (Is 53 8, "oppression" RV correctly). (10) bēth ham-mishmār, 'house of the guard' (Gn 42 19), a place of detention, translated elsewhere "in ward" (Lv 24 12; Nu 15 34; cf. mishmār in Gn 40 3,4, etc.). (11) In Is 61 1 "prison" is supplied in EV after p^eqaḥ-qōaḥ, 'opening,' as a figure of freeing from the darkness of prison. (12) δεσμωτήριον (Mt 11 2; Ac 5 21, 23, 16 26, "prison-house" RV). (13) οἴκημα, 'a dwelling-place' (Ac 12 7, "cell" RV). (14) τήρησις, the place where prisoners were kept (Ac 5 18, "ward" RV; cf. 4 3, "hold" AV, "ward" RV). (15) φυλακή, 'a place where captives were kept,' the term most often used in the N T (Mt 5 25; Mk 6 17; Lk 3 20; Ac 5 19, etc.), and in the LXX. for the more common Heb. terms. (16) The RV (in Mt 4 12; Mk 1 14) renders παραδοθῆναι by "delivered up" ("cast into prison" AV). C. S. T.

PRISON GARB. See Crimes and Punishments, § 3 (b).

PRIZE (βραβεῖον): The reward for victory in the Grecian athletic contests, consisting of a simple wreath, composed, in the Isthmian games (near Corinth; cf. I Co 9 24) of pine, in those at Olympia of wild olive, etc. The honor was intensely and universally coveted. In Ph 3 14, where the language is metaphorical, the prize is the purified heavenly life, the reward for success in the Christian race. S. D.

PROCHORUS, proc'o-rus (Πρόχορος): One of the "seven" chosen to administer the charities of the Jerusalem Church (Ac 6 5). See Church, § 3. E. E. N.

PROCONSUL (ἀνθύπατος, deputy AV): The past consul or past pretor acting in the provinces as deputy consul. After 53 B.C. five years must elapse before the past pretor could become proconsul. The proconsul was clothed with military, civil, and judicial authority. His powers were unlimited. The term of office was one year, but often prolonged. Two such officers are named in the N T, Sergius Paulus (Ac 13 7 ff.) and Gallio (Ac 18 12). Reference is also made to the office without specific mention of persons (Ac 19 38). J. R. S. S.

PROCURATOR. See Governor.

PROFANE: The term renders the Heb. words (1) ḥōl (Ezk 22 26, 42 20 AV, but "common" RV) fr. ḥālal ('to be loose'), used in the sense of 'to profane,' etc.; very frequent in the law as the opposite of 'to be holy' or 'clean'; (2) ḥānēf (Jer 23 11, 15, but "hypocrisy" AVmg. and "ungodliness" ARV); and (3) the Gr. βέβηλος, 'impious' (I Ti 1 9). A. C. Z.

PROFESSION. See Confession.

PROGNOSTICATOR. See Magic and Divination, § 7.

PROMISE: In the O T both the verb and the noun "promise" are used in the ordinary sense of a declaration of one's intention. The Heb. text of the O T has, in fact, no word equivalent to "promise," but uses the more generic term 'word' and the verbs 'to speak,' 'to say.' In the N T, on the contrary, the terms rendered "promise" (ἐπαγγελία [especially with the article], ἐπάγγελμα, ἐπαγγέλλεσθαι) are specific to the point of technicality.

Of all the N T writers, the Apostle Paul gives the clearest conception of what was understood by "the promise." Even in his speech before Agrippa, he defines it as the central fact of Jewish religious thought that God of old had declared His design to visit His people in the person of His Anointed (Ac 26 6, 7). This promise had been fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth. For Paul, 'gospel' and 'promise' are equivalent. That was the 'promise' before Jesus came, which is the 'gospel' after He completed His work; conversely, that is the 'gospel,' since the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, which was the 'promise' under the O T. In this sense Paul makes the promise the only revelation of the mode of salvation. It was by the promise that men were saved under the O T, not by the Law. For the promise was made to Abraham, and Abraham antedates the Law by four centuries (Gal 3 17). This is evidently the force also of the argument in Ro ch. 4. How far the same thought was in the mind of Peter when he declared in his discourse on Pentecost that the promise had been intended for his hearers does not appear very plainly. But his appeal is to a well-known expectation, and he aims to arouse a vivid realization and appreciation of the content of the promise.

The promise stands related to the general subject of prophecy as the heart to the whole body. It is at its very core and constitutes its life principle. The promise is, therefore, related to the covenant as another equivalent for God's share in it. But, like the covenant, it was conditional and must be appropriated by the individual for himself through the act of faith. Hence the inseparable connection of faith and promise in Paul's discussion (Ro ch. 4). A. C. Z.

1. Names.

The names given the prophet in the Bible are quite significant. In the O T he is called rōeh, ḥōzeh, nābhī' The first two, almost synonymous, from roots rā'āh and ḥāzāh both 'to see,' suggest the man of vision. The prophet is thus as one whose sight pierces through the veil that hides the world of Divine things, or one for whom this veil is lifted occasionally so that he obtains an inner knowledge of the realities beyond. The term nābhī' (from nābhā', weaker form of nābha', 'to bubble up,' 'pour forth' [a stream of words]) presents the prophet as a man of speech, one who gives forth words under strong excitement, or in an exalted state of feeling. The difference between the first two and the third of these terms lies in the fact that the first two point to the method of the prophet's receiving his information and the nature of that information, whereas the third points to the method of the delivery of his message. In addition to these strictly technical terms, the prophets had applied to them other designations, more or less descriptive of their office and work. They were "keepers," or "watchmen" (Is 21 11 ff.; Jer 6 17; Ezk 3 17, 33 7; Mic 7 4; Hab 2 1 ff.; Is 52 8, 56 10, 62 6), "men of God" ("man of God," "the man of God," I S 2 27, 9 6 ff.; I K 12 22; II K 4 21, 25), "servants of J״" (Is 20 3; Jer 25 4, 26 5, 29 9, etc.), "messengers of J״" (Is 42 19, 44 26; Hag 1 13; Mal 3 1). In the N T the common term is προφήτης (from πρό, 'before,' and φῆναι, 'to speak'), 'one who speaks before,' not, however, in time (predicter), but in place, i.e., one who stands in the presence of (before) an august personage, as a minister before the king, and communicates his will to the people, who have no immediate access to him. A prophet is then a servant of God who represents him before men. He is thus the obverse and complement of the priest. Just as the priest represents the people before God, taking their prayers and offerings into His presence, so the prophet represents God to the people, taking His message or word to them.

2. Development of Prophecy.

In its origin Hebrew prophecy is associated with kindred developments among the non-Israelitic peoples, and is rooted in the desire to know the Divine will with reference to the ordinary affairs of life. It is this desire that has produced among all the races of mankind the countless forms of soothsaying and divination. The religious element lying at the root of this search for supernatural information was, however, among the Israelites purged of its lower associations, and as it gained spiritual strength, grew into public-spirited and lofty service of God on the one hand, and of His people on the other. From another point of view, "the man of God," first serving men as an informant of the Divine purposes regarding their private affairs, was called of God to the higher mission of a vehicle of His spirit and voice, to the end that His kingdom might be advanced upon earth. The development of prophecy in Israel thus includes two distinct periods with a long transition between them. The first period extends apparently to the days of Samuel, and the transition ends with the appearance of Elijah. During this age of transition two types represented respectively by the titles seer (rōeh) and prophet (nābhī') existed. These were distinct from each other, and neither of them was exactly what the prophet later became, e.g., in the days of Elijah or Isaiah (I S 9 9). The change began by the transfer of the name of the prophet to the seer and the gradual obliteration of the distinction. That the individualistic conception of the prophet's function survived long into the transition period is clear from such facts as Saul's consenting to consult a seer with reference to the lost asses (I S 9 6), Ahaziah's sending an embassy to Baalzebub to know whether the injury he had received from an accidental fall would prove fatal (II K 1 2), and Jehoshaphat's inquiring of the prophets whether the campaign on which he and Ahab of Israel were venturing would result in victory (I K 22 5 ff.). On the other hand, long before what we have called the period of transition, Hebrew prophecy had cast off those cruder outward practises (the observation of the flight of birds, of the entrails of sacrificial victims, incantations, etc.) by which the Divine will was supposed to be conjured into view. Urim and Thummim, ephod, and even sacrifice as means of consulting God were relegated to the priestly office (see URIM AND THUMMIM). It was very late, however, before the prophetic spirit so completely possessed its subjects as to make them trust to the moral force and rational conviction inherent in their message. In the earlier ages the prophets did not hesitate in enforcing their words to use violent physical measures. Samuel hewed Agag to pieces (I S 15 33), Elijah put to death the prophets of Baal (I K 18 40), also those emissaries of King Ahaziah who had addressed him disrespectfully (II K 1 10, 12). Elisha cursed, in the name of J״, the lads who ridiculed him (II K 2 24). In the latest times it was most usual for the prophet to endure suffering in the faithful execution of his work (see, however, for an early example of this, the case of Micaiah, I K 22 27).

3. 'Schools' of Prophets.

During the later portion of the period of Judges the prophets come into view in organized communities or 'schools.' These were associated with the worship of J״, for they are connected with the shrines located at such places as Jericho (II K 2 5), Gilgal (II K 4 38), Ramah (I S 19 18), Gibeah (I S 10 5, 10), and Bethel (II K 2 3). From these centers they exerted a strong influence, and their appearance at any particular spot was often the signal for the outbreak of a contagious religious fervor. Saul, on being anointed king, fell in with a company of them, and "the spirit of God came mightily upon him," rendering him, for the time being, a sharer of their characteristic activities, which, it is said, gave rise to the proverbial utterance:

"Is Saul also among the prophets?" (I S 10 11 f.). The great leader of these prophetic gilds (whether he was also their first organizer does not appear clearly) was Samuel. His occupying the position of "judge" no doubt added to the esteem in which the prophets were held for their own sake. It may have been due to his influence that Saul suppressed the heathen counterpart of prophecy in Israel and made the practise of necromancy and soothsaying together with other forms of magic arts unlawful. The fact that he was himself the first, and only one on record, to violate this law (case of the witch of Endor, I S ch. 28) is all the more significant of the consciousness that the difference between prophecy as a factor in the life of Israel and the divination common among the heathen was vivid, and that the true nature of prophecy was appreciated by the intelligent Israelite.

4. The Prophet as Statesman.

It was of the essence of theocracy that it fostered dependence upon him who knows the will of God, i.e., the prophet. In the administration of the affairs of government the knowledge that was within his reach was absolutely essential. The part of the prophet, therefore, in the Israelite state was from the beginning conceived to be of the utmost importance. Moses, the dictator of the Exodus period, is pictured as the ideal and prototype of all subsequent prophets (Dt 18 18, 34 10). His successor Joshua took up this part of Moses' work as well as the political, without, however, being given the technical name of prophet. Samuel combined in his person the offices of judge and prophet. With the coming of the monarchy the kings had beside them what may be called court-prophets. Gad was "David's seer" (II S 24 11). Heman is given the title of "the king's seer" (I Ch 25 5). With the division of the kingdom, and the corruption of the worship of J″ by Jeroboam, there arose a natural antagonism between prophets and kings, reaching its culmination in the fierce conflict engaged in by Elijah on one side and the dynasty of Omri on the other. It does not appear that Elijah was a member of any prophetic school, but in his implacable warfare against Baalism and his determined efforts to put it down he doubtless had the sympathy, if not the outward support, of all the prophets of J″. His primary object was to purify and restore the worship of J″ to its ideal condition. It is this that gives him his epoch-making significance in the history of Israel (see ELIJAH). Under Elisha the same purpose was maintained, and even more successfully pressed, since Elijah had already fought the hardest part of the battle. The combined ministries of these two prophets cover a period of 100 years (circa 875–775 B.C.), and as the closing years of the later prophet probably overlap the earlier portion of the ministry of Jonah the son of Amittai (II K 14 25), and possibly that of Amos, they lead up to the type of prophecy that is best known. It is true that the dynasty of Jehu did much to conciliate the prophets by reinstating the worship of J″, and His servants as the counselors of the kings (II K 10 30 ff.), but the relation of kings and prophets never became quite ideal in the Northern Kingdom. When Amos came forward, he did not meet with a cordial reception. It is true he did not possess the professional training and was not classified as a prophet, but this does not altogether account for the surprise and annoyance of the royal party at his appearance in Israel and the effort to get rid of him (Am 7 10-13).

5. The Prophet as the Preacher of Righteousness.

The type of prophet represented by Amos became permanent. It is a type that combines in the same personality the character and work of the high-minded, independent statesman and that of the teacher of pure morals and preacher of spiritual monotheism. The prophets of this class took part in public affairs, but they were for the most part content to address their words to the people. They stood in the position of semi-independent leaders, molding the affairs of society and of the state from the point of view of the moral principles involved in the religion of J″. Their efforts were largely aimed at the leavening of the body politic with the leaven of sound ethical teaching, though they did not always refrain from urging definite programs in the event of great public crises. Isaiah clearly outlined to Ahaz what he ought to do in view of the Syro-Ephraimitic alliance (7 3 ff.), and Jeremiah performed a similar duty toward Jehoiakim and Zedekiah (36 27, 38 14); but, on the whole, the prophets would have been content to leave the course of affairs to be determined by the new state of moral life engendered by their preaching. They never flinched from exposing the evils that were sapping the national life, or from denouncing unprincipled leaders and warning against short-sighted policies and foreign alliances.

6. Prophetic Inspiration.

The secret of the prophets' power was the invincible conviction in their own souls and in the souls of those who heard them that the message which they delivered was not their own invention, but came directly from the God whom they served. They felt themselves to be appointed to their life-work and equipped for it by an irresistible influence which was none other than the very spirit of J″. They represent this spirit as filling and possessing them and impelling them in their labors (Mic 3 8; Ezk 11 5). It was as if a mighty hand had seized them and was moving them on in spite of themselves (cf. Ezk 3 22, "the hand of Jehovah was there upon me"). The first touch of this influence was often a vivid experience recognized as a solemn inauguration into their life-work (Is 6 1 ff.; Jer 1 4 ff.; Ezk 1 4 ff.). In many cases the call was met with a natural reluctance growing out of a sense of insufficiency for the great duties brought into view. Jeremiah pleaded his youth and lack of fluency in speech (1 6). Ezekiel was prostrated by the overpowering sense of God's presence and had to be raised and encouraged before he could take up the task assigned him (1 28, 2 1 f.). Long before these, Moses had passed through a similar experience (Ex 3 11 ff.). But once yielded to, the call made them brave and carried the assurance of a Divine commission at each successive service involved in it. "The word of Jehovah came" to the prophet as occasion required (Jer 14 1, 15 1, etc.; Zec 8 1, etc.).

Just how this took place is not said. In many cases it was through visions (see REVELATION, IDEA OF). Hence they could speak of their messages with the formula, "Thus saith Jehovah" (Am 1 3, 6, etc.; Mic 6 1, etc.).

7. False Prophets.

The name "prophet" was from the beginning taken by many who did not realize its meaning, had no idea of the work and office, and no right to it. The first occasion on record when it became necessary to discriminate between these and the true prophets of J" was in the reign of Jehoshaphat, when Micah, the son of Imlah, stood up against the 400 'false prophets' (I K 22 6). The difference between the true and the false was in this case presented as consisting not in the source of the inspiration of the two classes, but in the motives actuating the men on each side. It was the same J" who sent the "lying spirit" to Zedekiah and the spirit of truth to Micaiah, but He sent the former, because Zedekiah was more anxious to speak words pleasing to the king than to tell the truth which God might make known to him, and the latter, because Micaiah cared nothing for the feelings of the king, and was intent upon declaring the will of God alone. The consequence of the affair is given in the form of a plan of J" that Ahab should be lured to his destruction. Micah (2 11) presents the same distinction. The false is he who accommodates his message to the corrupt state of mind of his hearers, and preaches what is pleasing to them. In a certain sense the false prophet is a creature of the popular demand for smooth sayings (Is 30 10 ff.). The motive of such a prophet may be traced to even a most selfish root—he prophesies fair things for a reward, and "whoso putteth not into their mouths, they even prepare war against him" (Mic 3 5). The true prophet could only say of the false that he had not received his inspiration from J". His was a "vision of his own heart" (Jer 23 16-32). The differences between the true and false prophets were, therefore, that the former had (1) a message from J" accompanied by inspiration, (2) an absolute disregard of the acceptability (pleasing effect) of his message on his audience, and (3) a similar disregard of the consequences of his delivering it on his own comfort and outward welfare. On all these points the reverse was true of the false prophet.

8. Test of True Prophecy.

But how are the hearers of a prophet to know that he has a message from God and that his motives in bringing it are pure and unselfish? Evidently, only from the nature of the message and its agreement with what they independently know of God. All external attestations and corroborations must be subsidiary and auxiliary, and therefore yield uncertain and meager results as means of convincing men of the Divine origin of an utterance. Elijah appealed to the supernatural manifestations of power as evidence of the truth of his claim for J" as against Baal, but the effect was insignificant and superficial, because the minds of the people with whom he had to do did not recognize the difference between a miracle whose direct efficient cause was God's will and one which was mediated through magical and occult arts. An appeal is suggested further in Dt 18 22 to the fulfilment of the predictive element in prophecy as a proof of its Divine origin; but from the nature of the case this proof would be of little, if any, use to the persons and the time immediately addressed. What the hearer of a "word of God" wants to know is whether at the time he is listening he can be sure that he is hearing the voice of a true messenger of God. That something predicted will come to pass in the future may accredit him to posterity, or possibly even to the hearer himself in case he lives to see the fulfilment of the prediction, and again have occasion to hear the same prophet, but it can not attest the message for the time and occasion of its deliverance. Hence should the message call for immediate action, it must fail of its purpose, if the fulfilment of the predictive element in it is to be its credential. Hence, too, in the Deuteronomic passage the testing question is given as one that may validate the claim of the prophets to the people as a whole through a series of generations rather than to the individual audiences they may address at particular times. In actual practise also the test was found inadequate and led to complaints (Ezk 12 21-28).

9. Written Prophecies.

At first prophecy, like forensic oratory, was purely oral, perhaps even extemporaneous in form (cf. the terms word, burden, i.e., 'oracle,' 'utterance'). It was natural, however, that so far as it had value for more than the mere occasion that called it forth, it should be preserved. How early the practise of writing down prophetic oracles was resorted to is not known. It is exceedingly probable that certain fragments of very old oracles are incorporated in the works of somewhat later writers. Is chs. 15 and 16 are by many supposed to be an illustration. By a few critics they are even ascribed, upon the basis of an obscure tradition, to Jonah, the son of Amittai, in the reign of Jeroboam II (780–740). It is precisely the reign of Jeroboam II that furnishes the first undoubted writing down of prophecies in the case of Amos. From the days of Amos onward the intimate connection of prophecy with government makes it possible to trace its history and note its adaptation to the times. During the days of the growing influence of Assyria, Amos and Hosea were active in the Northern Kingdom, Micah and Isaiah in the Southern. As Babylon prevailed and up to the Exile, Nahum, Zephaniah, and Jeremiah were leading prophets. During the earlier years of the Exile, we have Obadiah, Habakkuk, and Ezekiel, followed at the end of the Captivity by Deutero-Isaiah. The prophets of the Restoration were Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, and those of the post-restoration (Greek) period, down to the middle of the 2d cent. B.C., were Joel (probably), Jonah, and Daniel.

10. Literary Style and Prophecy.

In the matters of diction and style there are, strictly speaking, no peculiarities distinctive of the prophets. They use poetry or prose according to the prevailing custom of their day or the requirements of the particular subject of their discourses. The poetic form is more common in the writings of the earlier canonical prophets and the prose in the later. In general, both in poetical and prose composition, the play of the imagination is large and free. This is, however, due partly to Oriental traits of mind, and partly to the excitation and exaltation of the prophet because of the importance of his message. Vivid figurative language is quite a favorite; but the idea of a technical, symbolical vocabulary devised or developed for use by the prophets only, as, for instance, the choice of the word "day" to signify "year," or of "mountain" to signify "kingdom," is a mere figment of the imagination. Whenever cryptographic expressions are used, as by Jeremiah in his allusion to Babylon under the name "Sheshach" (q.v., Jer 25 26, 51 41), it is precisely as the same method might be used elsewhere than in prophecy. These modes of expression were simply intended to conceal from outsiders the identity of the things alluded to, while they revealed them to the people interested.

11. Interpretation of Prophecy.

The starting-point in the interpretation of prophecy is that the prophetic word is always addressed in the first place to a specific audience. There is no such thing as prophecy dealing with non-existent situations. Every word of God is called forth by a definite time and environment. But when the exigency that has elicited it has passed away, the word does not lose its value; for in meeting the exigency the prophet has announced principles of permanent validity. Whenever similar situations arise in the future the prophecy serves as a standard to be referred to. Circumstances may change, but principles remain the same; and once uttered, principles must be recognized as having bearings whenever similar circumstances arise again. The interpreter must then first ask: What did the prophet intend to say to his immediate audience? and afterward: What underlying principles of his utterance may be taken as his message to the world of mankind for all time? This does not mean that the prophet had two separate audiences in view when he spoke, but that the fundamental positions on which his address is based are the same for all ages.

12. Predictive Prophecy.

The primary object of the prophetic declaration being to bring men into closer harmony with the Divine will (righteousness), the declaration often included appeals to what God had done in the past. The prophet in such a case was a historian. He recorded God's dealings and the occasions in men's conduct (obedience or rebellion) which moved Him in the exercise of His mercy or justice. Much of Hebrew Prophecy consists of these appeals to the past and is in narrative form. In the broadest sense of the word that section of the O T which tells of God's guidance of His people is prophetic. The oldest tradition, true to an accurate instinct, called its contents 'The Prophets' (n'bhī'īm). It includes the Books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings. But the prophet also announced the Divine will for the present, and was in that capacity a preacher. Finally, as he looked forward into the future and declared God's purpose to achieve certain results, he became a predicter. The relation of this power to predict to the natural or acquired sagacity and political insight and foresight, possessed in a measure by all real statesmen, has been made a subject of much discussion. It is sufficient to say that to the Hebrew of the prophetic age such a question would have been meaningless. The power of the prophet to foresee and announce beforehand events which J" designed to accomplish was a gift of J" endowing and distinguishing its recipient as a special agent of God in furthering His will. The prophets as a class did indeed possess a large amount of political sagacity; but they invariably viewed the quality as something not acquired by education, inherited, or otherwise obtained in natural ways, but as a bestowment from on high. But predictions may be of merely passing importance, such as the one by Amos that Jeroboam (II) should "die by the sword" (7 11), or of eternal moment, such as the long line of utterances referring to the establishment of the kingdom of God upon earth. They may be further viewed as absolute and contingent. Inasmuch as the object of the communication of God's will was to bring about a change for the better in the conduct of men, predictions of evil were in the great majority of instances no more than warnings or threats against persistence in evil doing. When the change aimed at by the prophetic word was accomplished, the prediction was canceled. If the people would "amend their ways and their doings, and obey Jehovah, their God," then "Jehovah will repent him of the evils he hath pronounced against you" (Jer 26 13). The mere appearance of absoluteness in a prediction is no sure sign of its being really such. Jonah did not put his prediction that Nineveh should be destroyed in forty days in a contingent form (3 4), and yet when his preaching had had its effect, the actualization of it became unnecessary.

13. Fulfilment.

When, however, what was foreshadowed, either in a general outline of the Divine plan or as a specific event, came to pass, the prophet's word was said to be fulfilled (πληροῦσθαι, Mt 4 14; Lk 4 21). The term is, however, one applied to O T Scripture broadly and not to the predictive element alone (cf. Mt 3 15, 5 17, to "fulfil righteousness," "the law," i.e., 'to obey' and thus vindicate or to fill with a larger meaning; cf. Paul's expression "to establish," Ro 3 31). The actualization of predictive prophecy is its vindication and clarification. But it is not solely on this account that it is called fulfilment, but also because it adds to the significance of the utterance the sanction of the firm conviction that the word spoken was a true one. There can be no question, however, about the use of the expression at times in a rather formal and technical sense. Especially does the phrase "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken" (Mt 1 22, 2 15, etc.) come to have the force of a mere formula of quotation, since it is not always in their original senses that it introduces the words of the prophets.

14. Prophecy in N T.

During the interval between the close of the prophetic section of the O T and the birth of Jesus there was a general feeling that the spirit of prophecy had fallen into silence. When, however, John the Baptist made his public appearance, it was believed that the long silence was broken. At all events, there was a general receptivity toward the words of John himself. When the fame of Jesus works and words went abroad, He was without hesitation accorded by many the name and standing of a prophet (Mt 21 11; Mk 6 15; Lk 7 16). Jesus Himself characterized John the Baptist as a "prophet and more than a prophet" (Mt 11 9). In the days following the first planting of the Christian Church the name was given to that class of ministers whose utterances were accompanied by special signs of spiritual exaltation (see CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, § 6), though they may have lacked the clearness and coherence of others who were more strictly called teachers (Ac 11 27, 21 10; I Co 12 28, 14 29; Eph 3 5; see TEACHING, TEACHER). With the end of the Apostolic Age, this type of ministry seems to have become quite rare and to have completely disappeared during the course of the 2d cent. It was revived, however, at least in name, toward the end of the same century by Montanus and his associates. Since that time the tendency has been to restrict the use of the name "prophet" to the circle of Biblical speakers and writers who brought inspired messages from God to men.

PROPHETESS: In Is 8 3 the word means simply the wife of the prophet, elsewhere a woman exercising prophetic functions. A. C. Z.

PROPITIATION: This word is used by RV only four times in the N T (Ro 3 25; He 2 17; I Jn 2 4, 4 10). The revisers were careful to show in their marginal readings that in two other places the same Greek root is used. In the publican's prayer (Lk 18 13) for "be merciful to me" they suggest "be propitiated to me." In He 9 5 for the "mercy-seat" they suggest "the propitiatory" These two marginal readings take us directly back into O T usage, whereas the other four, as applied to a person, are peculiar to the N T.

1. In the O T the Heb. word (kāphar and derivatives) is generally translated in the LXX. by the Gr. word ἱλάσκεσθαι and derivatives, which become "propitiate" in the English N T. But in the English versions of the O T "propitiate" is never used. In its place very often appears the word "atonement," which again does not occur in RV in the N T (and in AV only in Ro 5 11). In the O T the uses of kāphar, whose root meaning is 'cover,' are most varied, and the translations likewise vary (cf. Gn 32 20, "appease," lit. 'cover his face'; Lv 4 20, etc., "make atonement"; Ps 65 3, 79 9; Is 6 7, "forgiven," "expiated" mg.; Ps 78 38, "forgave"; Pr 16 14, "pacify"; Is 47 11, "put it away," etc.; on the kappōreth, i.e., mercy-seat, see ARK). But two main usages are to be distinguished as the most extensive and most important. (a) First, we have the use of the word in relation to the effect of sacrifice, especially of the sin-offering (see SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS). It would appear that in some way the blood of the animal (Lv 17 11), when applied to the altar, was thought to 'cover' the sin and even the person of him on whose behalf the priest was acting (Lv 5 18, 19 22). In this class of passages the priest is said to make the atonement, and the result is that God forgives. (b) But in passages which are not concerned with sacrificial ritual kāphar is used of the immediate Divine act of pardon; and in these it is He who 'covers' the sin, hides it from His own eyes, so that His dealing with the sinner is not henceforth in respect of that sin. In at least two passages the word is used with the threat or prayer that sin shall not be forgiven (Is 22 14; cf. I S 3 14, where sacrifice is mentioned, and Jer 18 23). It is remarkable that in many of those passages in which God is said to forgive sin no mention is made of any means of atonement, as in Is 6 7 (where the 'coal' or 'hot stone' from the altar [of incense?] can hardly be equivalent to sacrifice), 27 9; Ezk 16 63; Ps 65 3, 78 38, 79 9. In some of these cases the sin was probably committed 'with a high hand,' i.e., it was a breach of that covenant within which alone the sacrificial system had its force. And hence we find this marvelous act of Divine mercy traced directly and only to the mercy and loving-kindness of God. This region of experience remained for Israel inexplicable. How can men account for, or trust in, a mercy which covers sin even before repentance (Cheyne on Is 27 9)? And why should atonement—the covering of sin with blood—be necessary for sins of infirmity and ignorance, and none be needed for those which strike at the very throne of God? It is superficial to solve the problem by saying that the sacrificial view was lower, because it grew out of primitive notions of the Divine nature and relations, and was really abolished for the higher spirits by the other view that the Divine forgiveness is unconditioned save by the repentance which its promise produces. The two views lived on together in Israel. They seem to find a reconciliation in the Isaianic picture of the servant of Jehovah. They are both justified in the N T experience as created by Christ and described by the Apostles.

2. This is not the place to discuss the Christian doctrine of atonement (see ATONEMENT). We must only refer to the one fact that in the N T Christ Himself is spoken of as taking the place of the sin-offering and becoming the means by which human sin is covered and Divine forgiveness takes effect. In each of the N T passages the word is used in relation to sins and their forgiveness. In Ro 3 25 f. there is the explicit statement that Jesus "in His blood" exercised a propitiative function (Deissmann proves his case [EB, 3033, 3034] that ἱλαστήριον must be taken in general terms to mean 'propitiatory thing,' unless the context compels us to say 'sacrifice.' But his attempt to elude the sacrificial reference in this verse fails because the words "set forth" and "in his blood" make the reference to the death of Christ more obvious and natural than to 'blood fellowship with the exalted spiritual Christ'). In the Johannine passages the word is used without exposition, as if it described a fact most familiar to the Christian consciousness, that Christ Himself, in His whole meaning and value, as well as in His sacrifice, is our propitiation. It is, on the one hand (I Jn 2 4), a ground of confidence and comfort to the man who has sinned, and that because it describes the relation of Christ to our sins (within the covenant, as it were). On the other hand (I Jn 4 10), it is the fact through which the very essence and glory of the love of God has been made known to us. In sending His Son to be the propitiation for our sins, God has gone far beyond the region of sins of infirmity or ignorance. It is all sins, of all men, which have been here dealt with by Christ. And from this act of God, from nothing earlier or lower, we are able to reach the conclusion that God is love. In He 2 17 we are moving among many O T associations. But the all-changing fact here is that we are dealing with a Person of superhuman, nay of supreme, qualities. The Son of God became incarnate (2 14, 17), in order that He might become the kind of high priest who could propitiate as to the sins of the people (cf. Ro 8 3, where περὶ ἁμαρτίας carries with it the idea of sacrifice offered for sins).

The implications here can not be dealt with in this article. Suffice it to point out that (1) the "propitiation" in the sense of 1 (b) above, the covering of sin by God's pardon, is here traced back, as in the O T, to His own spontaneous grace, His holy love. That (2) in the Person of Christ, His Son whom He sent, we again find the propitiation of 1 (a) above. In His death He has somehow "covered" sin. The twofold Hebrew view of Divine forgiveness is here reduced to unity. That (3) this propitiation was not first a theory and then a dogma. It was first an experience and then a message; for they actually found the forgiveness of God; and they found it in connection with, or through, their whole historical experience of the Person of Christ in life and death and life again.

PROSELYTE, pros'ę-lit (προσήλυτος): The common translation of the Heb. gēr, meaning a convert from one religion to another, specifically a convert to the religion of Israel. In the earlier O T usage gēr means simply a resident "stranger" or "sojourner," as distinguished from the nokhrī or 'foreigner' (Dt 14 21; cf. II S 1 13 with II S 15 19). Gradually, however, in the Holiness Code (HC) and Priestly legislation (P) the term was appropriated to the description of the non-Israelite inhabitant of the land who either wholly or in part became incorporated into the religious life of the nation (cf. Ex 12 19, 48; Lv 17 8, 10, 15; Nu 15 14, 15). In I and II Ch gēr is used to designate not only foreigners in the land proper, but other foreigners also who accept the Jewish faith (I Ch 13 2; II Ch 30 25), i.e., the meaning approaches the strictly technical sense of proselyte, i.e., 'a convert from another faith.' See also GENTILES.

1. In the O T.

2. In the LXX. and Later Literature.

While this is not the only sense in which προσήλυτος is used in the LXX. (cf. Ex 22 21; Lv 19 34; Dt 5 14; against Allen in Expositor, October, 1894, pp. 264–275), it is the predominant usage (cf. Nu 35 15; Lv 17 8; I Ch 22 2; To 1 8[ℵ]; Ps 93 [94] 6). This is the only sense in which the word is used in the Mishna (see passages cited by Schürer, GJV[3], III, p. 125), in Philo (De Monarch. I, § 7), and in the N T (Mt 23 15; Ac 2 10, 6 5, 13 43).

3. Development of the Proselyting Spirit.

This gradual change in the meaning of gēr and προσήλυτος indicates a corresponding development in the proselyting spirit in later Judaism, which undoubtedly received an impetus from the universalism of the later prophets, notably the Second Isaiah, while the struggle to 'purify the land' under Ezra and Nehemiah, issuing in the priestly legislation, not only resulted in the incorporation into the religious community of many foreign residents in the land, but actually opened a legal way for the reception of men of other than the Jewish race (cf. Lv 24 22). Moreover, the revival of the national spirit under the Maccabæan princes was accompanied by an active propagandism with resort even to methods of force (Jos. Ant. XIII, 9 1, 11 3, 15 1; cf. also such passages as Is 26 15; Ps 47 8, 60 9 f., which may be Maccabæan). The same spirit was furthered also by the circumstances of the Diaspora, which brought Jews into contact with other races and naturally stimulated their desire not only to maintain their position, but also to enlarge their influence. That as a result large numbers of Gentiles, some of them persons of influence, accepted Judaism either wholly or in part is evidenced not only by Josephus (BJ, VII, 33; II, 39; Contra Ap. II, 40) and the N T (Lk 7 5; Ac 2 10, 13 50), but also by contemporary poets and historians (Horace, Sat. I, 9 68-72; Juvenal Sat. 14 96-106; Dio Cassius 37, 17), and by burial inscriptions (e.g., CIL, No. 29,756; CIGr, No. 9,903).

4. Admission and Status of Proselytes.

The conditions under which outsiders were admitted to the Jewish community and their status naturally varied at different times and in different places. First of all were the proselytes proper who theoretically at least were members of the Jewish community. For these, as in fact for all persons, the priestly legislation required the full acceptance of the Jewish law and of Jewish rites as expressed in the formula, "One law shall be unto him that is home-born and unto the stranger" (Ex 12 49; Lv 24 22; Nu 9 14). This was the condition under which neighboring tribes were incorporated by the Maccabæan princes (e.g., by Aristobulus I; Jos. Ant. XIII, 11 3). In the early Christian Church, also, it was the constant contention of the Judaizing party that converts must at least be circumcised (Gal 6 12). But in the land itself (cf. Ezr, Neh, passim) it was difficult or impossible to maintain this strict standard, so that there gradually grew up a class of adherents much larger in number, commonly called "they that feared Jehovah" (Ps 115 11, 118 4; Mal 3 16), or φουβούμενοι (also σεβόμενοι) τὸν θεόν (Ac 13 43; Jos. Ant. XIV, 7 2; CIL, Nos. 29,759, 29,760, 29,763). As the term itself implies, these had at least renounced idolatry, and probably also observed certain Jewish rites such as the keeping of the Sabbath and abstinence from certain kinds of food (Juv. Sat. XIV, 96–106). Josephus mentions also fasting and the bearing of lights (Contra Ap. 39). It is certain also that immersion, t'ḥīlāh, 'beginning,' was required in the case of adherents as well as of proselytes (cf. Pesach 8 8; Orac. Sibyll. IV, 164). These were also in the habit of visiting the synagogue (Ac 17 4). For the later 'proselytes of the gate' and their relation to 'proselytes of righteousness' see Schürer, *GJV*³, III, p. 127 f.

5. Proselytes and the Early Christian Church.

In isolated cases converts were undoubtedly won directly from among the Gentiles, but in the early Christian period at least most converts came from among the proselytes and adherents to Judaism (Ac 2 11, 6 5, 8 27, 10 2, 11 20, 13 43, 14 1, 16 14, 17 4, 18 7). The missionary zeal of the early Christians was often only a new direction given to the proselyting energy of the Jews (cf. Gal 1 13 f.). There are certain observances and customs of the early Church which in all probability were suggested by Jewish regulations for proselytes and adherents. This may be the origin of the restrictions laid upon the Gentile Christians in the so-called Apostolic decree of Ac 15 29. This also may have been the origin of baptism both as practised by John the Baptist and in the early Church (cf. Didachē, ch. VII, and see also Baptism).

PROVERB: This term renders the following Heb. and Gr. words: (1) ḥīdhāh, of Aramaic origin, meaning 'shut,' 'closed,' hence that which is of hidden meaning—a riddle or puzzle; rendered "proverb" only in Hab 2 6; elsewhere rendered "riddle," "hard question," "dark saying," etc. (2) māshāl (from the vb. māshal, the use of which is similar to that of the noun), root idea, 'comparison'—hence a saying which conveys more than its simply literal meaning, and thus (a) a 'similitude' or 'parable' (Ezk 17 2 ff., "riddle," "parable" AV, 20 49, 24 3, "parable" EV), (b) a "proverb" in the ordinary sense of the word (Pr 1 1, 6, 10 1, etc.), (c) a saying or sayings with some special or even prophetic import (Nu 23 7, 18, 24 3 ff.; Ps 49 4, 78 2; Job 27 1, 29 1, all rendered "parable"), (d) a common proverbial saying (I S 10 12, 24 13), and (e) an expression of contempt or reproach, a taunt (Dt 28 37; I K 9 7, etc.). (3) παροιμία (from παρά and οἶμος, 'way,' hence 'a saying aside from the way,' i.e., not an ordinary saying), a "proverb" proper (II P 2 22), or an obscure or "dark" saying (Jn 16 25, 29 AV). (4) παραβολή, 'comparison' (Lk 4 23 AV; less happily rendered "parable" in RV, although this is the usual meaning of the word). See further Proverbs, Book of, and Wisdom, Wise Men. E. E. N.

PROVERBS, BOOK OF: The Proverbs, or, as in AV, The Book of Proverbs, is entitled in the Heb. Bible simply משלי, from its first word mishlē, 'the proverbs of' (Solomon). The full title of the book in its present form is "The proverbs of Solomon, the son of David, King of Israel." This

1. Name. title was, in all probability, attached to the book by a late editor, on the basis of the captions of the old collections of proverbs now embodied in the book in 10 1 ff. and 25 1 ff.

The analysis of Pr, which is comparatively simple, is as follows:

2. Contents. Introduction, 1 1-6, indicative of the practical purpose the book is intended to serve.

I. The excellence and nature of wisdom and wise conduct, 1 7-9 18.
  1. The practical value of wisdom, set forth by means of sundry warnings and exhortations, 1 7-7 27 and 9 1-18.
  2. Wisdom in its more universal and transcendent aspects, as the only safe principle of life and as the associate of J" in the work of creation, 8 1-36.

II. "The proverbs of Solomon," a collection of 375 (376) wise sayings ("proverbs") covering the general field of practical morality, 10 1-22 16.

III. Two short sections, each having its own caption, 22 17-24 22 and 24 23-34, containing proverbs closely similar in character, but not in form, to those of Div. II.

IV. A second collection of 137 "proverbs of Solomon," similar to those of Div. II. This collection is said to have been made by "the men of Hezekiah, King of Judah," 25 1-29 27.

V. A collection of discourses on various topics:
  a. The "words of Agur," 30 1-33.
  b. The "words of King Lemuel," 31 1-9.
  c. The worthy woman described, 31 10-31.

While the entire material of Pr, both as to literary form and contents, belongs to the 'Wisdom Literature' and manifests the general char-

3. Literary Characteristics. acteristics of that class of literature, the contents of Pr are not of the same uniform character throughout, and it is upon the differences to be observed in the character of the material in the several sections that certain conclusions may be reached as to the age and compilation of the book.

The word 'proverb' (q.v.) is applied in Pr to several distinct literary forms. The simplest of these is a couplet or distich, i.e., an aphorism consisting of two members, which bear both a rhythmic and a logical relationship to each other. The rhythmic relationship consists in the number of accents or beats in each of the lines or members (in the original Heb.). The scheme may be 3 and 3, e.g., 10 7 zēkhér tsaddīq libhrākhā́h, wᵉshém rᵉshā'ím yirqā́bh, or 4 and 3 as in 12 1, or 3 and 4 as in 14 28, or 4 and 4 as in 25 2 (the illustrations are from Kittel). It is not certain that lines of two beats or accents occur. Logically, the two members of a proverb may be related as antitheses (antithetic parallelism) as 10 1, 2, etc., or as both stating the same thing but in different words (synonymous parallelism), or as exhibiting a comparison; or both members may form distinct parts of the same continuous thought, each supplementing the other in a variety of ways.

The couplet is the fundamental form used in Pr and the other Wisdom books (Job, Ec). Only rarely does a tristich (three-membered proverb) occur (e.g., 22 29, 28 24). Quatrains (or double distichs) are, however, frequent. Even in the more discursive parts of the book, where, instead of isolated proverbs, the same subject is discussed in a number of consecutive sentences, the fundamental form of the couplet maintains itself (e.g., ch. 7).

When the book is examined in the light of the use of these various forms, interesting results show themselves. The long section II (10 1–22 16) consists entirely of couplets of three or four beats each (the apparent exception, 19 7, is probably textually corrupt). In this section each couplet is, without exception, a complete "proverb" in itself. No principle of arrangement seems to have been followed in making this collection, unless we discover it in the fact that in chs. 10–15 the parallelism is mainly antithetic, while in chs. 16–22 it is mainly either comparative or continuous. So far as subject-matter is concerned, no order of arrangement can be discovered. Sect. IV (chs. 25–29) presents the same general characteristics as Sect. II. In Sect. III (22 17–24 22), on the other hand, the parallelism is synonymous, and the quatrain (or double couplet) is the form mainly used. In Sect. V, a (ch. 30), the parallelism is synonymous, but there is a tendency to overstep the bounds of the quatrain and make use of three or even more couplets to express the complete thought. In Sect. V, b and c (ch. 31), the synonymous quatrain is the standard form. When we pass now to Sect. I (1 7–9 18), we have, instead of aphorisms consisting of single or double couplets, a more extended treatment of separate themes, e.g., 1 8-19, a warning against keeping company with sinners; 1 20-33, wisdom's call or appeal, etc. Further, all the separate discourses in Sect. I deal with some aspect of the common subject "wisdom," and are pervaded by a peculiar hortatory tone ("my son"), which reminds one of portions of Dt. It is the tone of the teacher, urging his pupil to listen and heed his instruction. This section is, therefore, more of a unity than any other part of the book.

4. Order of Composition.

From the point of view of literary character the proverbs in Sect. II must be pronounced the most perfect. These are not mere popular sayings, but products of the finest literary workmanship. In fact, there are no ordinary popular proverbial utterances, such as might be picked up in the market-place, in Pr. What we have to do with here is the choicest product of the Wisdom schools and presupposes long training and practise before such art could be brought to the degree of perfection we see exhibited in Pr. In point of perfection, the proverbs in Sect. IV are only a little inferior to those of Sect. II. Comparison will show that, in the main, these proverbs are somewhat less polished and sententious, and a little more clumsy than those in Sect. II. In Sect. I the pure "proverb" form is deserted, and the couplet is made use of only to do service in a more extended form of discourse which might better be classed as poetry.

From the foregoing facts certain general conclusions may be drawn as to the authorship and date of Pr. It is evident that the book is not a unity, but rather a compilation of material of varied character, some of which was found at hand by the compiler, in the form of collections already furnished with captions of their own (Sects. II, III, a, III, b, and IV). Two of these sections are entitled "The proverbs of Solomon" (II and IV). The title of the book (1 1) is probably only a convenient designation by a late editor in view of the position assigned to Solomon in Israelitic tradition as the most brilliant of Israel's wise men. In view of the well-attested character of this tradition (I K 4 29 ff., 10 1), it is undeniable that some of Solomon's proverbs may be found in Sects. II and IV. But the Solomonic authorship of either of these two collections is out of the question. The whole background, religious, ethical, social, and political, presupposed in these collections, taken as a whole, belongs to an age much later than that of Solomon. The same observation is true in even greater measure of the other parts of the book (Sects. I, III, and V). On the other hand, it does not seem necessary to come down to a late post-exilic date for Sects. II and IV—undoubtedly the earliest portions of the book. The main arguments relied upon by Toy—for example, the monotheism, the absence of nationalism, the picture of social life, the philosophical conceptions, and the relation to the other Wisdom books of the Jews—apply either only to the book in its present final form or to the other sections (I, III, and V), and are more than counterbalanced by other considerations, especially by the fact that the argument from silence tells equally well against as for a post-exilic date for these two sections. The references to the king, the absence of all references to the predominantly priestly, legalistic type of life of later Judaism, the earnest moral tone—all these point just as significantly to the last century or two of the pre-exilic period (cf. Kittel). Which of these two collections is the earlier is now impossible to determine. Most scholars consider the perfect finished form of the proverbs of Sect. II an evidence of earlier date, but Davidson argues, on the contrary, that the less finished proverbs of Sect. IV are the older. Who the author or authors of these two most ancient collections were is, of course, unknown. All that can be said is that they are the product of the Wisdom schools (see WISDOM, WISE MEN). The other sections of the book are undoubtedly later than II and IV, all of course also emanating from the circle of "wise men." Apart from the Introduction, Sect. I is the latest part of the book and is probably to be dated in the early part of the Greek period or in the latter part of the Persian, i.e., between 350 and 250 B.C.

5. Authorship and Date.

The purpose of the whole compilation is set forth with sufficient clearness in the Introduction (1 1-6); to impart the knowledge of "wisdom," "instruction," the understanding of the words of "the wise," to give to the young man "knowledge and discretion," etc. The purpose was practical, i.e., moral and religious rather than speculative. Pr was thus intended to serve as a book of practical morality in which the purely ethical is not definitely distinguished from the religious. The fundamental note of wisdom is "the fear of Jehovah" (1 7, 9 10, 15 33). The theology of the book throughout is a pure, simple monotheism. There is little reference to existing religious institutions, and yet a strong religious tone pervades the book. There is no irreverence, no atheism or even skepticism. A sincere belief in God and in His wise and just government is everywhere manifest. The ethical principles of Pr might be called to-day utilitarian. But this is only because there was no clear or generally accepted view of the future life. The old eschatology, in which Sheol is simply the final gathering-place of the dead, where existence is only of a negative sort, was still regnant. The reward of good conduct is a truly happy and prosperous life, and that of evil conduct is disaster. Honesty, truthfulness, prudence, temperance, justice, generosity and pity, self-control, industry, humility, purity and chastity—such are the virtues extolled and emphasized in Pr as the marks of the truly wise man. He who neglects these things and practises their opposites is a "fool." The ideal of family life is high. Faithfulness in the marriage relation and obedience to parents are urged with great earnestness. The description of the capable housewife in 31 10-31 is a classic. In all this it is the individual, not the mass or the nation, as so commonly in the Law and the Prophets, who is addressed, and it is individual, not public or national, ethics (and religion) with which Pr is concerned.

Of philosophy, in the Greek sense, there is nothing in Pr. Only in ch. 8 is there an approach to a philosophical line of thought. Here "wisdom" is almost personified and viewed as the universal principle of creation, but the thought is not worked up into a definite theory.

In Pr we have what may be called the practical application of the lofty teachings of prophecy and the formal righteousness of the Law to the every-day life of the individual. The ethical elevation of the Prophets is not reached in Pr, but these practical deductions by the wise men, the teachers of Israel's youth, must have been of the greatest service to religion and morality. The finer Christian virtues of the N T are not to be found in Pr, but this was due mainly to the limitations of the age to which the book belongs. See also WISDOM, WISE MEN.

LITERATURE: The general character of the book is well set forth by Davidson in Enc. Brit., Toy in EB, and Nowack in HDB, all s.v. Proverbs. See also Driver in LOT, and Kittel in PRE[3], vol. xviii (1906); Cheyne, Job and Solomon (1887); Kent, *The Wise Men of Anc. PROVINCE (ἐπαρχία): One of the main divisions of the Roman Empire (Ac 23 34, 25 1). Augustus in 27 B.C. divided the administration of the provinces between the Senate and himself, assigning to the former those undisturbed by war or acute difficulties; so that, under changing circumstances, from time to time provinces were transferred from one jurisdiction to the other. Over the senatorial provinces governors of consular rank in Africa and Asia (of pretorian rank elsewhere), called proconsuls, were appointed, and enjoyed great dignity though little power, as they had no military control. Over the imperial provinces the emperor, at his pleasure, appointed his own imperial legates of consular rank where the military necessities of the provinces were large (of pretorian rank where they were smaller). These legates also directed judicial affairs, holding the power of the sword, and procurators under them were responsible for finance. In the sub-districts of certain imperial provinces, such as Judæa, in relation to the province of Syria (from 6–41, 44–66 A.D.), the procurator had a military command, and could try even Roman citizens, except when they appealed to Cæsar; but Judæa was also to a degree subordinate to the legate of Syria. Not only in Judæa, but in the great cities of Egypt and Asia Minor, the Jews were allowed exceptional privileges under their own laws. On the whole, the provinces were well governed. R. A. F.

PROVOKE: The rendering in most instances of kā'aṣ, to be angry, or irritated, especially of man's sinful conduct as arousing the Divine anger. The verb nā'ats, "to despise," is found in the AV of Nu 14 11, 23, 16 30; Dt 31 20; Is 1 4 (cf. RV). Provocation (He 3 8, 15) is a quotation of Ps 95 8, where the Heb. merībhāh refers to the incident recorded in Ex 17 7 (cf. Nu 20 13). E. E. N.

PRUDENCE, PRUDENT: These words (in AV) render terms from four Heb. and two Gr. roots: (1) bīn, 'to understand' (Jer 49 7, Qal. ptcpl.; Is 10 13, Niph. ptcpl., "understanding" RV; Is 16 18, Hiph. ptcpl., 'skilful' RVmg.; Pr 16 21, 18 15; Is 5 21, 29 14; Hos 14 9 [10]). (2) 'ārōm (Pr 19 25, "beware" AV, "learn prudence" RV), and derivatives; noun 'ormāh (Pr 1 4, "subtilty" AV 8 12, 8 5 "wisdom" AV); adj. 'ārūm, 'to be crafty,' 'shrewd,' always in Pr in good sense of intellectual sobriety and acuteness (Pr 12 16, 23, 13 16, 14 8, 15, 18, 22 3, 27 12). (3) sēkhel, sekhel, 'insight,' 'discretion' (II Ch 2 12 [11], "discretion" RV), and the derived verb sākhal (Niph. ptcpl., 'one who acts circumspectly' (Pr 19 14; Am 5 13), Niph. fut. (Is 52 13, "deal wisely" RV). (4) qōṣēm, 'diviner' as in RV (Is 3 2). (5) φρόνησις, 'understanding,' joined with σοφία (Eph 1 8). (6) συνετός (LXX. for Heb. nābhōn), 'intelligent,' 'having understanding' (Mt 11 25 = Lk 10 21; Ac 3 7; I Co 1 19 from Is 29 14). C. S. T.

1. Canonical Place and Traditional Title.

The Book of Psalms is the collection of the religious national poetry of Israel. In the arrangement of the Heb. O T it constitutes the longest, usually the first, and certainly the chief book of the Hagiographa, or third division of the Canon. Its traditional title in Hebrew is "The Book of Praises" (t'hillīm), and in the LXX. and the N T, "The Book of Psalms" (ψαλμοί), while both Hebrew and Greek thought further associated it with David (τὰ τοῦ Δαυείδ, II Mac 2 13; Ac 2 25, 4 25, etc.), whence has come the title "The Psalms of David" in the older English and other versions. The collective term "Psalter" is derived from the Cod. Alex. of the LXX. (ψαλτήριον, really the name of a musical instrument).

2. Number of Poems and Division into Books.

The book consists of 150 poems in both the Hebrew and the LXX., but the numbering in the latter differs from that in the former, Pss 9–10 and 114–115 being united and Pss 116 and 147 each divided (a 151st Ps is also added in the LXX., but treated as an appendix). The number 150 is doubtless intentional, but is arbitrary, since possibly some Psalms should be combined (as 42 and 43), some should be divided (as 24 and 144), some are duplicates in whole or in part (as 14 = 53; 40 13-17 = 70; 57 7-11 with 60 6-12 = 108, etc.), and all the Psalm-like poems in the O T are not included (as Ex ch. 15; Is ch. 12; Hab ch. 3, etc.). The collection appears to be divided into five books (probably in imitation of the five books of the Pentateuch); namely, I, 1–41; II, 42–72; III, 73–89; IV, 90–106; V, 107–150. The ends of Books I, II, and III are marked by doxologies (41 13, 72 18-19, 89 52), which are evidently not parts of the Psalms with which they appear, and the end of Book IV (106 48) is similarly marked, though whether this is a part of the Psalm is not clear. At the close of Book II there is also a peculiar note, "The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended" (72 20). The division into books undoubtedly has some historical significance, probably indicating a progression in the process of editing. But no one of the books presents an obvious unity of structure or of contents.

3. The Captions or Titles of the Poems.

Most of the poems are accompanied by notes of some sort, usually considered to be captions or titles for the text following, but possibly to some extent directions or rubrics for the text preceding (so Thirtle). These notes are certainly not integral parts of the poems themselves (though so treated in the ordinary Heb. text), but editorial or liturgical remarks upon them. Their date and origin are unknown, but must lie far enough back of the LXX. translation (which, it is to be noted, differs in many details from the received Heb. text) to have become obscure. They consist of several sorts of terms or expressions. Some describe the character of the poem, as mizmōr, probably a technical term for a religious song or 'psalm' (57 times), shīr = 'song' in a more general sense (30 times, 13 of which are with the preceding, in Ps 45 with "of loves" added, and in Pss 120–134 with "of ascents" added), maskīl, maschil, usually supposed to be a studied or instructive ode (13 times, once with shīr, once with *t*ᵉ*phillāh*, and in Ps 88 with both mizmōr and shīr, by an apparent corruption of the text), mikhtām, michtam, the meaning of which is unknown (6 times, especially in Pss 56–60, in the last case with "to teach" added), *t*ᵉ*phillāh* = 'prayer' (5 times), *t*ᵉ*hillāh* = 'praise' (once), and shiggāyon (pl. shigyōnōth, shigionoth, Hab 3 1), perhaps a passionate or dithyrambic song (once). These terms are not used together, except so far as noted. All but the first two, therefore, seem to indicate distinct species or types of writing, though the contents of them hardly bear out this inference. At least they serve to mark the dividing-lines between the poems, and suggest that the collection is made up of pieces of a varied character. It may be that maskīl and mikhtām refer to some liturgical or pedagogic use, now unknown. In this case, they are to be classed with certain marks of intended use, as in Ps 60, "to teach," in Pss 38 and 70, "to remind" (which may possibly have some connection with the incense-offering), in Ps 100, 'for the tōdhāh' (usually interpreted "thanksgiving" or "thank-offering" RVmg.), in Ps 88, "for singing," in Ps 92 "for the Sabbath," and in Ps 30, "for the Dedication of the House." The LXX. adds several more such expressions, for example specially designating Pss 24, 48, 94, and 93 for the first, second, fourth, and sixth days of the week respectively. The expression 'For the Supervisor' (usually regarded as the "Chief Musician" ERV, or 'choirmaster') occurs 55 times (all but three in Books I, II, and III), perhaps in each case belonging to the preceding rather than to the following Psalm (Thirtle). In 28 cases words are added that are supposed to refer either to the desired method of musical rendering or to the particular melodies to be used (as nᵉgīnōth, 'al-tash-ḥēth, gittīth, shᵉmīnīth, maḥălath, nᵉḥīlōth, and 'ălāmōth). The names of melodies in Pss 9, 22, 45, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 69, 75, and 80 are discussed under MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 6. What seem to be attributions of authorship occur with 103 Psalms, of which 75 are ascribed to David (Pss 3–41, 51–65, 68–70, 86, 101, 103, 108–110, 122, 124, 131, 133, 138–145), 12 to Asaph (Pss 50, 73–83), 11 to the Korahites (Pss 42, 44–49, 84–85, 87–88), 2 to Solomon (Pss 72, 127), and 1 each to Moses (Ps 90), to Ethan the Ezrahite (Ps 89), to Heman the Ezrahite (Ps 88, but also assigned to the Korahites, probably by duplication from Ps 87), and to "the afflicted" (Ps 102). The LXX. adds materially to this by giving 12 of the anonymous or 'widowed' Psalms to David (Pss 43, 67, 91, 93–99, 104, 137—the last also to Jeremiah), 4 to Haggai and Zechariah (Pss 138, 146–148—the first, both to them and to David), and 1 to the sons of Jonadab (Ps 71), besides varying from the Heb. in other cases. The matter is further complicated by some variations in the versions and in the Talmudic references, the latter assigning Psalms to Adam (Pss 92, 139), Melchizedek (Ps 110), Abraham (Ps 89), etc. The Hebrew preposition before the name is regularly -ל, which may not mean 'by' in the sense of authorship, but 'pertaining to' or 'associated with.' But Hebrew tradition evidently regarded it as marking direct authorship, and so it has been popularly understood ever since. In 14 cases (Pss 3, 7, 18, 34, 51, 52, 54, 56, 57, 59, 60, 63, 102, 142) notes are added that purport to give the historical occasion at which, or concerning which, the Psalm was prepared and used, all but one of these (Ps 102) being in connection with David. The most striking of these for critical purposes is Ps 18, where the caption is the same as with II S 22 1, and the Psalm itself there follows in full (though with considerable verbal variation). Since II S 22 can hardly be a part of the history proper, but an appendix, this establishes little except that Psalms and readings from the historical books were commonly associated together—a fact otherwise attested by the occurrence in them of a number of such Psalms in situ, though not repeated in the Psalter.

4. Critical Value of the Captions.

If the captions referring to authorship and to historical occasion be received as records of actual fact or of trustworthy tradition, from them must proceed the whole historical view of the book, as well as the interpretation of its individual poems. But Psalter interpretation has tended more and more to give up this assumption as untenable, to study the poems by themselves, and to regard the captions simply as indicating Jewish traditions that probably have no value as direct history. The captions, however, probably help to the identification of certain collections of poems antecedent to the present Psalter, since often those of the same sort appear consecutively, as if taken from a common source. Thus Book I is an unbroken 'Davidic' series (except Pss 1–2), Book II consists of a 'Korahite' series, followed (after Ps 50) by a nearly continuous 'Davidic' series (closing with the colophon, 72 20, repeated verbatim from the source), and Book III consists chiefly of an 'Asaphic' series, with some 'Korahite' pieces added. It is thought that all this indicates that prior to the formation of the present Psalter there was a collection attributed to David, which was used practically entire in Books I and II, and another prior collection, or collections, attributed to the Korahites, to Asaph, etc., which was taken for Books II and III, perhaps with an original arrangement like this: (a) Pss 3–41, 51–72—'Davidic'; (b) Pss 42–50, 73–89—'Korahite' and 'Asaphic.' Book IV is largely made up of ritual songs of a different quality from most of the above-named, which are often supposed to represent still another prior collection. Book V opens with songs of a similar kind, including the Hallel (Pss 113–118), which was used at the Passover and other celebrations, and includes also the Songs of Ascents (Pss 120–134—variously interpreted as pilgrim-songs on the return from the Captivity or for those 'going up' to Jerusalem for worship, or, perhaps better, as songs sung ritually on the steps of the inner Temple court, Songs of Degrees AV), which are followed by a group of 'Davidic' poems (Pss 138–145), either omitted in the earlier editings or prepared in imitation of the pieces then incorporated, and by a final ritual group, or second Hallel (Pss 146–150). These, too, seem to indicate the existence of prior collections. The hypothesis of such antecedent manuals accounts for the appearance of Psalms in duplicate with slight differences of reading. It also bears upon the striking fact that the 'Davidic' pieces are mainly Jahvistic, the 'Korahite' and 'Asaphic' ones mainly Elohistic, and the rest of the collection strongly Jahvistic.

5. Ṣelāh.

The word ṣelāh is of unknown meaning, occurring 71 times in the Psalter and in Hab 3 3, 9, 13—regularly at the end of a verse (except Ps 55 19, 57 3; Hab 3 3, 9), usually at the end of an obvious section or passage, rarely at the end of a psalm (Pss 3, 9, 24, 46, not, however, in the LXX., except in 9, which is grouped with 10). Its appearances are almost confined to the first three "books" of the Psalter (Pss 3, 4, 7, 9, 20, 21, 24, 32, 39, 44, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 52, 54, 55, 57, 59, 60, 61, 62, 66, 67, 68, 75, 76, 77, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 87, 88, 89, 140, 143). In Ps 9 16 it is preceded by "Higgaion." The interpretations of it have varied widely. The LXX. renders it διάψαλμα, apparently meaning a musical 'division,' or 'transition,' but the Targum, the Gr. versions, and early patristic writers, like Jerome, render it ἀεί, semper, εἰς τέλος, εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας, etc., meaning 'always,' or 'forever.' The Heb. form may be derived from a root meaning 'to lift up,' whence comes the modern conjecture that it is a musical rubric calling for a fresh outburst of voices or instruments. But, on the other hand, from its position in the poems it has also been regarded as a sign for a pause or silence. Some have even suggested that it is an abbreviation of an unknown expression. At all events, although not included in the traditional accentuation of the Psalter, it is not to be regarded as an essential part of the text of the poems in which it occurs.[1]

6. Poetic Form.

In their poetic form the Psalms have the features of other poetical books and the detached poems of the OT. These features include a tendency in a given poem or passage to lines of somewhat equal length, in which can often be discerned traces of definite verse-patterns whose laws are now only matters of conjecture, interesting cases of alliteration and assonance, but not of rime, and a striking parallelism between lines, worked out according to several obvious plans. The prevailing verse is the distich, but monostichs are not uncommon at the opening of poems, and tristichs are frequent. The Heb. text is provided with an elaborate system of accents, like that of Job and Proverbs, which is supposed to indicate a traditional mode of cantillation, though just how, and representing what period, is not known. Refrains, marking a stanza-structure, occur in several instances (as in Pss 42–43, 46, 49, 57, 80, 99, 107), and stanzas are fairly evident in some others (as Pss 74–148), besides being suggested in many more. The unexplained word ṣelāh (q.v.), which is appended to certain verses in 70 cases (all in Books I, II, and III, except in Pss 140 and 143), probably has a bearing upon the stanza form, though precisely how is debatable (good cases in Pss 46 and 77, bad in 55 19). Several poems are acrostic or alphabetic by lines (Pss 111, 112), by verses (Pss 25, 35, 145), by double verses (Pss 37, 9–10—the latter very imperfect), or by groups of eight verses, each of which begins with the same letter (Ps 119). Most of these have something of a didactic or homiletic quality (except Ps 145), and the plan was probably meant to aid memorization. As a whole, the Psalter poetry is artistic and finished in style, implying practised skill on the part of the writers or the editors, probably both. (It should be noted, however, that in many individual passages the traditional text is difficult and probably corrupt.)

[1] It is just possible that the word ṣelāh refers to a 'step,' or 'grade,' in the usual place of performance, hence cognate with meṣillāh (II Ch 9 11; Ps 84 5), and perhaps analogous with ma'ălāh, from which comes the title "Song of Degrees" or "Ascents" (Pss 120–134).

Many of the poems fall into obviously related groups, because of a similarity of their topic or their manner, and the way in which these groups are scattered through the collection is perplexing. They suggest that certain types of thought and expression were recognized and in vogue, sometimes with a somewhat stereotyped phraseology and manner. Thus many of the poems have a monitorial or meditative cast (as Pss 1, 8, 15, 19, 24 1-6, 33, 34, 37, 49, 50, 73, 78, 90, 105, 106, 119, 127, 128, 139), often with materials that offer striking similarities to other parts of the O T, especially the Wisdom literature, Jeremiah, and Deutero-Isaiah. These similarities are differently interpreted by different critics, some holding that the passages in the Psalms are primary, some that they are derived. There are several historical poems, either recounting facts from the ancient history of the nation (notably Pss 78, 105, 106, 135, 136, with passages elsewhere), or referring to David (as Pss 18, 89, 132), or dwelling upon certain events, chiefly catastrophes, which seem to lie nearer at hand (as, upon the jubilant side, Pss 48, 76, 83, and, on the despondent, Pss 44, 74, 79, 137, etc.). The historic individuals named range only from Melchizedek and Abraham down to David. Of the tribes, Judah, Ephraim, and Manasseh (or Joseph collectively) are those chiefly mentioned, with slight references to four more. Of places, regions, and countries, Jerusalem (or Zion) and 'the Land' are the only ones repeatedly named, but Pss 83 and 137, with several scattered passages, supply a few other references. The so-called "royal" Psalms, which mention David or a 'king' (Pss 2, 18, 20, 21, 45, 61, 63, 72, 89, 110, 132), are linked together by repeated expressions that imply a settled tradition in which the personality of David, the ideals of the Theocracy, and the national self-consciousness (probably personified as David) appear to be intimately blended. These are often interpreted as being distinctly Messianic in some sense. The Temple is mentioned or clearly implied in at least one-third of the poems, and may be conjectured with many more; and these references are widely distributed. Songs of an evidently liturgical or ritual quality abound, especially in the last two books (but note also Pss 20, 24 7-10, 47, 65 1-8, 67, 84), expressive usually of sentiments like adoration and thanksgiving. Although these contain surprisingly few references to the Temple ritual of sacrifice (which is, however, mentioned or implied elsewhere to a limited extent), they are naturally associated in some way with that ritual, particularly as the Chronicler emphatically, and the older historians more reservedly, speak of the use of jubilant psalmody in the Temple services (I Ch 16 8-36 presents as a continuous song passages equivalent to Pss 105 1-15, 96 1-13, 106 1, 47-48). Still more conspicuous are the poems made up chiefly of outcries under great adversity or objurgations against 'the wicked.' These constitute what is called the 'imprecatory' aspect of the Psalter. Of the many whole Psalms that belong to this class, some are particularly intense in what appears to be a personal reaction (as Pss 35, 109), while others have evidently to do with national conditions. Throughout the collection there is a recurrence of sorrow, indignation, or despair that arrests attention and provokes inquiry. In some cases (as in Pss 12, 37, 69, 88, etc.) two classes seem to be opposed—"the godly," or "the righteous," or "the poor," or "the needy," on the one side and "the wicked" or "the violent man" (or some similar expression), on the other, as if these were distinct groups in the community in more than a general sense.

7. Notable Groups of Poems.

Throughout the collection the pronouns and verbs vary irregularly between the singular and the plural, sometimes in adjacent verses, sometimes in passages, sometimes as between whole Psalms. The question has been extensively discussed whether the singulars always refer to the individual writer, or stand for the nation, or some common consciousness by a kind of personification. Opinions differ widely about given cases; yet the main testimony of the book is probably to prevailing notions and collective experiences, rather than to those of individuals. This view is strengthened by the frequency of conventional phrases and trains of thought.

8. Are "I" and "Me" Personal or Collective?

The critical problem of the Psalms is intricate and difficult. The great questions are evidently three: as to their origin and date, as to the motive and method of their collection into a book, and as to the interpretation consequently to be put upon the book as a whole and upon its individual poems. Certain primary factors in the discussion are particularly hard to define and estimate, as, for example, (a) the stages of development in Hebrew poetry in general, (b) the extent and nature of psalmody in the first Temple, (c) the historic occasions, personal or national, of the strong plaintive or 'imprecatory' tone running through the Psalter, and (d) the priority of the Psalms, or of other books of the O T, in those cases in which quotations in one direction or the other seem to have been made. Within the limits of the present article no attempt will be made either to summarize the varying views of commentators, or even to touch upon all sides of the problem. Some of the diversities of criticism are due to a failure to allow for the probability of compositeness in the book and its parts. The collection as a whole is manifestly not a homogeneous unit, neither are its constituent 'books' nor its apparent serial groups. It may even be reasonably doubted whether some, perhaps many, of its poems are themselves more than editorial or traditional units. Wherever a poem or a group of poems is composite, there is wide opportunity for opposing views about it. The present writer believes that the scrutiny of the individual poems may well be made closer than has been usual, having regard to any signs in them of the combination of materials of different origin, intention, and significance. The obvious difficulty lies in identifying these elements, except by subjective feeling. Exact lexical and logical analysis must be the main criteria. The following statement is somewhat influenced by the attempt to use such helps.

9. The Critical Problem in General.

The periods to which the Psalms have been referred range from that of David (circa 1000 B.C.) to that of the Maccabees (after 167 B.C.). It was once thought that all were either by David, or at least from the early monarchy, unless the contrary could be proved. The extreme opposite view makes all post-exilic (and mostly after 450), and as many as possible Maccabæan. Strong objections to both these extreme opinions lead many commentators to seek a middle position, with the period of the Exile and of the Return taken in some way as starting-points.

10. Origin and Date.

Running through the collection are three prominent types of utterance—the plaintive, the liturgical, and the didactic, each of which is fairly individual in diction, thought, and spirit, though each varies enough within itself to suggest that all are products of more than one period. The tone of the plaintive material is one of gloom, of protest, of repining, of vehement denunciation, of passionate entreaty for an exhibition of God's justice and favor. The mind of the writers is in a state of stress, and conceives of the nation and the world accordingly. The tone of the liturgical material is praiseful, jubilant, and confident, dwelling on the great and good attributes of God and on the universality of His rule in the earth, though often in a rather ceremonious and conventional manner, and with some passing over into prayer as well as praise. The tone of the didactic material is reflective, studious, or hortatory, dealing sometimes with the problems of life, sometimes with the facts of past history, sometimes with the affairs of every-day living, but from the point of view of the observer or the teacher. It is in this latter class of passages that most of the clearest parallelisms occur with other books of the O T, suggesting the existence of such books (if the Psalter passages are not primary). In a general way, the plaintive material suggests the prophetic habit of mind, the liturgical that of the priest, and the didactic that of the wise man or the scribe. On the whole, the plaintive material seems to be earlier than the others. At least, many cases occur in which such material seems to have been liturgically reworked, as if to rectify its pessimism, and to adapt it for continued use after its occasion had disappeared. Some cases also appear where similar material has been didactically reworked, though these are not so clear. There are fairly distinct signs that the intention of the completed collection was partly didactic as well as liturgical. But it should be also said that scattered through the book are passages that do not readily fall into any of these three categories, but which seem to be either older than all or representative of other lines of thought. This unclassified material constitutes a fourth element for study.

Regarding all these, some working hypothesis is required that corresponds with the data of the book itself and also with other known facts of Hebrew history. To the present writer it seems that the following is a reasonable statement: The earliest national situation sufficient to account for the plaintive material as a whole is the Exile (after 586), but the circumstances of the restored nation, a century or more later, favored the retention of this and even provoked additions to it, especially as the national and partizan struggles drew on which culminated in the Maccabæan revolt. But it is not impossible that a pattern for such utterances may have been set before the Exile by individual poets who looked out upon the world with a prophet's eye. With the restoration of the Temple (in 516 B.C.) its services were certainly emphasized and developed as never before, psalmody being one of its conspicuous exercises. The Psalter evidently contains poems intended for such ritual use, establishing a type which may well have been gradually transferred to uses outside the Temple itself, as is evident later in the synagogue. But it is an unsettled question how far formal psalmody had place in the first Temple, so that it is possible that here again the initial impetus was pre-exilic. As to the didactic material, much depends upon the difficult problem of the parallelisms between the Psalter and other books. If Jeremiah, for instance, quotes from Psalms, the latter must precede his time as far as the passages in question go. If, on the other hand, certain historical Psalms presuppose the completed Pentateuch, these Psalms must be post-exilic. So far as can be seen, the didactic poems have no special connection with the Temple system of religion and public worship, though one or two seem to have been liturgically reworked. They belong rather to the discursive and pedagogic tendency that was later concentrated in the institution of the synagogue. They furnish matter for instruction, and for private memorization and quotation (like Proverbs). How early such writing began we do not know, but it certainly was a feature of the post-exilic period. It remains to say that the unclassified material probably represents several periods. Some of it may well be older than the Exile, especially where it shows likeness to the fresh and strong national odes (like the Song of Deborah) that are extant in the histories. But some of it may also be the independent work of individual writers who departed from the beaten tracks of style and sentiment at later periods. It is not at all impossible that the Psalms contain poems, or fragments of poems, from David's time, or from several stages in the monarchy period, but the difficulty of demonstrating such an early origin is certainly great. If the Psalms be thus regarded as a gradually accumulating literature, we must posit for them some popular demand and some recognized channels of use, in order to account for their preservation and for their ultimate acceptance as Scripture. In the Captivity we may assume that local gatherings took place at which religious exercises were attempted. Here Psalms would find their first general use, unless the first Temple had supplied a partial earlier example. After the Return the Temple services offered to psalmody a stated and conspicuous place, though it may be fairly questioned whether the rudiments of the synagogue were not very soon visible, supplying a still further place. As religious gatherings for edification and for catechetical effort won larger scope in the community, of which the fact of the O T itself is an overwhelming evidence, psalmody took a deeper hold on popular affection, and its formulas became more fixed. In this general field of popular usage, then, we may suppose that the Psalms had their origin, the date of most of them ranging from about 575 onward—perhaps as far as the 2d cent. B.C., if any are Maccabæan. But it must be admitted that into this usage may have been incorporated materials that antedate the Exile.

It is generally agreed that the present collection was in large part made out of prior collections. The date of this final editing must have been before the LXX. translation of the Hagiographa (perhaps the 2d cent. B.C.), but how much before is unknown. Who were the editors is also unknown. In the process some of the discriminative features of the prior collections may have been obliterated. In any case, all but the most general conclusions regarding these prior collections seem to be fruitless. Who made them and when and for just what use in each case can hardly be even guessed with assurance. The only exceptions are the series of ritual songs in Books IV and V, which seem to have come from the Temple service-books.

11. Editorial Method and Motive.

It is often said that the Psalter was intended to be a Temple hymn-book as a whole. But the motive must have been more complicated than this, since there is so much that is inconsistent with Temple use and since this latter material is pushed into prominence. It is more satisfactory to say that the present collection was brought together and arranged for personal edification and for use in popular assemblies outside the Temple, though including many Temple songs, and though influenced in details by the forms of expression there used. The musical directions seem to indicate Temple usages, it is true, but the imitation of these outside is not inconceivable. The other features of the captions point rather to traditional associations with facts and passages in books already acknowledged as Scripture, and suggest the synagogue. Various studies have been made as to the reasons for the arrangement of the poems in the order in which they now are. It is likely that in some cases points of verbal correspondence led to the juxtaposition of certain Psalms, but other cases seem to imply an intentional contrast of topic or spirit. It may be that the various editors sought occasionally to temper or offset rather extreme expressions by more moderate ones. In the cases in which single poems seem to have been composed out of different materials, the editorial intention can be traced with more certainty (provided the analysis is assumed to be correct). In general, this process seems to have aimed at the preservation of passages that had become traditional, with enough of amplification or rectification to fit them for continued and general use. This remark applies especially to the rather numerous cases in which plaintive poems are supplied with liturgical endings, openings, or refrains.

The general success of the editorial process is shown by the ready way in which the Psalter passed over from Hebrew into Christian use as supplying formulas for prayer, praise, and devout meditation.

It follows from what has been said that the first value of the Psalter is as a unique source of information regarding Jewish religious conceptions and sentiments as these were held in experience and expressed in public and private devotion. It would seem that the light of the Psalter is fullest upon these matters as they stood after the Exile, when the work of the greater prophets had been done, and when the discipline of the Exile had been undergone. But in it also must be something representing the pre-exilic period, since the national consciousness regards itself as continuous. Scattered through the collection are probably also some traces of influences from outside, from Babylonian ritual and from Persian mythology, though these are woven into the general texture almost as if original.

12. Interpretation and Significance.

Since the book is a miscellany, it needs to be used with discrimination, all parts of it not being equally significant, and some of them offering their true sense only when duly related with others. A conspicuous instance of a poem that is not to be emphasized is Ps 112, which appears to be a surprisingly mechanical echo of Ps 111. One group that requires careful consideration by comparison is that of the so-called 'royal' psalms, which is best handled as a group relating to the ideal Israel as conceived by the devout imagination and hope. All through the book are terms and phrases which in translation must be rendered by expressions that have a special or technical sense in Christian usage. The meaning of these, and hence the massive import of the poems in which they occur, can be made sure only by rather elaborate comparative study of passages both within and without the Psalter. Under such study, however, the book on the whole supplies a singularly vivid and instructive picture of the popular theology, piety, and ethics of Judaism, revealing a profound sense of God's nature, providence, and grace, an elevated outlook upon the world and human life as Divine ordinances, often a fine valuation of some of the facts of sin and of practical ethics, and insights into deep experiences of faith, penitence, consecration, and hope that have a lasting power of inspiration. While it is disputed how much of distinctly personal spirituality is expressed, yet such spirituality is constantly implied in what must be regarded as the sincere and sympathetic treatment of the general ideas expressed. On the whole, the tone of utterance is not only that of the community or the people, but, in some of its strains, that of humanity at large as understood by the Hebrew mind. Among the greater passages referring to the nature and attributes of God, some Psalms are classical—as 139, of His omniscience and omnipresence; 23, as the Shepherd; 91, as the overshadowing Protector; 103 and 107, as the embodiment of a merciful fidelity; and 104, as Creator. The place of man as God's vicegerent upon earth is beautifully set forth in Ps 8. The brevity of human life is dwelt upon in Pss 49 and 90. The two 'ways,' or 'paths,' of righteousness and wickedness are strikingly contrasted again and again, as in Ps 1, and the characteristics of the righteous man are delineated in Pss 15 and 24. Devotion to the Law is elaborately expressed in Pss 119 and 19 7-14. The greater references to sin and forgiveness are Pss 32 and 51, which are not elsewhere in the book paralleled in intensity. A peculiar wistfulness toward public religious ordinances is expressed in Pss 42, 43, 84, and 122, with a passionate loyalty to Jerusalem in Pss 122 and 137. Numerous outbursts of an ardent and exalted faith appear in Pss 27, 33, 34, 37, 63, etc. The greater hymns of praise are Pss 24 7-10, 67, 92, 95, 96, 98, 100, 118, 145, 147, 148, and 150. Special recognitions of Nature as one of the manifestations of God occur in Pss 19 1-6, 29, 65 9-13, and elsewhere; while Pss 18, 50, and 97 contain remarkable 'theophany' passages, in which the majesty of God is depicted in symbols from Nature. Of the songs that obviously have to do with national history, 78, 105, and 106 dwell especially upon ancient times as indicating God's peculiar care for Israel; Pss 44, 74, and 89 emphasize the contrasts between the times of His favor and those of His chastening, and Pss 22, 30, 31, 35, 69, etc., as they now stand, speak eloquently of the emergence from depression into joy, either actual or expected. It is perhaps not too much to say that in Pss 2, 18, 20, 21, 45, 46, 47, 48, and 72 there are signs of a consciousness that Israel is meant by God to be the religious teacher of the world. It is uncertain how definitely are expressed the doctrines of personal immortality or of a future judgment; though the general confidence in God's righteousness and truth, and the touches of "Messianic" expectation in some form, suggest a notable sweep of religious philosophy, apparently not wrought out in detail.

Although it is true that the effect of critical study is to alter the general valuation of the Psalter, what may seem to be lost in personal or individual vividness of self-revelation is more than made up by the bringing into view of many of the diffused national thoughts and sentiments of the people that was set by God as the great Light-bearer in the ancient world.

LITERATURE: The critical and exegetical literature upon the Psalms is enormous in quantity and bewildering in range and variety. Among the many comprehensive commentaries since 1800 the following may be cited as for some reason important for careful students: De Wette (1st Ed. 1811), Ewald (1st Ed. 1836), Hitzig (1st Ed. 1836), Olshausen (1st Ed. 1853), Delitzsch (1st Ed. 1859), Perowne (1st Ed. 1864), Grätz (1882–83), Cheyne (1st Ed. 1888), Bäthgen (1st Ed. 1892), Duhm (1899), Kirkpatrick (1903), and Briggs (1906–07). Of these, Bäthgen's is, on the whole, the most generally serviceable, and that of Briggs the most elaborate. The latter advances positive views about the editorial history of the collection and about its literary form which, if adopted, would necessitate some modification of the statements made in the foregoing article. A stimulating exegetical and homiletical treatment of the Psalter is that of Maclaren (1903–04). W. S. P.

PSALMS OF SOLOMON: This is a collection of short poetic compositions patterned, in general, after the model of the canonical Psalms and grouped together under the name of Solomon, though for what reason does not clearly appear. They nowhere claim to be composed by him. They are independent of one another, but all reflect the conditions of the same general environment and are pervaded by the same tone and spirit. The age of their origin can be fixed with reasonable definiteness as between 70 and 40 B.C. There are clear traces in them of the presence of Pompey on the horizon (called "the mighty striker" who comes from the ends of the earth, 8 16), of Aristobulus II and Hyrcanus II, and of the desecration of the Holy City by the Gentiles (2 20, 8 23, 24), and finally, of allusions to the shameful death of the persecutor in Egypt (2 29, 30). All this points to the days of the Roman conquest. There are eighteen psalms in the collection, and of these Nos. 17 and 18 are clearly Messianic. The former points to the coming of the Messiah, and the latter portrays the glories of the Messianic Age. They were originally written in Hebrew and were known to the ancient Fathers, by some of whom they were conceded a deuterocanonical value. They are extant in a Greek version (ed. by H. B. Swete, 1899). An English edition with critical introduction and notes has been published by Ryle and James (1891). See also the German edition by Kittel in Kautzsch, Die Apokryphen u. Pseudepigraphen d. A T, 1900.

PSALTERY, sôl'tẹr-i. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 3 (3) (b).

PTOLEMAIS, tŏl"ẹ-mê'is (Πτολεμαΐς): A town situated at the N. end of Acco bay, on a tongue of land backed by a fertile plain nearly 4 m. wide. It was an old and flourishing Canaanite town, which was not conquered by the Israelites and is mentioned only once in the O T (Acco, Jg 1 31). Its situation on the commercial road between Mesopotamia and Egypt gave it importance in international struggles, and in the war for Jewish freedom. In the 3d cent. B.C. it received the official name Ptolemais, from one of the Ptolemies. As the natural seaport for Damascus and Galilee in their trade with Egypt, Asia Minor, and the West, it became very prosperous. Paul landed there from Tyre on his last visit to Jerusalem (Ac 21 7).
R. A. F.

PUAH, piū'ā, PUA, piū'a (פּוּאָה, pū'āh, פֻּוָּה, puwwāh; in I Ch 7 1 Puvah, Phuvah AV): 1. The second son of Issachar (Gn 46 13; Nu 26 23) and the ancestor of his clan. He was the younger brother of Tola, who, as eponymous hero of the Tola clan, and one of the minor Judges, was called the "son" of Puah (Jg 10 1). 2. (פּוּעָה, pū'āh). A midwife of the Hebrews (Ex 1 15). C. S. T.

PUBLICAN: A word originally meaning a contractor for public works or supplies, or a farmer of public lands, but later applied to Romans who bought from the government the right to collect taxes in a given territory. These buyers, always knights (senators were excluded by their rank), became capitalists and formed powerful stock companies, whose members received a percentage on the capital invested. Provincial capitalists could not buy taxes, which were sold in Rome to the highest bidders, who to recoup themselves sublet their territory (at a great advance on the price paid the government) to the native (local) publicans, who in their turn had to make a profit on their purchase money, and being assessors of property as well as collectors of taxes, had abundant opportunities for oppressing the people, who hated them both for that reason and also because the tax itself was the mark of their subjection to foreigners. The censors at Rome made the contract with the buyers of the taxes, exacting approved security. The decumani (who farmed the taxes of a district levied on the basis of one-tenth in kind) formed the highest class of publicans; the pecuarii farmed the taxes on public pasture-lands (scriptura), and the conductores portoriorum farmed the duties on imports and exports (portoria). J. R. S. S.

PUBLIUS, pŭb'li-ŭs (Πόπλιος): The chief man in the island of Malta who befriended Paul at the time of his shipwreck on the way to Rome (Ac 28 7), and whose father Paul healed (Ac 28 8). The title "chief man" (ὁ πρῶτος) is found in Maltan inscriptions (Inscr. Gr. Ital. et Sic. 601), and probably refers to the highest Roman official on the island (cf. Cicero, In Verr. 4, 18). The more correct form of the name is 'Poplius,' which may be a contraction of 'Popilius' (see Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and Roman Citizen, p. 343). J. M. T.

PUDENS, piū'denz (Πούδης): An early Christian at Rome who sent greetings to Timothy through Paul (II Ti 4 21). Since the name is found in Roman inscriptions (CIL, VI, 15,066) and was borne by several men of note, the attempt has been made to identify our Pudens, e.g., with Aulus Pudens, the friend of Martial (cf. Epigrams, IV, 13; XI, 53), but without sufficient reason (cf. Ellicott on II Ti 4 21). J. M. T.

PUHITES, piū'haits. See PUTHITES.

PUL, pŭl. I. As personal name, see TIGLATH-PILESER. II. As geographical name, see PUT.

PULSE: (1) The incorrect rendering of the adj. qālī (from qālāh, 'to roast' or 'parch'), meaning 'roasted' or 'parched grain' (II S 17 28, where the repetition of the word is probably a scribe's blunder). (2) In Dn 1 12, 16, the Heb. zērō'īm or zēr'ōnīm means 'that which grows as a result of sowing [the seed]' and consequently "pulse" is too restricted in meaning. Vegetable food in general is meant. E. E. N.

PUNISHMENT. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3.

PUNITE, piū'nait. See PUAH.

PUNON, piū'nŏn (פּוּנֹן, pūnōn): A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 33 42 f.). The name may be the same as "Pinon" (q.v.), which would indicate a locality in Edom. E. E. N.

PUR, PURIM, pŭr, piū'rim. See FASTS AND FEASTS, § 2 (1), and ESTHER, § 6.

PURAH, piū'rā (פֻּרָה, pūrāh, Phurah AV): The servant of Gideon (Jg 7 10). E. E. N.

PURE, PURITY, PURIFICATION: The ideas of cleanness and uncleanness (purity and impurity) are expressed in the Bible through a series of synonymous terms only vaguely distinguishable from one another. (1) The commonest of these are the contrasted ṭāhōr, 'clean,' 'pure,' and ṭāmē', 'unclean,' 'impure,' with their N T equivalents καθαρός and ἀκάθαρτος. Other terms are (2) bārār, with more direct reference to physical cleanness (Ps 18 26). (3) zāk, with reference to freedom from mixture with foreign substances (Ex 27 20; Lv 24 2, 7; Ex 30 20). (4) ḥāmitz, 'salted' (Is 30 24 "clean" AV, "savory" RV). (5) ḥāsaph, 'stripped' (Jl 1 7). (6) nāqī, with reference to moral innocence (Ex 23 7; Ps 24 4). (7) ἁγνός, 'innocent,' 'spotless' (I Co 7 11; I Ti 5 22).

1. Usage of Terms.

Bodily cleanliness, as in itself a desirable and enjoyable condition, was prized in Bible lands as elsewhere. The Egyptian priests bathed their bodies in cold water twice every day and twice every night (Herod. II, 27). That it was not a mere priestly custom appears from the incident of Pharaoh's daughter bathing in the Nile (Ex 2 5). The custom of bathing in public was, however, introduced late among the Jews, and public baths were first built in imitation of the Greeks and Romans (I Mac 1 14). In the earlier period there is no mention of any special arrangement known under the name of bath, unless it be the doubtful instance of the stone basins in which new-born children were washed (Ex 1 16). Bathing (rāḥats, also shāṭaf in I K 22 38) in the O T is the washing of the body for ceremonial purposes (Lv 15 5 ff.; cf. also Jn 13 10).

2. Cleanliness.

But cleanness was regarded as something more than bodily cleanliness. The latter was a part of the former, and the former was governed by the religious motive of acceptability before God. To be clean was, in this sense, to have everything removed from one's appearance or constitution which would bar the way to the free approach into the presence of God. One was clean or unclean as he conformed or failed to conform to certain requirements which were religiously or ceremonially prescribed.

3. Cleanness as Fitness to Come Before God.

From this point of view imperfection of physique, at least as far as perceptible to the eye, was a disqualification for approach to the altar, and to that extent to be reckoned as in the same class with uncleanness, though not formally included under the name (Lv 21 18). Among those whose approach would profane the sanctuary of J" were men that had bodily blemishes, such as lameness, blindness, curvature of the spine (crookbacked), scurvy, etc.

4. Physical Defects Uncleanness.

To be clean, however, was not the same as to be holy. Clean is rather the opposite of common, and unclean the opposite of holy. These four terms constitute four gradations of approach to the perfect idea. Unclean represents the furthest remove from it; common comes next, clean third, and holy is the nearest.

5. Cleanness and Holiness.

The occasions of uncleanness were either involuntary and unavoidable, or conscious and avoidable. Of the former class were such natural vital phenomena as seminal emissions, inclusive of gonorrhea (Lv 15 2, 16) and menstruation (Lv 15 19). With these were included, as a necessity of life, sexual intercourse (Lv 15 18; Ex 19 15; I S 21 4; II S 11 4) and childbirth (Lv ch 12). Leprosy also belonged to this class (Lv ch 13), and, finally, contact with one who was unclean from any of the causes above specified (Lv 15 6; cf. flowers, in vs. 24 and 33

6. Sources of Defilement or Pollution. (1) Unavoidable.

AV), contact with unclean things, principally the bodies of the dead (Gn 23 2, 50 1-3; Nu 19 11-22), and contact with things touched by unclean persons (Lv 15 9).

Of the avoidable sources of defilement, eating of the flesh of certain animals was the chief. These are enumerated in Lv 11 2-24 and Dt 14 2-21. The list includes beasts which part the hoof and chew the cud, living creatures in the waters that have not fins and scales (Gunkel conjectures it was because they do not belong to the class of chaos-beasts, or the nāhash of the sea; according to Professor Mills, of Oxford, it was because they were created by a demon or demons) and winged creatures without general characterization, but included in a special list of taboo. The carcasses of such animals were also unclean (Lv 11 11, 24 ff.). Eating of the flesh of torn or unnaturally slain animals was also a source of uncleanness (Ex 22 31; Lv 17 15; "strangled" things, Ac 15 25; and animals sacrificed to idols, Ex 34 15; Ac 21 25; I Co 10 28). Finally, blood was tabooed, for "blood is the life" (Gn 9 4). For other reasons pieces of fat, specially designated in the ritual for sacrifice, were tabooed (Lv 7 23, 25, 27). Moreover, all desecration, such as the touch of a forbidden tool (Ex 20 25), worship of idols (Ezk 20 31), etc., was said to pollute.

(2) Avoidable Sources of Uncleanness.

Though these sources of defilement are given in a compact list in P, it is not probable that they were all clearly in view from the outset. The tendency with the lapse of time was to lengthen the list and intensify the distinction. In N T times the Pharisees had elaborated the definition of clean and unclean in a very artificial manner. The ordinance of Lv 15 11 was made the basis of a system of ablutions before meals; and one who did not conform to this provision ate with unwashed—that is, common—hands (defiled, Mk 7 2 RV). But even this was not thought sufficient, for to wash after the meal was also required. To provide for the successful or beneficial carrying out of this requirement it became necessary, in houses where feasts were to be held, to have water-pots with water for the guests to use in these ablutions (Jn 2 7); and further to secure against danger of defilement in any other way a system of washing of cups and pots and brazen vessels was devised (He 9 9 f.; Mk 7 4).

7. Growth of List of Unclean Things.

How large the importance of the question of purity and purification had become is shown by the fact that a new teacher's standing was apt to be gaged by his attitude to the matter. The disciples of John were challenged by the faithful Jews to explain their master's teaching on this question (Jn 3 25). (On the refinements devised and observed in later Judaism see Schürer, HJP, II, ii, pp. 106–111; Edersheim, Life of Jesus the Messiah II, 10.) It is worth noticing that among the things which rendered unclean was the use of canonical or sacred books. It was a question, for instance, whether the Song of Solomon rendered unclean. Those who believed in its canonicity said it did; those who did not, took the opposite ground.

8. Importance of the Ceremonial.

Jesus' attitude toward this elaboration was that of the prophetic reformer, who drives back to the ethical root of the system. His teaching does away with ceremonial impurity altogether. Cleanness and uncleanness inhere in the moral man (Mk 7 1-23 and ‖s).

9. Jesus' Attitude.

But uncleanness might be contracted by a whole country. (1) When in a murder which remained unpunished (Dt 21 1-9) no expiation could be made for the land except by the death of the murderer (Nu 35 33). (2) Through immorality (Jer 3 1), or (3) through idolatry (Jer 2 7 ff., 3 2; Hos 6 10). Foreign countries were unclean because of the false gods worshiped in them (Am 7 17). The food eaten in foreign countries was, therefore, also unclean (Hos 9 3 f.; Ezk 4 13). This is what made the Exile such a fearful visitation of wrath to the Israelite (I S 26 19; La 2 7). Profanation of holy ground was liable to take place when aliens trod it (Ezk 44 7, 9, pollute AV, Ac 21 28), and, in fact, all alliances and compromises with idolatry are occasions of profanation (Ezk 36 18).

10. Unclean Land.

Purification was a restoration of the privilege of approach to the altar. It involved incidentally freedom of participation in the functions of social life. The process by which it was secured varied according to the kind and degree of uncleanness contracted. Simple and general purification was secured through the bathing of the body and of the clothes of the person purified (Lv 15 8, 10, 11). These were then put on again at the end of the day. This was all that was required in cases of uncleanness contracted with a person having an issue or by contact with anything rendered unclean by such a person (Lv 15 5-11).

11. Modes of Purification.

For purification from uncleanness of a severer kind, special rituals were devised. (1) The simplest of these was that for cleansing from an issue (Lv 15 19). In this case uncleanness lasted seven days. At the end of that time, by washing the body and the clothing in running water, uncleanness was removed; but on the eighth day the person must appear before the priest with two turtle-doves or young pigeons and offer one for a sin-offering and the other for a burnt-offering. (2) In cases of childbirth cleansing depended first of all on the sex of the new-born infant. (a) If this were a man child, the period of uncleanness was fixed at seven days (Lv 12 2). A period of thirty-three days following was known as "the days of purification," during which the mother was not allowed access to the Sanctuary, nor could she touch anything hallowed lest she defile it. At the end of the days of purification, she presented a lamb as a sacrifice and in cases of extreme poverty a pair of turtle-doves or young pigeons (Lv 12 8; Lk 2 24). (b) For a daughter the duration of both the days of uncleanness and of purification were doubled. Otherwise the ritual was the same. (3) In case of leprosy the time of purification was fixed at seven days. It was inaugurated by the presentation of the person healed with two clean birds at the gate of the city

12. Special Ritual.

(he having previously lived in separation outside). The priest killed one of the birds, allowing its blood to flow into a bowl of water. Then he took a bunch of hyssop, dipped it into the bowl and sprinkled the person. Next he released the other bird. The person was then declared clean, shaved his hair and washed his clothes and spent the seven days of his purification still in separation; but on the seventh day, he again washed his clothes and shaved. On the eighth he appeared at the Sanctuary with two male lambs and a female one, or in case of poverty with one lamb and two doves or pigeons, together with a meal-offering, one as a burnt-offering and the other lamb as a trespass-offering. The priests then anointed the person's right ear, right thumb, and right big toe with the blood of the trespass-offering, and with part of the oil; the remainder of the oil he poured on the person's head after making a libation before J". The man was thus completely pure (Lv ch. 14). (4) Most peculiar of all was the ritual for purification from uncleanness contracted by contact with a corpse. The first step was the selection of a red heifer without blemish, which also had never been put to service by man. This heifer was sacrificed, her body being burned with cedar wood and hyssop and scarlet, and the blood sprinkled toward the Sanctuary. The ashes of the sacrifice were gathered and preserved, and whenever needed, mixed with living water. This water, now called holy water ("water for impurity"), was then sprinkled upon the person defiled, on the third and the seventh day, and on washing his clothes and his body as in simple purification such a person was pure (Nu ch. 19). (5) The restoration of the Nazirite accidentally made unclean by contact with a corpse was affected by his serving seven days of purification in separation, at the end of which he shaved all his hair. On the eighth he brought two turtle-doves or young pigeons to the door of the sanctuary (one for a burnt-offering, and the other for a sin- and trespass-offering, like that offered by the leper on being healed). This closed the ceremony (Nu 6 9-12). A. C. Z.

PURGE: This term, in its former broad meaning of 'purify,' 'cleanse,' by removing what is impure, is used correctly for one Gr. and six Heb. words: (1) bārar (Ezk 20 38; Dn 11 35, "purify" RV); (2) dūaḥ (Is 4 4); (3) zāqaq (Mal 3 3, "refine" RV); (4) ḥāṭa' (Ps 51 7, "purify" RV); (5) ṭāhar (II Ch 34 3, 8; Ezk 24 13, "cleanse" RV); (6) tsāraph (Is 1 25); (7) διακαθαρίζειν (Mt 3 12; Lk 3 17, "cleanse" RV); ἐκκαθαίρειν (I Co 5 7; II Ti 2 21); καθαρίζειν (Mk 7 19; He 9 14, 22, "cleanse" RV); καθαίρειν (Jn 15 2; He 1 3, "cleanse" RV); καθαρισμός (He 1 3, "purification" RV; II P 1 9, "cleansing" RV). "Purge" is also found in the AV for forms of kāphar, for which the RV has the correct renderings (Ps 65 3 [4], 79 9; Is 6 7, 22 14, 27 9; Ezk 43 20, 26; Pr 16 6; I S 3 14) "forgive," "expiate." C. S. T.

PURIM, piū'rim. See ESTHER, § 6, and FASTS AND FEASTS, § 2.

PURPLE: In the Bible the word "purple" always refers to purple-dyed stuffs (of various kinds), or garments made from them, not to the dye itself. See COLORS, § 2, and DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 5. E. E. N.

PURSE. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 4.

PUT, put (פּוּט, pūṭ, Phut AV, Gn 10 6; Ezk 27 10): One of the four sons of Ham, in the ethnological and geographical table of Gn ch. 10, the others being Cush (Ethiopia), Mizraim (Egypt), and Canaan. Put, together with Lud, furnished mercenaries for the armies of Tyre (Ezk 27 10), of Egypt (Jer 46 9; Ezk 30 5), and of Gog (Ezk 38 5). Their favorite weapon was the bow. Nahum (3 9) groups them with the Lubim, i.e., Libyans, as helpers of No-Amon or Thebes, and in the Genesis table they are grouped with the Egyptians and the Ethiopians. In all the prophetic passages the LXX. supports this view by translating Put "Libyans," and many O T commentators accept this identification, which is still further confirmed by the Coptic name (Phaiat) of the W. part of Lower Egypt. Egyptologists (e.g., Müller, Asien u. Europa, ch. vii) deny the correctness of this identification, and regard Put as the Hebrew name of the land of Punt, of the Egyptian inscriptions. This land stretched along the African coast of the Red Sea from the desert E. of Upper Egypt down to Somaliland. From the inscriptions of the 12th, 18th, and 20th dynasties we learn of a lively commercial intercourse between Egypt and Punt. From it the Egyptians imported slaves, monkeys, spices for incense, gold, ivory, ebony, ostrich feathers, and eggs. The inhabitants were partly negroes and partly of Hamitic stock. If this identification be correct, the prophets use "Put" in a broad sense, to include all Africa E. of Egypt and Ethiopia. For Pul, Is 66 19, read, with LXX., "Put." J. A. K.

PUTEOLI, piu-tī'o-lai (Ποτιόλοι): A Roman seaport N. of Naples. It was founded 512 B.C. as Dicæarchia, and occupied by Rome in 215. It became a Roman colony in 194, and was renamed Puteoli ('fountains,' 'craters'). It was the chief commercial city of Italy, in direct touch with the Orient, and had a large Oriental population. It is mentioned but once in the N T (Ac 28 13). J. R. S. S.

PUTHITES, piū'thaits (פּוּתִי, pūthī, Puhites AV): One of the clans inhabiting the region of Kiriath-jearim (I Ch 2 53). E. E. N.

PUTIEL, piū'ti-el (פּוּטִיאֵל, pūṭī'ēl): The father of the wife of Aaron's son Eleazar (Ex 6 25). E. E. N.

QUARRIES (פְּסִילִים, pᵉṣīlīm, 'graven images,' Jg 3 19, 26, RVmg.): The Heb. term strictly means 'hewn stones.' The region of Gilgal (q.v.), where the quarries alluded to are located, was noted for a group of sacred stones, possibly objects of worship, mentioned as a landmark. There is no evidence of a stone quarry in the place (cf. Moore in Int. Crit. Com.). In I K 6 7, "quarry" RV does not correspond to any Hebrew word, but translates the passage according to its sense ("before it was brought away" RVmg.). For quarrying stone among the Hebrews cf. Benzinger, Hebr. Arch., p. 236; and among the Egyptians Maspero, Dawn of Civilization, p. 383 f. A. C. Z.

QUARTER, SECOND. See JERUSALEM, § 14.

QUARTUS, cwōr'tus (Κούαρτος): A Christian whom Paul associates with himself in salutations to the Roman Church (Ro 16 23). Like Erastus (q.v.), mentioned in the same verse, he may have been a man of position or rank. J. M. T.

QUATERNION, cwa-ter'ni-un (τετράδιον, 'a squad of four'): A small division of soldiers, consisting of four men, usually assigned to the guarding of prisoners. Four quaternions were placed over Peter at the time of his arrest by Herod (Ac 12 4). From Jn 19 23 it would appear that one quaternion was on guard at the Crucifixion (cf. Ev. Petri 9). In view of the fact that the night was divided into four watches, it would seem that one of the number watched while the other three slept through each watch. J. R. S. S.

QUEEN: The original terms so rendered are: (1) malkāh, mōlekheth fem. of melekh, 'king,' and βασίλισσα; used only of the Queen of Sheba, Vashti, Esther, Belshazzar's mother (?), Candace, and in Song 6 8 f.; Rev 18 7. (2) gᵉbīrāh, 'mistress'; the title of the queen mother (I K 15 13 ARVmg.; Jer 13 18, etc.), and once of the consort (I K 11 19). (3) shēgāl, 'wife' (Neh 2 6; Ps 45 9). (4) sārāh, 'princess' (Is 49 23; cf. I K 11 3).

The "queens" of the polygamous Orient were as a rule merely members of an immense royal harem, whose status was somewhat higher and more secure than that of the concubines (Song 6 8; cf. I K 11 1-8). Often, however, a certain wife would enjoy her lord's special favor, and consequently be raised to a position roughly corresponding to that of a modern queen consort (Tahpenes, I K 11 19; Vashti, Est ch. 1; cf. Neh 2 6). This would ordinarily be the first wife married after the king's accession, especially if of noble birth (Pharaoh's daughter, I K 3 1; Jezebel, I K 16 31); but the favorite might be chosen for her beauty (Est 2 7, 17), or because she had given birth to an acceptable heir (so, apparently, Bathsheba; cf. I K 2 13). The O T, however, does not apply the title "queen" to the wife of any living Hebrew monarch.

On the other hand, as in Oriental courts to-day, the king's mother often exercised a most weighty influence (Jer 13 18; cf. II K 24 12; I K 15 13; ?Dn 5 10). Only after Ahab's death was Jezebel called "queen" (II K 10 13); and it was as queen mother that Athaliah gained the influence which she later used to usurp the throne (II K ch. 11). King Solomon's attitude toward his mother is also significant (I K 2 19).

The only female sovereigns mentioned in the Bible are the Queen of Sheba (I K 10; Mt 12 42 and ‖s), Candace of Ethopia (Ac 8 27), and Athaliah of Judah (II K ch. 11). L. G. L.

QUEEN OF HEAVEN. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 14 (7).

QUEEN OF SHEBA: The Arabian queen who visited Solomon (I K 10 1-10). Nothing more is known of her outside of what is given in the Biblical story. For the country Sheba (also called Seba) see ARAB, ARABIA; ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, §§ 8, 11; SABEAN and SHEBA. E. E. N.

QUESTION. See WISDOM, WISE MEN.

QUICK, QUICKEN: These words occur often in AV and are occasionally used in RV to render terms usually translated "alive," "living," "to make" or "keep alive" or "to cause to live." At times the meaning is purely physical (e.g., Nu 16 30; Ac 10 42, etc.); in other cases, especially in the Psalms, while the physical reviving is the basis, the expression often includes more. In Paul, spiritual newness of life is sometimes meant (e.g., Eph 2 5; Col 2 13), but generally, it is the resurrection life that is intended (Ro 4 17, 8 11, etc.; cf. also Jn 5 21, 6 63). E. E. N.

QUICKSANDS. See MEDITERRANEAN.

QUIRINIUS, cwai-rin'i-us (Κυρήνιος): The name of a Roman governor under whom a census was taken in Judæa (Lk 2 1, 4; Cyrenius AV). No explicit mention of such a census occurs elsewhere, and Q. is known to have been governor in 6 A.D. and to have taken a census then (Jos. Ant. XVIII, 1 1, 2 2). For the difficulty raised Ramsay (Was Christ Born in Bethlehem? (1898) proposes the following solution: There was a system of periodic enrolment in Syria by cycles of fourteen years, beginning from first annus Augusti (23 B.C.). An enrolment was therefore due, and was made, in Syria in 8 B.C.; but for state reasons Herod had it deferred in Judæa until late in the summer of 6 B.C., when Quirinius was special legatus Augusti to carry on war against the Homonadenses (6–4 B.C.), being in command (ἡγεμών = dux; Luke here also is correct) of the army and directing the foreign policy of Syria, while Varus (governor of Syria, 7–4 B.C.) retained the administration of the civil affairs of the province. Q. and the war overshadowed Varus in the mind of Luke. This enrolment was not made after the Roman system; but, in order to save the susceptibilities of the Jews, was given a Jewish character, being conducted according to tribes and households. Consequently, no tumults occurred. Q. was consul in 12 B.C.; was appointed legatus Augusti for Syria for the first time, 6–4 B.C., proconsul of Asia, 3–2 B.C., and legatus Augusti for Syria for the second time, 6–9 A.D. (after the death of Herod). During this second governorship the famous enrolment of Quirinius took place, causing tumults, because Judæa was now incorporated into the Roman Empire, and the enrolment was considered a mark of servitude. Q. died 21 A.D. See also PROVINCE. J. R. S. S.

QUIVER. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 3.

QUOTATIONS: I. Quotations by O T writers from preexisting sources are of two kinds, i.e., those whose sources are given and those made anonymously. Of the first class are the citations from the Book of Jashar (Jos 10 13; II S 1 18); the Book of the Wars of Jehovah (Nu 21 14); and, in the LXX., the Book of the Song (I K 8 53). Many cases of reference to the Book of the Kings of Israel and to the Book of the Kings of Judah are also specifically found in I, II Kings and I, II Chronicles (cf. Israel, I K chs. 14, 15, 16, 22; II K chs. 1, 10, 13, 14; I Ch ch. 9; II Ch chs. 20, 33; Judah, I K chs. 15, 22; II K chs. 8, 12, 14, 15, 16, 20, 21; Judah and Israel, II Ch chs. 25, 28, 32; Israel and Judah, II Ch chs. 27. 35, 36; Kings, II Ch ch. 24), but not by way of quotation. Of the second class are the poetic passages, such as the Song of Lamech (Gn 4 23 f.), the Song of Moses (Ex 15 2-18), and many prose extracts which, from the nature of the case, can not be positively identified. To the latter class must be added also the passages common to two or more writers, with reference to which the question arises whether they are original with either of the writers, always admitting the possibility of their being quoted by both from some antecedent writing (Is 2 2-4 = Mic 4 1-3; Ob ver. 5 = Jer 49 9).

1. In the O T.

II. Quotations by N T writers are predominantly from the O T, the only exceptions being the lines introduced by Paul into his discourse on Mars Hill (Ac 17 28, from Aratus, or Cleanthes), and into his letters (I Co 15 33, from Menander; Tit 1 12, from Callimachus; I Co 12 12-27, perhaps from the fable of Menenius Agrippa), Jude from Eth. En. and Ass. Mos. vs. 9, 14.

2. In the N T.

(1) From Pagan Writers.

III. The quotations from the O T are very numerous. They are found in every book of the N T, except Phm, I, II, and III Jn, and II P, and are drawn from every book of the O T except Est, Song, and Ec. It is not easy to draw the line between an explicit quotation and a trace of the influence of an older writer's language on a later one. Accordingly, statistical statements on this subject must be taken with some allowance. Nevertheless, the number of explicit quotations from the O T in the New has been computed with a fair degree of accuracy as 275.

(2) From the O T.

According to the relation which quotations sustain to the original text, they may be classified as follows:

(1) Direct citations made immediately from the Hebrew (O T). These are not numerous (Lk 1 17, from Mal 3 1).

3. Classes of Quotation.

(2) Direct quotations made from versions. Of these the vast majority are based on the LXX., and develop differences between the original as found in the N T and the form of it which appears in the quotation, such as: (a) changes in the order of the clauses, e.g., Ro 10 20 reverses the order of clauses in Is 65 1, from which it is taken. (b) The addition of a word or clause, e.g., in Jn 6 31, from Ps 78 24 ("do it" is not in the O T, but added by the LXX.). (c) The substitution of one Heb. word for another, because of identity of radicals, e.g., Ac 15 17, from Am 9 12, reads 'ādhām ('man,' ἀνθρώπων), instead of 'Ĕdhom (Edom). (d) The substitution of words by slight changes of radicals, e.g., Ac 15 17 from Am 9 12, giving "seek" (yidhr'shū) for "possess" (yirshū). (e) The substitution of words or clauses by processes now impossible to trace, e.g., Ro 9 27 f., from Is 10 22 f. (f) The substitution of different renderings, which would be admissible as alternate translations of the same Heb. originals, e.g., He 1 7, from Ps 104 4, where the word "wind" is used instead of "spirit," both being possible renderings of rūaḥ (cf. also He 2 6-8, from Ps 8 4-6, where "angels" appears instead of "God," for 'ĕlohīm). Besides the LXX., however, the Aramaic translations occasionally serve as the basis of quotations, as in Ro 9 33, 10 11 and I P 2 6, 8, from Is 28 16 (here the Targumic insertion "in him" is reproduced); I Co 15 54, from Is 25 8, where "forever" is the Aram. for "unto futurity." (3) Indirect, or secondary, quotations are made not from any O T text or version, but from writings into which they had been incorporated. The existence of such quotations is attested by the agreement of two or more N T writers varying uniformly from the known O T texts. Such cases could not, of course, be attributed to habits of memory, and, though they might be due to the use of lost or unknown texts, it is more likely that they arise from citing quotations (cf. I P 2 6 f. with Ro 9 33; Ro 12 19 with He 10 30). (4) Quotations from memory are such as agree with no text exactly and present a considerable freedom in reproducing the original. Such are Ro 11 4 from I K 19 18; Jn 2 17 from Ps 69 9; cf. also I Co 14 21 f. from Is 28 11 f. (5) Parallelistic quotations give the sense of the original writer without any effort to reproduce his words. (6) Combined quotations utilize more than one O T passage, and are quite common (Ac 15 17, from Am 9 12 and Jn 12 15).

The principles upon which N T quotations are made from the O T are precisely the same as those which govern all quotations elsewhere in literature (cf. Johnson, The Quotations of the O T in the N). While the saeredness of the O T to the N T writers is everywhere manifest, there is a great latitude in the use of its language. (1) Some O T passages are used in their exact O T sense. (2) Others are taken as containing general principles, which had an application in their original form, but might be applied also to the time of the reader. (3) A third class are the quotations based on the principle of accommodation. This is done when the language of an old writer is adopted as a chaste and familiar form of words to express one's own thoughts (cf. Mt 2 18, from Jer 31 15 f.). (4) A fourth class is that in which O T transactions are allegorized, and the language referring to them incorporated in an allegorical sense (cf. Gal 4 21 ff.; I Co 9 9).

Efforts to establish distinctions according to the formulas by which quotations are introduced do not succeed. The formulas "The Scripture saith," "It saith," "It is written," "Then was the Scripture fulfilled which saith," "This was done that the Scripture might be fulfilled," sometimes mean no more than quotation-marks in modern book-making.

R

RAAMA, rê'a-ma, RAAMAH, rê'a-mā. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

RAAMIAH, rê''a-mai'ā (רַעַמְיָה, ra'amyāh), 'J" thunders': One of the leaders of the Return (Neh 7 7; Reelaiah in Ezr 2 2). E. E. N.

RAAMSES, ra-am'sîz (רַעַמְסֵס, ra'amṣēṣ): A store-city named in connection with Pithom as built by the Israelites under the direction of Egyptian task-masters (Ex 1 11). It was situated in or near Goshen. The name suggests its having been founded by Rameses II, generally supposed to be the Pharaoh of the oppression. See also PITHOM. A. C. Z.

RABBAH, rab'ā (רַבָּה, rabbāh), 'great [city]': 1. The capital of the Ammonites; usually Rabbath and Rabbath-Ammon. One of the most important cities on the E. of the Jordan. Map I, G 8. It was besieged and captured by David (II S 12 29; I Ch 20 1), but was allowed self-government under its own princes (II S 17 27). It must have consisted of two parts, of which one was stormed by Joab (II S 12 27), and the other by David. It was here that the sarcophagus ("iron bedstead") of Og, King of Bashan, was to be seen (Dt 3 11). In the 3d cent. B.C. it was Hellenized, and given the name of Philadelphia after Ptolemy Philadelphus (285–246 B.C.). According to Polybius (V, 71), Antiochus the Great seized and annexed it to his dominions (218 B.C.); but in 135 it was in the hands of Zeno Kotylas (Jos. Ant. XIII, 8 1). The modern site is fixed by the name 'Amman in the upper Jabbok (Wâdy 'Amman) NE. of Heshbon. According to Conder, there are here ruins of Byzantine, Arab, and Roman (of the age of the Antonines), as well as prehistoric times. The N. portion of the site ends in a pool hewn out of the rock, and accessible from the city through an underground conduit (Polybius, V, 71). This was probably the citadel stormed by Joab (II S 12 27). A. C. Z.

RABBATH, rab'ath. See RABBAH.

RABBATH-AMMON, rab''ath-am'ŏn. See RABBAH.

RABBI, rab'i or rab'ai, RABBONI, rab-bō'nai: A title given by the Jews to their learned teachers. The Heb. form 'rabbī' (רַבִּי) is from rabh (רַב) with the pronominal ending i, 'my,' and means literally 'my great one,' or 'my master' (in a polite sense). Other (Aram.) forms were rabbān and rabbōn. The Gospels frequently change the Heb. rabbī to διδάσκαλος, 'teacher' (perhaps also to κύριος, 'lord,' Mt 17 4, or ἐπιστάτης, 'overseer' or 'ruler,' Lk 9 33), but at times simply transliterate it by ῥαββί (or ῥαββεί) (Mt 23 7 f.; Jn 1 38, etc.). Mary at the tomb used the Aramaic form rabbōnī, 'my master' (Jn 20 16). Jesus forbade His disciples to claim this title, since He alone was qualified for such a title (Mt 23 8 ff.), and God alone should be called 'father,' also a title which the Jewish teachers applied to their learned doctors. See Dalman, Words of Jesus, xiv. E. E. N.

RABBITH, rab'ith (רַבִּית, rabbīth): A town of Issachar (Jos 19 20). Map III, G 2. E. E. N.

RABMAG, rab'mag (רַב־מָג, rabh-māg = Babyl. rab-mugi), 'great prince': A title of Nergal-sharezer, one of the officers present at the capture and destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (Jer 39 3). Of the various explanations of the meaning of the title, that above suggested seems most plausible. I. M. P.

RABSARIS, rab-sê'ris or rab'sa- (רַב־סָרִיס, rabhṣārīṣ): The title of one of the three officers whom Sennacherib sent to demand the surrender of Jerusalem (II K 18 17); also of one of the officers of Nebuchadrezzar who sat in the council at the fall of Jerusalem (Jer 39 3). There are different theories as to the interpretation of the word. The common meaning attached to it is that found in Dn (1 3), "master of the eunuchs." It seems to be an Assyro-Babylonian compound, rabû-ša-rešī, meaning 'chief who is head.' This at least would seem most nearly its signification in the case of the foreign officers. Such a meaning may have been toned down in the Hebrew ideas to "chief of the eunuchs," who were the responsible personages about the court. I. M. P.

RABSHAKEH, rab-shê'kĕ or rab'sha-kĕ (רַבְשָׁקֵה, rabhshāqēh, Babyl. rab-shaki), 'chief of the heads': A title of one of the officers with the tartan (q.v.) and Rabsaris sent by Sennacherib to demand of Hezekiah the surrender of Jerusalem (II K 18 17, 19, 26-35). He was an officer, apparently next in importance to the tartan, for in the colloquy over the surrender of the city he was the spokesman for the Assyrian army, and was able to speak in two Palestinian languages, the Hebrew and Aramæan. I. M. P.

RACA, rê'ca (ῥακά, Mt 5 22; abbreviated and transliterated from the Aram. rēqān, 'empty [head]'): A term expressive of contempt. Its Gr. equivalent "Thou vain man" (κενέ) appears in Ja 2 20. The word does not occur often enough to warrant a safe generalization as to the degree or kind of feeling it expresses. In particular, it is a question whether "Raca" gives vent to a stronger or a weaker sentiment than "Thou fool." Its position, however, between mere silent anger and clearly expressed contempt for moral worthlessness points to the signifying of an intermediate feeling of deprecation for intellectual defect ('emptiness'), which is more reprehensible than suppressed anger, but less so than unbridled moral condemnation of others. A. C. Z.

RACAL, rê'cal (רָכָל, rākhāl, Rachal AV): A place to the leading men of which David sent presents (I S 30 29). But the LXX. reads Carmel (in Judah), which is probably correct. E. E. N.

RACE: This term translates Heb. and Gr. words meaning in general 'course': (1) 'ōraḥ, 'path' (Ps 19 5, "course" RV); but more specifically the place in which race-contests were held; (2) mērōts, 'running' (Ec 9 11); (3) ἀγών (He 12 1); (4) στάδιον (I Co 9 24, "race-course" RVmg.) and the contest itself. The figure of the foot-race, as representing life and its struggles and rewards, was especially expressive to those familiar with the Greek games (Ac 13 25; II Ti 4 7 f.; Gal 2 2, 5 7). A. C. Z.

RACHAB, rê'cab. See RAHAB.

RACHAL, rê'cal. See RACAL.

RACHEL, rê'chel (רָחֵל, rāḥēl), 'ewe': The younger daughter of Laban, and the cousin and beloved wife of Jacob. For her the patriarch served Laban seven years, and, as Leah was substituted by craft, he was compelled to serve another seven years in order to secure her (Gn ch. 29). For a period she was childless, and envious of her sister. She gave her maid Bilhah (q.v.) to Jacob as concubine, and adopted her two sons, Dan and Naphtali (Gn 30 1-8). Later, while still in Mesopotamia, she bore Joseph (Gn 30 22-25); on the way from Bethel to Ephratah she died in giving birth to Benjamin (Gn 35 16-20). When Jacob left Laban, she carried her father's teraphim, and concealed the theft with skill (Gn 31 14 f.). There are two traditions as to the location of her grave: (1) Between Jerusalem and Bethlehem (Gn 35 19); (2) N. of Jerusalem, on the borders of Benjamin (I S 10 2). In Jer 31 15 (cf. Mt 2 18) Rachel (Rahel AV), the tribal mother of the northern tribes, mourns for her sons who are carried into captivity. In the patriarchal narrative "Rachel" undoubtedly has a tribal as well as a personal significance, for about her are grouped five northern tribes—Ephraim and Manasseh (= Joseph), Benjamin, Dan, and Naphtali. (For this point, see TRIBE, TRIBES.) J. A. K.

RADDAI, ra-dê'ai, rad'ê, or rad'a-ai (רַדַּי, radday): The fifth son of Jesse (I Ch 2 14). E. E. N.

RAGAU, rê'gō. See REU.

RAGUEL, ra-giū'el or rag'yu-el. See JETHRO.

RAHAB, rê'hab (רָהָב, rāhābh; also in the N T Rachab, Ῥαχάβ), 'broad': I. 1. A woman of Jericho who received and helped the spies of Joshua (Jos 2 1 f., 6 17 f.). To bring this story within the compass of natural events, it must be assumed that Rahab was in some way brought into touch with affairs outside her own small community; that she had become fascinated by the new and different life of the advancing Hebrews, and was thus ready to cast her lot in with them. That a plain woman of Jericho should have thus lived above the common level does not appear likely; but, considering the social position occupied by the class to which Rahab belonged, this improbability disappears. Women of this class came into touch with travelers from abroad, and Rahab may have easily learned of the achievements and hopes of the new people emerging from the wilderness. 2. The name Rahab again occurs in the genealogy of Jesus as that of the wife of Salmon and mother of Boaz (Mt 1 5). It has been debated whether this could be the same person as the Rahab in Joshua. The spelling of the name in Mt (Ῥαχάβ) is different from that in the LXX. and in He 11 31 and Ja 2 25 (Ῥαάβ), but, per contra, Josephus gives it as in Mt. Upon the whole, it seems not impossible that one person is meant.

II. (רָהַב, rāḥabh), 'storm,' 'arrogancy' (Job 26 12, 9 13, "proud" AV; Is 30 7, "strength" AV): A proper name used in a literal and in a figurative sense. In the literal sense, it denotes a mythological sea-monster of the same class as the Dragon (q.v.), and is probably connected with the Semitic myth of Tiâmat, the destroyer of God's order in the universe (Job 26 12; Is 51 9). In the figurative sense, it is a name given to Egypt (Ps 87 4, 89 10; Is 30 7 RV). But why it is thus given is not clear. A. C. Z.

RAHAM, rê'ham (רֶחַם, raḥam): A descendant of the Jerahmeelite Caleb (I Ch 2 44). E. E. N.

RAHEL, rê'hel. See RACHEL.

RAIMENT. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS.

RAIN. See PALESTINE, § 19.

RAINBOW (ἶρις): The rainbow, as a phenomenon in nature, is referred to at the end of the Flood narrative (Heb. geshĕth, 'bow' Gn 9 14). The Babylonian parallels do not contain this feature, from which it may be inferred that it is an Israelitic addition of significance. This significance is naturally that, because the rainbow accompanies a passing shower, the calamity of the Flood may be regarded as temporary (cf. Gn 9 16). The rainbow, however, plays an important part in folk-lore generally (cf. Sayce, Expos. T VII, 308). But no distinct traces of this are found in Israel. In Ezk (1 28) and Rev (4 3, 10 1) the rainbow is emblematic of God's glory. A. C. Z.

RAISE FROM THE DEAD, TO. See RESURRECTION.

RAISIN, CAKES OF: The rendering of the Heb. 'ăshīshē 'ănābhīm ("flagons of wine" AV). Cakes made of pressed grapes, or raisins, were used in the worship of heathen gods. The charge brought by Hosea against the Israelites that they "love cakes of raisins" (Hos 3 1; cf. Jer 7 18, 44 19) is equivalent to saying that they worship other deities than J", or that they worship Him after the manner of the heathen cultus. See also FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 5. E. E. N.

RAKEM, rê'kem (רָקֶם, rāqem [in pause]; the proper form is reqem): A descendant of Machir (I Ch 7 16). E. E. N.

RAKKATH, rak'ath (רַקַּת, raqqath): A fortified city of Naphtali (Jos 19 35). Perhaps near the site of Tiberias (q.v.). E. E. N.

RAKKON, rak'ŏn (רַקּוֹן, raqqōn): A city of Dan (Jos 19 46). Site unknown. E. E. N.

RAM (רָם, rām), 'exalted': 1. An ancestor of David (Ru 4 19; Mt 1 3 f.; but in Lk 3 33 Arni RV). 2. A brother of Jerahmeel (I Ch 2 9). 3. The name of the family of Elihu (Job 2 32), which may be the same as the Aram of Gn 22 21. A. C. Z.

RAM. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 5.

RAM, BATTERING-RAM. See BESIEGE.

RAMAH, rê'mā (הָרָמָה, rāmāh, usually with the article), 'the height': The name of several towns in Palestine. 1. A city of Benjamin, on the frontier between the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel (Jos 18 25; I K 15 17 ff., etc.). Near it was the palm-tree of Deborah (Jg 4 5) and Rachel's grave (Jer 31 15; Mt 2 18 Rama). Map III, F 5. 2. A city in Ephraim, also called Ramathaim-zophim (I S 1 1), the home of the prophet Samuel (I S 1 19, 2 11, 7 7, etc.). Map III, E 4. 3. A town of Naphtali (Jos 19 36). Map IV, D 6. 4. A town of Asher (Jos 19 29). Map IV, C 5. 5. A shorter form for Ramoth-gilead (q.v.) (II K 8 29; II Ch 22 6). 6. R. "of the South" (Jos 19 8 Ramath AV). A town of Simeon. Site unknown. E. E. N.

RAMATH, rê'math. See RAMAH.

RAMATHAIM, rê"ma-thê'im (רָמָתַיִם, rāmāthayim, and Ramathaim-zophim): The birthplace of the prophet Samuel (I S 1 1). Probably the same as Ramah (q.v.). E. E. N.

RAMATHITE, rê'math-ait (הָרָמָתִי, rāmāthī), 'man of Ramah': The designation of Shimei, David's chief husbandman (I Ch 27 27). E. E. N.

RAMATH-LEHI, rê"math-lî'hai. See LEHI.

RAMATH-MIZPEH, rê"math-miz'pê (רָמַת הַמִּצְפֶּה, rāmath ha-mitspeh), 'the height of the watch-tower': A place on the border of Gad (Jos 13 26). Probably the same as Mizpah (q.v.). E. E. N.

RAMESES, ram'ĕ-sîz or ra-mes'îz. See RAAMSES.

RAMIAH, ra-mai'ā (רַמְיָה, ramyāh), 'J" is high': One of the "sons of Parosh" (Ezr 10 25). E. E. N.

RAMOTH, rê'moth (רָאמֹת, rā'mōth, and רָמֹת, rāmōth), 'heights': I. See JEREMOTH. II. 1. A town of Gad in Gilead, also called Ramah (II K 8 29) and Ramoth-Gilead. It was assigned to Gad, and was probably occupied by Gadites early in the conquest-period (Dt 4 43; Jos 20 8). According to later theory, it was a Levitical city (Jos 21 38; I Ch 6 80). It was the residence of one of Solomon's prefects (I K 4 13). Later, it was seized by the Aramæans of Damascus, and its recovery was the object of the campaign of Ahab in which he was mortally wounded (I K 22 3 ff.). Israel had possession of it in the days of Jehoram, son of Ahab (II K 8 28 f., 9 14), and it was here that the conspiracy of Jehu was organized (II K 9 1-13). Though so important a place, its site has been much disputed. The identification on Map I, G 6 is not at all certain. Strong reasons are assigned by Merril for identifying it with Gerasa (Map I, G 6). By others a site at, or near, Es Salt (Map I, G 7) is urged, while G. A. Smith thinks it must have been farther N., somewhere on the Yarmûk. 2. A Levitical city of Issachar (I Ch 6 73), apparently the same as Jarmuth (Jos 21 29), or Remeth (Jos 19 21). 3. "Ramoth of the South" (I S 30 27). See RAMAH, 6. E. E. N.

RANGES: This term renders the Heb. words (1) sedhērōth, 'rows [of soldiers]' (II K 11 8, 15; II Ch 23 14). (2) y'thūr, 'stretch [of country]' (Job 39 8). (3) kīrayim, a grate with 'rows [of fire-pans],' designed for cooking several kinds of food at the same time (Lv 11 35, "stewpan" RVmg.). A. C. Z.

RANKS: The rendering of πρασιά, 'a square plot of ground' covered with grass or vegetables (Mk 6 40). See also WARFARE, § 6. E. E. N.

RANSOM: This word renders the following terms: (1) kōpher, 'cover' (from the Piel form, kippēr, 'to cover over,' 'pacify,' Ex 30 12; Job 33 24; Ps 49 7, etc., and, in RV, Ex 21 30; I S 12 3). (2) pidhyōn, 'freedom' (Is 35 11; Hos 13 14; Ps 69 18; Is 51 11 RV). (3) verb ga'al, 'to redeem' (Is 51 10 AV; Jer 31 11 AV). (4) λύτρον, ἀντίλυτρον (Mt 20 28; I Ti 2 6). In the O T the underlying conception is that of release from an evil condition, under the control of another. The method of release is not clearly presented. But its essence is that of propitiating, either by a sacrificial gift or by the payment of a sum of money, him who has the power to release. If the former, the propitiatory gift may be a life, or the substitute for a life. In any case, the stress of thought is laid, not on the method of ransoming, but on the result, i.e., the release of the ransomed. In the N T the conception rises into a place of the highest importance, because it expresses the efficacy of Christ's work of redemption from sin. In Mt 20 28, Mk 10 45 Jesus describes His own mission as the giving of "his life a ransom for many." But in this connection "ransom" can be neither the process of securing release nor the simple result of that process—the release itself. How this operates is not clearly given, and conflicting views have been propounded on the subject. See Stevens, Theol. of the N T (1899), p. 119; Weiss, The Rel. of the N T (1905), pp. 228 ff. A. C. Z.

RAPHA, rê'fa (רָפָא, rāphā'): The ancestral head of a clan of Benjamin (I Ch 8 2). E. E. N.

RAPHAH, rê'fā. See REPHAIAH.

RAPHU, rê'fiū (רָפוּא, rāphū'), 'healed': The father of Palti, one of the spies (Nu 13 9); perhaps the same as Rapha. E. E. N.

RAVEN. See PALESTINE, § 25.

RAZOR: This term is the rendering of: (1) ta'ar (Nu 6 5, 8 7; Is 7 20; Ezk 5 1), which means also the sheath of a sword, and (2) mōrāh (Jg 13 5, 16 17; I S 1 11), which is probably the specific Heb. word for "razor." The earliest razors were of flint, later bronze (see METALS) and steel came to be used. See also SHAVE, SHAVING. C. S. T.

READ, READING. See EDUCATION, §§ 8 ff.

REAIAH, re-ê'ya or rî"a-ai'a (רְאָיָה, re'āyāh), 'J" hath seen': 1. The ancestor of a clan of Judah (I Ch 4 2). 2. A Reubenite (I Ch 5 5, Reaia AV). 3. The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 47; Neh 7 50). E. E. N.

REAP, REAPER, REAPING. See AGRICULTURE, § 5.

REARWARD (Rereward AV): In I S 29 2 the word has no technical significance; it means simply the last part of the line to march by. But in other places (Nu 10 25; Jos 6 9, 13; Is 52 12, 58 8) the expression (from the verb 'āṣaph, 'to gather') refers to those who 'close up' the formal line of march. E. E. N.

REBA, rî'ba (רֶבַע, rebha'): A petty 'king' of Midian, slain by Israel (Nu 31 8; Jos 13 21). E. E. N.

REBEKAH, re-bek'ā (רִבְקָה, ribhqāh, Rebecca, Ro 9 10): The wife of Isaac. R. was the daughter of Bethuel, Abraham's nephew (Gn 22 23), and lived in Paddan-aram until her betrothal, the story of which (ch. 24) "is told with singular picturesqueness and grace, and presents an idyllic picture of simple Eastern life" (Driver, Com., ad loc.). The character of R., however, as revealed in subsequent chapters, is far from attractive. Of her two sons, Esau and Jacob (25 21 ff.), she favored the latter (25 28), whom she taught to deceive his blind father and assisted in his flight to her brother Laban (ch. 27). While dwelling in Gerar, Isaac unsuccessfully attempted to pass off Rebekah as his sister (26 6 ff.; apparently a duplicate of the similar story in ch. 20). Jacob speaks of his mother as buried in the cave of Machpelah (49 31), but the circumstances of her death are not mentioned. See also ISAAC. L. G. L.

REBUKE: This word renders terms derived from five Heb. and four Gr. roots: (1) gā'ar, 'chide,' used of man (Gn 37 10; Ru 2 16; Jer 29 27 RV); of God (Ps 9 5 [6], 68 30 [31], 119 21; Is 17 13; Zec 3 2); 'check' or 'restrain by reprimand,' of God (Ps 106 9; Nah 1 4; Is 54 9; Mal 2 3 "corrupt AV," 3 11); g'ārāh, n., 'chiding,' used of man (Pr 13 1, 17 10; Ec 7 5; Pr 13 8, "threatening" RV; Is 30 17, "threat" RV); 'reprobation in act' of God (Ps 76 6 [7], 80 16 [17]; Is 51 20, 66 15); 'a check' of God (II S 22 16 = Ps 18 15 [16]; Ps 104 7; Is 50 2), mig'ereth (Dt 28 20). (2) herpāh (Is 25 8 and Jer 15 15, "reproach" RV). Elsewhere almost uniformly "reproach." (3) yākhaḥ in Hiph., 'judge' (Gn 31 42; I Ch 12 17); 'decide for' (Is 2 4 = Mic 4 3); 'correct' (Ps 6 1 [2] 38 1 [2]); 'chide,' 'reprove' (Pr 9 7, 8 and Am 5 10, "reprove" RV; Lv 19 17; Pr 24 25, 28 23); tōkhāḥāh in sense of 'correction,' 'punishment' (II K 19 3 = Is 37 3; Hos 5 9; cf. Ps 149 7 pl.); tōkhaḥath, 'reproof' (Pr 27 5); 'correction' (Ps 39 11 [12]; Ezk 5 15, 25 17). (4) mūṣār (Hos 5 2), lit. 'I [God] am a chastisement ["rebuker" AV] for them.' (5) rībh (Neh 5 7, "contended" RV). (6) ἀμώμητος (Ph 2 15, "without blemish" RV). (7) ἐπιπλήσσειν, 'chide' (I Ti 5 1). (8) ἐλέγχειν, 'convict of error,' 'refute' (Tit 1 13, 2 15; cf. 1 9); 'chide' (I Ti 5 20), 'punish' (He 12 5; Rev 3 19). "Reprove" RV in all five passages; ἔλεγξις (II P 2 16). (9) ἐπιτιμᾶν, 'chide' (Mt 16 22; Mk 8 32, 33; Lk 9 55, 17 3, 23 40; II Ti 4 2); 'rebuke' in order to restrain (Mt 8 26, 17 18, 20 31; Mk 1 25, 4 39, 9 25, 10 48, "charged" AV; Lk 4 35, 39, 41, 8 24, 9 42, 18 39; Jude ver. 9), in the sense of 'to keep away' (Mt 19 13; Mk 10 13; Lk 18 15). C. S. T.

RECAH, rî'cā (רֵכָה, rēkhāh, Rechah AV): A town whose site is unknown. The notice in I Ch 4 12 is obscure, and appears to indicate the mixed descent of the inhabitants of the towns mentioned. E. E. N.

RECEIPT OF CUSTOM. See TAX, TAXATION.

RECHAB, rî'cab (רֵכָב, rēkhābh), 'rider,' 'horseman': 1. Son of Rimmon, a Beerothite. With his brother Raanah he murdered Ishbosheth, son of Saul (II S 4 2 ff.), and was put to death by David. 2. A descendant of Hammath, the Kenite (I Ch 2 55, "Hemath" AV), and the father of Jehonadab (II K 10 15), and of the Malchiah who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3 14). The special distinction of Rechab is that he founded a tribe of total abstainers called, after himself, Rechabites (Jer 35 6). The phrase "Hammath, the father of the house of Rechab" (I Ch 2 55) seems to make the real founder of the tribe Hammath himself. This, however, is probably the result of the long residence of the clan at Hammath (the place), and the effort to fix its genealogy locally. But "Rechab" means 'rider [on camels],' which affiliates the clan with an earlier or nomadic mode of life. The organization of the Rechabites was evidently effected by Jehonadab upon the basis of zealous worship of J", and the complete prohibition of wine and of a settled city or town life. In II K 10 15 Jehonadab, evidently in the character of a Rechabite, is shown to have joined himself to Jehu, when the latter made his attack upon Baal-worship and exterminated the house of Ahab. The Rechabites came into the fullest view among the Israelites through the prophetic word of Jeremiah (ch. 35), who used a coming of a band of them into Jerusalem at the time of the siege of the city as the occasion for pointing to their loyalty to the law of their founder as worthy of emulation by Israel in general. In later times the name "Rechabite" was perpetuated, partly by the descendants of these early clansmen, and partly by imitators of their practise of abstinence from wine. They are mentioned as existing in the N T times (Eus. HE, II, 23). In modern times, they are said to exist in Syria and Arabia. But the lineal connection of these with the Biblical Rechabites is doubtful. A. C. Z.

RECHABITE, rec'a-bait, rî'cab-ait, or rec'ab-ait. See RECHAB.

RECHAH, rî'cā. See RECAH.

RECOMPENSE: This term represents (1) gāmal, 'to requite,' noun gᵉmūl (II S 19 36; Is 35 4). (2) nāthan, 'to render' (II Ch 6 23, but "requiting" RV; and Ezk 7 3, "to bring upon" RV). (3) shūbh, 'to restore' (Nu 5 7 f., but "to make restitution," II S 22 21 RV). (4) shālam, nouns shīllūm, shillem, 'to complete,' as if a transaction in which a restitutory portion was still pending was not complete (Is 65 6; Jer 16 18). (5) temūrāh, 'exchange' (Job 15 31). (6) ἀποδίδοναι, 'to give back' (Ro 12 17), with compound ἀνταποδίδοναι (Lk 14 14), noun ἀνταπόδομα, and (7) ἀντιμισθία (He 11 26). The generic idea of recompense is that of restoration of an equitable status wherever it has been disturbed, whether in the relations of men with one another or with God. But an ethical, as contrasted with a commercial, notion of equity is given in the doctrine that J" is Himself the avenger of the weak, and will see that they receive just treatment. In His own conduct, He always deals according to just standards (Dt 32 35; Ro 12 19). A. C. Z.

RECONCILE, RECONCILIATION: These words have almost disappeared from the O T in the RV, being retained only in Dn 9 24 and I S 29 4. In the N T "reconcile" occurs fourteen times. Twice it is used of men who, mutually estranged, are to be reconciled (Mt 5 24; I Co 7 11). In the former case, the offender deals with his offense (cf. I S 29 4). Elsewhere, the reconciliation concerns the relations of God and man (compounds of ἀλλάσσειν being used); and in all (except Ro 11 15) Christ is directly named as the means of reconciliation. In three passages (Ro 5 10; II Co 5 18-20; Col 1 20-23) there is the same instinctive movement of thought. In each, God is said to have made a reconciliation in or through Christ which affects the race (or even "all things"), an act of God which is precedent to human personal acts and experience, but which is realized or consummated in the latter. This word has come to be used in Christian thought to describe the peculiar and unique glory and effect of Christ's person and work in our world. He has established a new relation to God, which is expressed under varying phraseology throughout the N T. The experience of it made the N T possible. As to how Christ produced this immeasurable effect, the passages above referred to and many others derive it especially from His sacrificial death. Other words also are used (see ATONEMENT; PROPITIATION; SACRIFICE), through which the various aspects of the problem are set forth.

LITERATURE: See under article on Atonement, also A. Adamson in HDB, s.v. W D. M.

RECORD, RECORDER: In all Oriental countries a record was kept of the important events of the reign of each king. In Est 6 1 this is called the "book of the records [zikkārōn] of the chronicles" (cf. 2 23, 10 2, "book of the chronicles," lit. 'book of days'; Ezr 4 15, "book of the records" [Aram. dokhrān], 6 2 "record" [dikhrōn]). Mention is often made of the "chronicles of the kings" of Judah, or of Israel (I K 14 29, 15 31, etc.). The work of keeping these annals was entrusted to one or more officials. Many have thought that this was "the recorder" ("chronicler" RVmg., II S 8 16, 20 24; I K 4 3; II K 18 18, 37; I Ch 18 15, 34 8; Is 36 3, 22), who acted as a state-historian. The Heb. word mazkīr (from zākhar, 'to remember') means 'one who causes to remember' or 'calls to mind,' and if not the first, he was among the highest court officials (II S 8 16 f.; I Ch 18 15; Is 33 3, 22). He is distinguished in almost all the passages from the scribe (ṣōphēr), q.v., who prepared state papers and had charge of official and foreign correspondence; but his position seems to have been greater than would be that of a state-historian, although he might have had oversight of the making of the annals. He was perhaps the chancellor (grand vizier), who called the king's attention to important matters of state, and acted also as counselor. In all other passages in AV where "record" occurs the meaning is that of 'witness' or 'testimony' and is so expressed in RV C. S. T.

RED SEA (יַם סוּף, yam ṣūph), 'sea of reeds' (Ex 10 19, 15 4, 22): The name of the great oceanic gulf between Egypt and Arabia, stretching 1,350 m. from Suez to the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb. For some unknown reason, the LXX. and St. Jerome speak of it as the "Red Sea"—possibly on account of its reddish waters and shells, or because of the color of the mountains of Sinai and Edom which border upon it. The Greeks extended the name to include the Persian Gulf and the Indian Ocean. The narrow gulfs on the W and E. sides of the peninsula of Sinai are its most important portions for the Biblical student. Across the western, or Gulf of Suez, marched the Israelites in their exodus from the land of Goshen; while from Eloth, or Elath (the Aila of Strabo), on the eastern, or Gulf of 'Aḳabah (sinus Ælaniticus), Solomon sent forth his navy to Ophir for gold (I K 9 26-28). The lack of 'reeds' and the presence of numerous shells on the shores of the Gulf of Suez lead the present writer to think that the Bitter Lakes and Lake Timsaḥ were at one time a connected part of the same body of water. G. L. R.

REED, REED GRASS: The flag, or reed (qāneh, κάλαμος), or rush ('agmōn, gōmeh), known to the inhabitants of Palestine as it abounds in the lowlands of the Jordan Valley and in Egypt. It is frequently referred to as a symbol of instability (II K 18 21; Mt 11 7, etc.), or of helpless weakness (Is 42 3). The reed was used as a measuring-rod (Ezk 40 3 ff.; Rev 11 1). In Jer 51 32, 'āgām, rendered "reed," should probably be taken in the sense of 'marsh,' or 'pool.' On Gn 41 2, 18, "meadow" AV. cf. RV, and on Is 19 7 for "paper reeds" AV read "meadows" with the RV See also PALESTINE, § 21.

REFUGE, CITIES OF: The designation of six Levitical cities where unintentional homicides might find asylum from the "avenger of blood" (q.v.) until arrangements could be made for an impartial trial, and also thereafter, if judged innocent (Dt 19, 4 41-43; Nu ch. 35; Jos ch. 20 f.). The positions of these cities were so chosen that a fugitive could always reach some one of them in a day's flight (not over 30 m.). It is probable that the other 'Levitical cities' also continued to exercise to some degree the right of sanctuary. We do not know to what extent these regulations were actually put into practise, but in the Greek and Roman periods many Hellenistic cities in Palestine enjoyed similar privileges.

According to the prevailing critical view of the formation of the Hexateuch, the cities of refuge were first appointed in the days of Josiah (621 B.C.), in place of the numerous sanctuaries which from time immemorial had been places of asylum, but which were now abolished by the drastic reforms of the young king (cf. Ex 21 14, 20 24 with II K ch. 23). See EB and JE, s.v. Asylum. These critical conclusions are attacked in Allen Page Bissell's Law of Asylum (Leipsic, 1884).

REGENERATION: This word (Gr. παλιγγενεσία) is one of several (see ADOPTION; CONVERSION; REPENTANCE) which are used to describe the great changes wrought in a man's thought, feeling, and will, in his conscious relations to sin, the world, and God, when he enters into fellowship with God through faith in Jesus Christ.

From its beginnings in Moses, the religion of Israel took its seat in the inner life of man. But at first this was an indistinct and undeveloped

1. In O T. fact. The steady and ever-growing insistence upon "obedience" and "not sacrifice" (I S 15 22; Is 1 11-16; Hos 6 6; Mic 6 7, 8; Jer 7 22, 23) gradually made the fact clear that Jehovah deals with the heart and conscience. Hence the later emphasis upon the necessity for moral renovation, which appears in such fulness in the Psalms (e.g., 15, 19, 32, 51) and in the Prophets, whose supreme work was to persuade the people to forsake sin and do the will of God. It was in the deeper crises belonging to the exilic period, when the individual stood forth as never before (Jer 31 29, 30; Ezk ch. 18), that this change was seen to be itself a work of God. The very failure of all warnings under the old covenant revealed the need of a new covenant whose fulfilment should be indeed the work of man, but of a new man, upon whom the grace of God has worked a moral transformation (Jer 24 7, 31 33, 34, 32 39, 40; Ezk 11 19, 20, 36 26, 27). But in the O T we have no clear testimony to such a change as an experienced fact. Joy in God there is, and a sense of the need of moral renewal; but there is no witness to any movement in which men had brought these two together, under conditions which they could apprehend, rest on, and proclaim to others. The world waited for the conjunction of these two apparently antagonistic factors in religious feeling. When that took place, the world's redemption would have arrived.

The N T describes the conditions under which it came about that men in whom the moral struggle was aroused found peace with God and

2. In N T. called it a "regeneration," a 'being born again.' Ipso facto we have the absolute religion, the religion of the Divine sonship. (1) Naturally, we do not find much explicit teaching on this topic from the lips of Jesus He, because sinless, had no such experience; and, while He was with them, the preparative but not the consummate conditions of the new life were alone presented to the minds of His disciples. Yet His call to repentance (Mk 1 15), His declaration that men must "become as little children" to enter the Kingdom of heaven (Mt 18 2), that sin is seated "within," in the heart (Mk 7 21), that men are "sick" and need a physician (Mk 2 17), that they need to 'become' sons of God (Mt 5 45, γένησθε), His emphasis throughout His teaching alike upon the vast gulf which separates goodness and badness, faith and unfaith, rebellion and obedience, love and hate, lust and self-respect, indicates that a mighty change which goes down to the very sources of man's moral consciousness is needed, if he is to be saved. The instrument of this change our Lord does not describe; but we are made to feel that it must be forged and used by God, if the soil is to be fitted for the seed. God alone can forgive sin. He can effect moral renewals impossible for men (Mk 10 23-27), the Son of Man is to save the lost (Lk 19 10), He in the name of the Father seeks and welcomes them (Lk ch. 15). In Jn 3 3, 5 the implicit truth of the Synoptic Gospels is clearly stated to Nicodemus. (2) When we turn to the story of Acts and to the Epistles, we find ourselves in a new atmosphere. The followers have become leaders of men, the pupils have become teachers. They are filled with the consciousness of oneness with the living and holy God; and for the first time in history that consciousness is the basis of a communal life and a universal gospel. The change which has been wrought by the power of Christ through the Spirit is described in the most absolute terms which language can employ Pauline terms are "a new creation" (Gal 6 15; II Co 5 17), a change from slavery to sonship (Ro 8 15), from a life "in the flesh" or "under the law" to a life "in the Spirit," "led by the Spirit" (Gal 5 16-18; Ro 8 2, 9), a life of faith for one who was "crucified with Christ" (Gal 2 20), a union with Christ in "the likeness" both of His death and His resurrection in which "our old man was crucified with him" (Ro 6 3-6), and a new man has appeared (Eph 2 15–4 24). We "were raised together with Christ" (Col 2 20, 3 1 ff.); those who were dead through trespasses and sins have been "made alive" (Eph 1 2-5; II Co 5 14, 15), "once darkness" they are "now light in the Lord" (Eph 5 8; I Th 5 4-7). Enmity has given way to peace with God, weakness is replaced by power, fear by love. "The old things are passed away; behold, they are become new" (II Co 5 17). The same enthusiasm, if not the same variety in its expression, appears in the other writers. According to Peter, they are begotten again unto a living hope (I P 1 3, 23) as new-born babes (2 2). The contrast between the past and the new standing of Jewish Christians is brilliantly described (2 5-10). Even the Epistle of James, which seems to be least doctrinal, yet founds its practical exhortations upon this new consciousness of the Christian community (1 1, 18), the instrument of whose production is the "inborn word" (Vulg. insitum verbum). In the writings of the Apostle John we find ourselves in a realm of sharply defined contrasts—life and death, truth and untruth, light and darkness, children of God and children of the devil, righteousness and sin, love and hate, belief and unbelief. These are not named in relation to the general Christian community, as is mainly the case with Peter and James; but, as is more usual with Paul, John generally puts emphasis upon the individual experience of this change. In Jn 3 3-8, the entrance to the Kingdom of God is described as a new birth which is brought about by "water and the Spirit," or "by the Spirit" alone. In his first Epistle John ascribes this act of "begetting" directly to God (I Jn 2 29, 3 9, 4 7, etc.). He is much concerned with the fact that the righteous man proves his new birth by his very righteousness. He is not righteous and so becomes a son of God. He is righteous, and therefore we know that he has been begotten of God (γεγέννηται; cf. the effect of the aor. in 5 1) and continues in that new relationship (μένετε ἐν αὐτῷ, 2 27, etc.). This act of God is not more closely defined. It is conditioned, of course, by the person and work of Christ, the only begotten (4 7-10). Very strong expressions are used to state the fact that this new birth issues in a holy life. The begotten of God "can not sin" (3 9), and it is in the keeping of His commandments we know that we know Him (2 3).

3. Summary.

The doctrine of a new birth, of a fundamental change in man's conscious life, pervades the whole of the N T. Various expressions are used for it, and it is often described where no definitive term occurs. Certain features underlie the teaching of the N T as a whole on this point. (1) The new birth is an act of God upon the inner life of the individual. His natural structure, so to speak, is not changed. But the whole meaning of his entire active self is transformed. Much in this must ever remain inexplicable; for here each soul may find its ineffable conscious contact with the Divine. But the act is realized in varying degrees. Some have to be exhorted to realize it and to give its reality scope in their active life and conduct. Others may have hearts open to its full wonder and power and joy. Yet again, it may be in some communal act of confession that all degrees of attainment unite in using the same language, conscious that some fundamental relationship, some identical spirit, is possessed by all (I Jn 5 18-20; II Co 5 11-20; Ro 8 12-17 [where first and second persons are constantly interchanged]; I P 2 3-10). (2) This change is wrought by God not magically, upon an impersonal substance, but personally—that is, ethically—through and upon the conscience, the will, the affections. Hence it is not a good which can be received apart from, or prior to, or in addition to, the personal relations in which God's call is heard and the act of obedient faith is performed. The new birth is the change in man's personal relations with God which has been wrought by God's redemptive acts and man's amazed response to these. (3) Hence the new birth is not an esoteric experience, confined to the élite of the race or the Church. It comes to the simplest and most ignorant, who are wise enough to understand the offer of mercy and to close with it and live by it. (4) The N T does not teach that regeneration restores us to the position of Adam before the Fall. Rather is the contrast definitely drawn between the natural life with its limitations and the spiritual, whose characteristic is the indwelling of God in our personal consciousness, in and for our will. Hence it is unsafe and misleading to say with some that in the new birth we receive a new personality (cf. I Co 15 45; Jn 1 12, 13, 3 6). (5) It is in the N T associated peculiarly with the ordinance of baptism (Ro 6 3, 4; Eph 5 26; Tit 3 5; Jn 3 3; I P 3 21); and naturally, for baptism was the open rite by which men entered into the fellowship of the Church. And that moment was in the early Church often accompanied by experiences which were identified as the work of the Holy Spirit. But the Spirit might thus "fall" before the rite was performed (Ac 10 44, 11 15). The solemn values of that sacrament are not removed when we insist that the new birth is an act of God, which has too often been as evidently bestowed upon human souls—as in the experience of Cornelius—apart from baptism to allow of our limiting it to the recipients of that gracious, communal observance.

REHABIAH, rĭ'hə-baĭ'ā (רְחַבְיָה, r'ḥabhyāh), 'J" has enlarged': The ancestral head of a number of Levitical families (I Ch 23 17, 24 21, 26 25).

REHOB, rĭ'hŏb (רְחֹב, r'ḥōbh), 'width': I. 1. A city of Asher (Jos 19 28, 30, 21 31; Jg 1 31; I Ch 6 75). Site unknown. Possibly two places in Asher have this name. 2. A city in the extreme north of Israel, probably near Dan (Nu 13 21; II S 10 8). See also ARAM, § 4. II. 1. The father of Hadadezer, King of Zobah (II S 8 3, 12). 2. A prominent Levite (Neh 10 11).

REHOBOAM, rĭ″ho-bō′am (רְחַבְעָם, reḥabh'ām, also Roboam, Ῥοβοαμ, Mt 1 7 AV): A son of Solomon and Naamah, the Ammonitess (I K 14 21, 31; II Ch 12 13), and king of Judah (937–920). His ascension to the throne was the signal for the expression of the unrest that characterized the last days of Solomon's reign. This was largely due to the heavy taxation necessitated by the public works undertaken and completed under Solomon, but also partly by the jealousy of the other tribes against Judah. An old line of cleavage (I S ch. 4) was thus revived, and, while Judah tacitly accepted Rehoboam, the other tribes took the occasion of the public assembly at Shechem (I K 12 1; II Ch 10 1), held for the purpose of recognizing him, to demand that this should take place only on condition that the new king lighten the burdens imposed by his father. R. took counsel first with the older leaders, and then with the younger, and ultimately followed the advice of the latter. This was that he should declare in favor of a policy of strong government. The result was the secession of all but the tribe of Judah under Jeroboam, the son of Nebat (I K 12 20; but according to I K 12 21, Benjamin joined Judah). The messenger of R. (Adoram) was stoned, and the king himself fled to Jerusalem, where he began preparations for an effort to regain control of the rebellious tribes. Two obstacles, however, thwarted him. First, the prophet Shemaiah forbade a war by Judah against his brethren; and, though R. was disinclined to heed the prophet's words, the people accepted them as from J″. Secondly, in the fifth year of R.'s reign Shishak invaded the land and engaged R.'s whole attention for the time being. This invasion resulted in the stripping of the Temple of all the treasure accumulated by Solomon, including the golden shields. These R. replaced by brazen shields which were kept by special guards and used only when the king went to the Temple (I K 14 25-28). Rehoboam, like his father, had a numerous harem. The latter half of his reign seems to have been comparatively uneventful.

REHOBOTH, rę-hō′bŏth (רְחֹבֹת, reḥōbhōth), 'open spaces': 1. A well dug by Isaac (Gn 26 22). The name survives in the Wâdy Ruheibeh, near which, 17 m. SW. of Beersheba, is an ancient well which Palmer identifies with Rehoboth (Desert of the Exodus, ii, 383). 2. "Rehoboth by the River" (Gn 36 37 = I Ch 1 48), the situation of which is more uncertain. From the context we should expect it to be in Edom; but "the river" is usually the Euphrates, and there is a Rahaba on the left bank of this river, not far below the junction of the Chaboras.

REHOBOTH-IR, rę-hō″both-ẽr′ (רְחֹבֹת־עִיר, reḥōbhōth 'īr, 'the city Rehoboth' (so AV), "the streets of the city" AVmg.: A town built by Nimrod in Assyria (Gn 10 11). The words are not Assyrian, however, but Hebrew, and mean 'the open places of the city,' i.e., probably, the sparsely built suburbs of Nineveh. Inscriptions of Sargon and Esarhaddon mention the rĕbît Nina, or 'open spaces of Nineveh,' as apparently an important suburb on the NE. of the city.
L. G. L.

REHUM, rĭ′hum (רְחוּם, reḥūm), 'compassion': 1. One of the leaders of the exiles who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 2; "Nehum" Neh 7 7). 2. A Persian official in Samaria who wrote to Artaxerxes, charging the Jews, who were rebuilding Jerusalem, with rebellion. Empowered by a royal edict he put a stop to the work (Ezr 4 8 ff.). 3. A Levite who helped to repair the wall (Neh 3 17). 4. A Jewish family chief who sealed the covenant (Neh 10 25 [26]). 5. A Jewish priestly clan which returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12 3; called Harim in 12 15; cf. I Ch 24 8; Ezr 2 39 [= Neh 7 42]; Ezr 10 21).

REI, rē′ai (רֵעַי, rē'ī), 'friend': A courtier of David, who remained loyal when Adonijah attempted to become king (I K 1 8). The text here is uncertain.

REINS: An archaic word for the kidneys, used in the AV to render the following two Heb. terms: (1) ḥălātsayim (dual only), 'loins,' so ARV (Is 11 5). (2) kelāyōth (pl. only), 'kidneys,' as the most sensitive and vital part of man (Job 16 13; La 3 13), and figuratively, as the seat of the emotions and affections (Job 19 27; Ps 16 7, 73 21, 139 13; Pr 23 16; Jer 12 2); also used with lēbh, 'heart,' the object of God's examination of character (Ps 7 9 [10], 26 2; Jer 11 20, 17 10, 20 12; cf. νεφρός (Rev 2 23, "heart" RV).
C. S. T.

REKEM, rē′kem (רֶקֶם, reqem): I. 1. A king of Midian, slain by the Israelites (Nu 31 8; Jos 13 21). 2. An eponymous ancestor of a Calebite family connected with Hebron (I Ch 2 43 f.). 3. The eponym of a clan of Machir in Gilead (I Ch 7 16, "Rakem" EV, from the pausal Heb. form). II. A Benjamite town (Jos 18 27), site unknown.

RELEASE, YEAR OF. See SABBATH, § 5.

RELIGION: Regard for what is believed to be deity. The idea of religion in its breadth and complexity is not anywhere in the O T expressed in a single term, but in phrases, such as "the fear [service, worship] of J″" (Ps 2 11, 5 7, 29 2; Pr 1 7, 14 27; Jos 24 2 ff.), or of other gods (Dt 4 19, 29 26). In the N T the nearest equivalent of the Eng. term is θρησκεία 'religious profession' (Ac 26 5; Ja 1 26 f.; Col 2 18). Of other words, σεβόμενοι (Ac 13 43, religious AV) is better rendered, as in RV, "devout," while δεισιδαιμονεστέρους (Ac 17 22, "too superstitious" AV "somewhat superstitious" RVmg.) is scarcely intended to denote more than that single aspect of religion which consists in being awed by the belief in the existence of supernatural beings ('fear of demons'). A. C. Z.

REMALIAH, rem″a-lai′ā (רְמַלְיָהוּ, remalyāhū): The father of Pekah, King of Israel (I K 15 25, etc.).
E. E. N.

REMETH, rî'meth (רֶמֶת, remeth): A city of Issachar (Jos 19 21), also called Ramoth (q.v.) and Jarmuth. See JARMUTH. E. E. N.

REMISSION. See FORGIVENESS.

REMMON, rem'ən (רִמּוֹן, rimmōn): A name found in Jos 19 7 AV, "Rimmon" RV See EN-RIMMON. E. E. N.

REMMON-METHOAR, rem''mən-meth'o-ār. See RIMMON, II, 2.

REMNANT (also residue): The term renders the Heb. and Gr. words: (1) 'aḥărīth, 'latter end' (Ezk 23 25), (2) ṣeraḥ, 'rest' (Ex 26 12), (3) pᵉlēṭāh, 'escaped' (Ezk 14 22), (4) sārīdh, 'survivor' (Is 1 9), (5) yāthār, yether, 'excess' (Zec 14 2), (6) shᵉ'ērīth (Jer 44 7, etc.), shā'ar (Jer 8 3, etc.), 'remainder,' (7) λεῖμμα, κατάλειμμα (Ro 9 27, 11 15), (8) λοιπός, (Rev 11 13). The term has, besides its general, also a semi-technical sense. The latter arose during that period of Israel's history when the judgment of J" upon the people for national sin was announced by the prophets. A misleading impression was apt to be produced by their warning words, to the effect that punishment meant extermination. This the prophets hastened to rectify (Is 1 9). A portion of the people should survive the purging process and constitute the Remnant [Residue] (Ezr 9 8; Zec 14 2). But being rescued from destruction was only the beginning of the Remnant's career. Whereas the judgment of J" was to scatter the body of the nation among their enemies, the Remnant would be gathered together from all such places (Is 23 3). It would then form the nucleus of a new Israel (Is 10 21, 11 11, etc.), grow into large prosperity (Zec 8 12), live in accordance with J"'s holy law, become holy (Zeph 3 13), and recognize J" as its God (Zec 13 9; Jer 32 39). All this, however, was to occur as the result of the gracious control of J"'s love for His Chosen People ("the zeal of J" shall perform it," II K 19 31). A. C. Z.

REMPHAN, rem'fan. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 19.

REND THE GARMENTS. See MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 1.

REPENTANCE: The word is the equivalent of Heb. and Gr. terms as follows: (1) nōḥām, 'penitence' (Hos 13 14). In the majority of instances the verb is used to describe in anthropopathic language God's feeling as He views the sin and failure of men to realize His will (Gn 6 6). (2) μετάνοια (Mt 3 8, etc.), 'change of mind.' To repent is to change attitude; the test of repentance is the altered conduct (Mt 3 8; Lk 3 8). This does not exclude feeling; but feeling is the starting-point and motive for the new life in the future, not the result of that life which has been turned from. Godly sorrow leads to repentance, rather than flows from it (II Co 7 10). Repentance is the first condition of forgiveness (Ac 5 31). But it is impossible to bring this change upon one's own self, and the act is repeatedly said to be stimulated by the initiative of God Himself (Ac 11 18; II Ti 2 25). The solution of the apparent contradiction created by requiring that as a condition in man which is to be expected only as a result of Divine action is nowhere attempted in the Scriptures. A. C. Z.

REPHAEL, rî'fa-el or ref'a-el (רְפָאֵל, rᵉphā'ēl), 'God heals': A doorkeeper of the second Temple (I Ch 26 7). E. E. N.

REPHAH, rî'fā (רְפָה, rephaḥ): A descendant of Ephraim (I Ch 7 25). E. E. N.

REPHAIAH, ref-ê'yā or ref''a-ai'ā (רְפָיָה, rᵉphāyāh), 'J" heals': 1. A descendant of David (I Ch 3 21). 2. A Simeonite chieftain (I Ch 4 42). 3. The ancestral head of a clan of Issachar (I Ch 7 2). 4. A descendant of Saul (I Ch 9 43, called Raphah in 8 37). 5. One of those who repaired the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 9). E. E. N.

REPHAIM, ref'a-im (רְפָאִים, rᵉphā'īm), 'extinct aborigines,' which meaning Schwally (Leben nach dem Tode, p. 64 f.) connects with rᵉphā'īm, 'shades,' 'ghosts'; the belief that the early inhabitants were giants came perhaps in part (W R. Smith quoted in Driver, Int. Crit. Com. on Dt, p. 40) "from the contemplation of ancient ruins of great works and supposed gigantic tombs" (the AV renders by "giants" except Gn 14 5, 15 20): It is the name for a giant aboriginal race of Canaan (Gn 15 20; Ja 17 15), of Moab and Ammon (Dt 2 11, here called Emim and in 2 20, Zamzummim); also of Bashan (Gn 14 5; Dt 3 11, 13; Jos 12 4, 13 12, 17 15). In other passages (II S 21 16-22; I Ch 20 4, 6, 8) we have the rendering "sons of the giant" (Heb. hā-rāphāh, which may be taken as the name of the ancestor of the race of giants). See GIANTS. C. S. T.

REPHAIM, VALLEY or VALE OF (עֵמֶק רְפָאִים, 'ēmeq rᵉphā'īm): A broad and fruitful (Is 17 5) valley, SW of Jerusalem, beginning on the SW of the ridge separating it from the Valley of Hinnom (Jos 15 8, 18 16, "valley of giants" AV), and extending toward Bethlehem (II S 23 13 f.). The Philistines often invaded this valley in their contests with David, and at one time held Bethlehem, while David was in the cave of Adullam (II S 5 18 ff., 23 13 f.; I Ch 11 15, 14 9 ff.). He defeated them once at Baal-perazim (I Ch 14 13) and again at the mulberry-trees (bᵉkhā'īm), from which place he pursued them to the coast (II S 5 22 f.). It is modern Bak'a, a moderately large valley, or upland plain, SW of Jerusalem. C. S. T.

REPHAN, rî'fan. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 19.

REPHIDIM, ref'i-dim (רְפִידִים, rᵉphīdhīm, Ex 17–19 2; Nu 33 14 ff.): Probably the fertile, well-watered tract of the Wâdy Feirân, which lies at the base of Jebel Serbâl, about 25 m. NW. of Mount Sinai (Jebel Mûsa). A hill which rises 700 ft. above the N. side of the valley is perhaps the eminence from which Moses watched the battle (Ex 17 9 ff.). Early Christian tradition identified Rephidim with Paran (whence Feirân), and the city here was made the seat of a bishopric. Numerous ruins of Christian edifices are found in the oasis. See Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, i, 158 ff.; also EXODUS, and MERIBAH. L. G. L.

REPROACH: This word renders terms derived from five Heb. and four Gr. roots: (1) gādhaph, 'to blaspheme' (Nu 15 30, elsewhere rendered "blaspheme"); giddūph (Is 43 28, "revilings" RV; cf. Is 51 7; Zeph 2 8). (2) ḥeṣedh (Pr 14 34), meaning 'disgrace.' (3) ḥāraph, the most common root, 'to say sharp things against,' 'taunt' (II K 19 4, 22 f.; Ps 42 10, etc.); ḥerpāh, 'taunt' (I S 17 26, 25 39), 'scorn' (Neh 4 4 [3 36], 5 9, etc.), 'condition of shame' (Pr 6 33; Gn 30 23; Is 54 4, etc.), 'object of reproach' (Ps 39 8[9], etc.; Ezk 5 15, etc.). (4) kālam, 'to humiliate' (Ru 2 15; Job 19 3); kᵉlimmāh, 'insult' (Job 20 3, "putteth to shame" RV). (5) qālōn (Pr 22 10, "ignominy" RV). (6) ἀτιμία, 'dishonor' (II Co 11 21, "by way of disparagement" RV). (7) ὀνειδίζειν (=Heb. ḥāraph, in LXX.), 'to revile,' 'unjustly reproach' (Lk 6 22; Ro 15 3; I P 4 14; I Ti 4 10 AV); ὀνειδισμός, chiefly LXX. for ḥerpāh (Ro 15 3; I Ti 3 7; He 10 33, 11 26, 13 13). (8) ὄνειδος (Lk 1 25), in LXX. usually for ḥerpāh, three times for kᵉlimmāh. (9) ὑβρίζειν, to insult or 'treat shamefully' (Lk 11 45; cf. Mt 22 6, etc.); ὕβρις (II Co 12 10, "injuries" RV). C. S. T.

REPROOF, REPROVE: These words render terms derived from one Gr. and three Heb. roots: (1) gā'ar, 'to scold,' 'reproach' (Jer 29 27 AV, "rebuke" RV); gᵉ'ārāh (Job 26 11; Pr 17 10 AV, "rebuke" RV). (2) yākhaḥ, vb., 'chide' (Gn 21 25; Job 6 25, etc.; Pr 9 8, etc.), 'correct' (Job 13 10), 'convict of error' (Ps 50 21; Pr 30 6), "judge" (Is 11 3), "decide" (Is 11 4 RV); tōkhaḥath (Ps 38 [14] 15; "argument" RVmg.; Hab 2 1, "complaints" RV), usually in the sense of 'chiding' of God and man (Pr 1 23, 25, etc.), 'correction,' parallel to 'rod' (Pr 29 15). (3) yāṣar, "to correct" (Pr 9 7 RV). (4) ἐλέγχειν, in the sense of rebuke (Lk 3 19; II Ti 4 2, "bring to the proof" RVmg.); "convict" (Jn 16 8 RV; Jn 3 20 RVmg.; Eph 5 11, 13); ἔλεγχος, 'convicting [of sin]' (II Ti 3 16). C. S. T.

REREWARD. See REARWARD.

RESEN, rî'sen (רֶסֶן, reṣen): A town in Assyria between Nineveh (on the Tigris opposite the modern Mōṣul) and Calah (the modern Nimrûd, 20 m. S. of Nineveh) on the Tigris, and according to Gn 10 12 founded by Nimrod. Site not yet found. C. S. T.

RESHEPH, rî'shef (רֶשֶׁף, resheph): A descendant of Ephraim (I Ch 7 25). E. E. N.

RESIDUE. See REMNANT.

RESPECT OF PERSONS: This term (except in La 4 16) means 'to show partiality in judgment,' by having regard for the outward circumstances, social position, etc., of men and not for the merits of the case. It renders (1) nāsā' phānīm, 'lift up the face [i.e., person]' of another (Lv 19 15; in RV for "accept" AV Job 34 19; Pr 18 5; Ps 82 2; in Mal 2 9 for "partial" AV; cf. also Job 13 8, 10; Dt 10 17; and massō' phānīm, II Ch 19 7). In II S 14 14 RV reads correctly "take away" (life). (2) Hiph. of nākhar pānīm, 'pay regard to the face' (Dt 1 17, 16 19; Pr 24 23, 28 21). (3) Various forms, προσωπολήμπτης (Ac 10 34), -λημπτεῖν (Ja 2 9), -λημψία (Ro 2 11; Eph 6 9; Col 3 25; Ja 2 1); and (with α priv.) -λήμπτως (I P 1 17), 'accepter of,' 'to accept,' 'acceptance of persons': all from πρόσωπον, 'face,' and λαμβάνειν, 'to take.' (4) θαυμάζειν (Jude ver. 16), "having men's persons in admiration" AV, "showing respect of persons" RV. C. S. T.

REST: When God had finished His work of creation (Gn 2 2 f.), He "rested" (shābath), or, better, 'ceased,' from activity. In the Heb. word there is evidently a reference to the 'Sabbath' (shabbāth), q.v. Refreshment is not implied in the word, although in the same connection elsewhere such a rest (Heb. nūaḥ) is spoken of (Ex 23 12; Dt 5 14; cf. Ex 31 17, "rested and was refreshed"). The author of He (3 11, 4 4 f.) connects with this rest of God from creative activity the promise to Israel of an entrance into His rest (καταπαύειν, κατάπαυσις). This "rest" (mᵉnūḥāh, lit. 'resting-place') was to be in the land of Canaan (Dt 12 9 f.; He 4 1), but by disobedience they did not enter into it (Ps 95 11; cf. Dt 1 34-36; Nu 14 23, 32 10-12). The "rest" of Israel depended upon God, into whose "rest" they through obedience might enter (cf. Dt 28 65, mānōaḥ). It was not obtained when they finally entered Canaan with Joshua; but was experienced in a measure under Solomon (I K 8 56). Although the physical aspect of rest, in finding a resting-place in Canaan, unmolested by their enemies, is here uppermost, there seems to have been the deeper spiritual conception of rest, through communion with God (Ps 116 7; negatively expressed Is 28 12; the presence of J" with His people is implied in Ps 132 7, 14). The author of He renews the promise of entering into the true 'rest of God' to those who believe (He 4 1 ff.). As to Israel, J" promises rest from sorrow and trouble (Is 14 3), so to those who die in the Lord there will be rest from their labors (Rev 14 13; cf. He 4 10). Christ offered men a "rest" (ἀνάπαυσις, Mt 11 29) which was His, through service to men and communion with God. C. S. T.

RESTITUTION. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (c), and ESCHATOLOGY, § 40.

RESTORE, RESTORATION. See CRIME AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (c), and ESCHATOLOGY, § 40.

RESURRECTION: The restoration of the dead to life is an idea which appears fully expressed, first in the N T (ἀνάστασις, Mt 22 23; ἐξανάστασις, Ph 3 11; ἔγερσις, Mt 27 53), though belief in resurrection appears in the later writings of the O T The Book of Job, however, which, upon the basis of 19 26 f., is often taken as implying the belief, can not be cited among these. The passage referred to is very obscure, and the best interpretation excludes the idea of resurrection from it. The thought of the Book of Job seems, on the contrary, to deny the expectation of a new life for the dead (14 14). Dn 12 2 shows the belief more clearly. The circumstances in which this book was published called for encouragement to faithfulness and warning against apostasy The persecution of the faithful and the easy escape of the lukewarm who surrendered their distinctiveness as Israelites presented a problem which could be solved only on the assumption of a bodily return of both, in order that the apparent injustice displayed by the several lots in the present life might be righted by the punishment of the one and the reward of the other. Of the resurrection of others than Israelites, however, even Dn does not take account; and resurrection, so far as expected, rests on the righteousness of God.

2. In the Intertestamental Period. In the intertestamental period Jewish thought was affected in a measure by the philosophy of Plato and the Stoics. So far as it is not thus affected, it is reflected in Sir, whose author distinctly denies immortality to man (17 30). This must, of course, be understood consistently with belief in the current doctrine of Sheol (cf. ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 30, 31). In Wis, however, the traces of Hellenic influence are very clear. Immortality, as contemplated in this book (2 23, 3 1), is not associated with resurrection, but with preexistence, as in the doctrine of Plato (Phædo, 70 ff.; Wis 8 20). But the legitimate successor of Dn, both as regards the definite assertion of resurrection and its basis, scope, and design, is II Mac. Here the righteous who suffer unto death are to be rewarded in a second life (II Mac 7 9, 11 14, 36, 14 46). It was a teaching, however, which met with doubt and denial, and had to be maintained in spite of these difficulties. In the apocalyptic writings the doctrine appears finally and fully fixed. In fact, its scope is extended so as to include all men (Eth. En. 51 1), and its object is defined as judgment for the deeds done in the body (Eth. En. 22). In the Test. of the Twelve Patr. (Benj., 10) almost the very words of Dn 12 2 are echoed (cf. also the later apocalypses; IV Es 7 32, 5 46; Syr. Bar 42 7, 50 2). In the time of Christ the belief was a test of Jewish orthodoxy, and universally accepted. This is certainly to be gathered from the Mishna (Weber, Jüd. Theol.[2] pp. 369, 370). Skepticism on the subject did indeed find strong expression in the sect of the Sadducees; but the Pharisaic side of the debate had the best of the argument, as it appealed to the nature of the Messianic Kingdom and its privileges, which ought to be enjoyed by all the faithful.

3. Teaching of Jesus. Jesus, by His teaching, miracles, and resurrection, puts the subject in a new light, making the N T phase of belief in the resurrection a new departure. He takes up all that is of spiritual value in the doctrine as developed up to His time, and grounds it in the idea of immortality. But immortality itself He builds on the relation of the faithful to God (Mt 22 23 f.; Mk 12 18 f.; Lk 20 27). Yet on the questions that concern the outward details, such as whether all men shall return to life, and what the conditions of that life shall be, Jesus has no explicit teaching. Nor does He affiliate the belief with the thought of judgment, as though resurrection were necessary to a just distribution of awards and punishments. Moreover, the teaching, as reported by Mt, seems to limit the resurrection to those whom God specially favors, whereas in Lk it is made to include all, as the continuity of conscious relation to God seems postulated in very explicit terms.

4. Jesus' Miracles of Resurrection. The miracles of resurrection performed by Jesus (Mt 9 24; Lk 7 11; Jn ch. 11) occupy a peculiar position. They are not to be classed with His own return from the grave, or with the final resurrection of all; their subjects are not introduced into a permanent and final state of being. But these miracles illumine the subject by showing death in a new light. Until they were wrought, it was true that no one on earth had ever displayed power over death. They revealed such a one. They illustrated also the fact that life and death are to be alike ministers of good to those whom God loves.

5. Resurrection of Jesus. But the greatest flood of light came from the resurrection of Jesus Himself (cf. JESUS CHRIST, § 17). First, it established the fact that there is a vitality within the physical life of man which, when the outward forces of that life appear to be dissipated, can draw them back and reconstruct them. Since the resurrection of Jesus this may be taken to be a cosmic law of which that event was the first historic application (I Co 15 23). Secondly, it illustrated the fact that the material body of the resurrection must undergo a great change, that it must transcend some of the limitations under which the body exists before death. The exact quality of the change is not made clear, but it suggests the existence of a hidden power within the personality of man which, if developed, might control the physical constitution in a large measure. Jesus seems to have had this control. He attenuated His body sufficiently to pass through closed doors; He made it unrecognizable by very close friends (Lk 24 29 f.; Jn 20 14, 21 4). On the other hand, He assimilated it to conditions of normal earthly life by eating and drinking (Lk 24 41 f.). Thirdly, the resurrection of Jesus infused vigor and stability into the whole realm of religious experience. It vitalized the faith of men in the invisible realities of the spiritual world (cf. I Co ch. 15).

6. Apostolic Teaching: Paul. In the earliest Apostolic thought, the resurrection of Jesus, with all its implications, came to occupy a place in the very center. Paul regards the faith of Christians as standing or falling with the reality or unreality of this fact (I Co 15 17; cf. also Ac 4 2, 33, 17 18). Paul further takes up the old question of the universality of the resurrection, and, with his characteristic breadth of thought, perceives that, in order to the application of the Gospel to all, judgment and resurrection must be predicted of all men. Hence he proclaims a twofold resurrection—of believers first and afterward of all (I Co 15 18; cf. also Rev ch. 20; yet this was anticipated in Dn 12 2). But, with equally characteristic logic, Paul interweaves the belief in the general resurrection with the resurrection of Jesus Christ. It is because Christ imparts a new and imperishable life that those who belong to Him are raised from the dead. If it be said that this makes immortality conditional, the answer is that Paul does not seem to accept this as a necessary inference from his doctrine. All shall be raised for judgment. The resurrection of others than believers must then be operated in a way which he does not undertake to explain. A. C. Z.

RESURRECTION OF CHRIST. See JESUS CHRIST, § 17, and RESURRECTION, § 5.

REU, rĭ'u or rū (רְעוּ, re'ū), an old deity name (?): The son of Peleg in the line of Shem (Gn 11 18 ff.; I Ch 1 25; called Ragau in Lk 3 35 AV). E. E. N.

REUBEN, rū'ben. See TRIBE, TRIBES, §§ 2–4.

REUEL, rū'el (רְעוּאֵל, re'ū'ēl): 1. The ancestral head of an Edomite clan (Gn 36 4-17; I Ch 1 35 f.). 2. The father-in-law of Moses (Ex 2 18; Nu 10 29 [Raguel AV]); but see JETHRO and HOBAB. 3. The "prince" of Gad (Nu 2 14; called Deuel in 1 14, etc.). 4. A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 9 8). E. Broadly, this term signifies the communication of knowledge. The etymology of the English word suggests the removing of a veil, or

1. Biblical Terms. covering, from what is hidden, thus making its existence and real nature known to the observer. This is also the strict sense of the Heb. and Gr. words: hanniglōth, "things revealed," Dt 29 29; ἀποκάλυψις (from ἀποκαλύπτειν); χρηματίζειν, Lk 2 26. In the O T the verb is used without any specific application to spiritual or religious knowledge (except in Am 3 7). This is implied, however, in the explanation of occult matters (dreams, Dn 2 19; cf. also Dt 29 29 and I S 3 7). In the N T the term χρηματίζειν, used only in Lk, indicates an oracular method of bringing information. Elsewhere the original conception of unveiling is maintained (Mt 10 26; Ro 1 17; Gal 1 12; Rev 1 1). But neither the simplicity of the term used nor its persistent uniformity indicates a simple idea or a uniform usage; they are simply outward and verbal.

First of all, the term "revelation" is applied to the act itself of imparting knowledge (as in Gal 1 12), then to the sum of the knowledge thus

2. Definition. imparted (I Co 14 26); next, to a record or book containing such knowledge (technically 'apocalypse,' Rev 1 1), and finally, to a special method of imparting the knowledge as distinguished from other methods (Eph 3 3; I Co 14 6). From the point of view of the method of information the term is not necessarily tied to any specific connotations. Paul uses it to signify the immediate communication to his own mind of the truth of the Gospel; but he uses it also to denote the moral instructiveness of natural or cosmic law (I Ro 1 18 ff.).

Revelation, then, in the typical sense, may be (1) subconscious, i.e., he who receives it may come to the conviction of the truth of what

3. Methods of Revelation. he has learned by a species of intuition, though he may not feel called upon to give an account, either to himself or to others, of this process. (2) Rational or ratiocinative, i.e., by way of reasoning and inference from already known truth or observed fact. (3) Scientific, i.e., by the interpretation of nature, history, or current affairs in the light of God's existence and control of these matters. In all these three cases there is nothing to distinguish it from the way all other knowledge is attained. But it may be by some special or unusual method, such as (4) vision, or (5) theophany, or (6) dream, apart from the processes of nature, or by the manifest control and direction of those laws on the part of a power higher than the known laws. In these cases revelation may be properly called supernatural, though the definition of this term in such usage should be strictly conventional.

The postulates of revelation include, on the one side, the existence of God, His personality, and His interest in man, or, in other words, the

4. Postulates of Revelation. fundamental positions of theism. Only a spirit with life, purpose, and love subsisting behind and beneath [over] the world can be conceived as a revealer in the strict sense. But such a being is the God posited in every theistic system. Consequently, the idea of revelation is an integral part of every religion based on this conception of the universe (cf. Tiele, Gifford Lectures, I, p. 157; Pfleiderer, Philos. of Rel. Eng. transl., III, p. 305; Kaftan, Das Wesen d. Religion). On man's side, the main postulate of revelation is the faculty of spiritual perception. No matter how real the will to reveal Himself may be in God, it can never result in a revelation, unless there be in man an organ or faculty for apprehending what is communicated. In Biblical modes of expression this is best put in the proposition that spiritual endowment is a necessary condition for recognizing God's revelation. "Spiritual things are spiritually discerned" (I Co 2 14). But the question at once arises whether such endowment is a universal gift, more or less latent in human nature, and developed more perfectly in some than in other individuals, or a special and extraordinary talent, which only a few privileged characters in the history of the race have received. According to II Ti 3 16 and II P 1 21, the Spirit of God was breathed into the authors of the O T, and these were borne along by His power. For the N T, a typical claim is made by Paul in I Co 14 37 ("if any man thinks he is a prophet, or spiritual, let him take knowledge of the things which I write unto you, that they are the commandment of the Lord"). This means that to the authors of the O T and the N T are attributed the power, unique either in kind or in degree, which enables them to understand God's thought as revealed to them. Not only the inspired writer, however, who perceives the revelation of God needs the spiritual faculty, but also the common man to whom he transmits it. The distinction between the first and the second has been put into the technical terms of inspiration and spiritual illumination. But the Biblical data are not clear enough, either to justify or to refute this distinction. The attitude of the revealing person to the recipient of revelation may further be conceived as one of waiting until the latter by his efforts apprehends the truth in store for him. The Biblical conception, however, is the reverse of this. It presents God as initiating the steps that lead to the recognition of him by man. "The world by wisdom knew not God" (I Co 1 21; cf. also Job 11 7). Perfect knowledge is a gift of God's grace. Yet discovery and revelation are correlatives. The one supplements the other. But revelation is God's initiative, and underlies, stimulates, and supplements man's efforts. It is a result of God's fatherly love.

5. Revelation and Inspiration.

As an action of God, working through His Spirit, the communication of a revelation to the human mind and His guidance of it to the moment of its expression in words, either oral or written, has been called inspiration. The fact of such inspiration is unmistakably presented in the Bible. In the O T the prophets claim that they are directed by J" in the delivery of their messages. (See PROPHECY, PROPHET, § 6.) But more clearly in the N T, the authoritative word of God is recognized to have been given under Divine guidance, both in its utterance (II P 1 21) and in its writing down (II Ti 3 16; cf. also Jn 10 35). The Apostle Paul further lays claim to authority for his message, and therefore to his being directed in its delivery (I Co 2 4, 13; Gal 1 12). And in a single instance (II P 3 15) one N T writer by implication attributes to another (Paul) Divine inspiration of the same kind as that which belonged to the O T Scriptures. Just what this Divine guidance secured in the delivery of the message the Biblical data do not explicitly indicate. Negatively, from Paul's disclaimer of absolutely perfect utterance (II Co 2 4), his failure of memory regarding small details (I Co 1 16), and his admission that his judgment on the subject of marriage might be wrong, even though he had the Spirit of God (I Co 7 40), indicate that he regarded inspiration as a means of assuring himself and others of the authority of his message, rather than a process by which he became infallible in thought and expression. But, upon the whole, it may be said that the Biblical statements are neither full nor clear enough to warrant any definite theory of inspiration.

6. Occasionalism of Revelation.

Another result of the dependence of revelation on the power of the human mind to apprehend it is the historical unfolding of revealed truth in parts and fragments (He 1 1 f.). Revealed truth has not come as a complete system, but as "precept upon precept, line upon line" in concrete experiences, calling for specific guidance and instruction. This may be called the occasionalism of revelation. As need appeared and occasions offered, principles were inculcated into the minds and hearts of a few chosen men. But once received, these principles became a permanent possession, to be used whenever similar needs should again arise. Accordingly, the more important and needful lessons were given first and again afterward in many and repeated forms, naturally with a slightly differing aspect with each repetition. The less needed, less universal and controlling thoughts appear less frequently, but both classes appear in concrete forms.

7. Progress in Revelation.

But revelation shows also a unity and coherency which make it appropriate to speak of the process as a progressive one. The word "development" applied to it is not altogether a misnomer; and even the term "evolution," properly defined, would describe a real aspect of the gradual and cumulative delivery of the truth of God. Moreover, not only the volume of fulness of truth and the clear enunciation of it are subjects of this progressiveness, but also the methods of its communication. In the earlier stages there was much that was simple and crude. The diviner and soothsayer found a place among those who were supposed to be privileged with special revelations. It is difficult to see much difference between visits to seers to ascertain the whereabouts of lost property (I S 9 3 f.) and visits to oracles (Delphi, Dodona, etc.) for similar purposes. To "inquire of J" is to seek a revelation, but about matters of ordinary and commonplace nature. Even affairs of state (I K 22 13) are scarcely of the level of importance with the revelation of truth in the Prophetic Age and in the N T. Further, in this earlier stage the most striking and cruder methods prevail. The inner and more refined are rarer. J" is consulted through ephod, through Urim and Thummim, and through dreams (I S 28 6). It is only with Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Jeremiah that the subconscious conviction of ethical truth comes into full play and takes a supreme place.

8. Revelation Through Dreams.

Dreams were regarded as possible means of revelation in all stages of Biblical thought. Even in the N T they are so referred to (Mt 1 20, 2 13, 20). On the other hand, it must be noted that the Hebrews never went to the extreme of exalting oneiromancy ('dream-divination') into a legitimate feature of religious life. The professional "dreamer," though known, was not conceded the position of a chosen medium of Divine communication. The artificial stimulation of dreams and their superstitious interpretation, as among the Arabs, Zulus, and others, were, on the contrary, rebuked by the prophets (Dt 13 1 f.; Jer 27 9). Dreams were merely possible vehicles of God's approach to man, and this in one of two ways, i.e., (1) by the appearance of a theophany in a dream (as to Jacob at Bethel, Gn 28 12), or (2) by the indication of His intention with reference to men and peoples in significant symbolism (Am 7 7 ff.). In the latter case there was need of interpretation, and the gift of interpreting was bestowed on favored individuals by God Himself (Gn 40 41; Dn 2 28). Dreaming as a medium of revelation is thus left exactly on the same plane with all other psychological processes. It is a condition neither more nor less favorable for the awakening of spiritual impulses and the attaining to a knowledge of Divine things than the state of wakefulness. As a rule, while reasoning power is not so coherent and normal, the suprarational and infrarational activities of soul-life are quite keen, and there is no difficulty in conceiving that through these the Divine thought may find entrance into the human mind.

Another medium of revelation in the earlier period was the trance (I S 10 5; II K 3 15; Ac 10 10, 22 17).

9. The Trance. By trance (ecstasy) is generally understood a state of the soul in which the free activity of the intellect and the initiative and control of the will are temporarily suspended. It is not a peculiarly Biblical idea that in the trance the subject comes into direct touch with, and in fact falls under, the immediate control of God. Ecstasy is found in the early period, before the prophetic method of rational control took the place of it, and again in the Apostolic Age, when the emotional accompaniments of religious experience were most vivid. It was not esteemed as of the highest value by Paul (I Co 14 23, 33), who, though himself subject to ecstatic experiences (II Co 12 2 ff.), yet does not indicate that these resulted in the preternatural addition to his fund of information regarding the spiritual world.

10. Vision. Vision differs from the trance in including or presupposing the indispensable element of rational control. Its characteristic is the presentation to the eye, either physically or in imagination, of revealed truth in pictorial form. In most cases, however, the materials of the pictures were present in the seer's own mind, and whether subjective or objective, the vision does not break into the stream of the prophet's psychological movement, but rather grows out of it. Consequently, a vision may be simply an oracular or inspired conception, which the prophet realizes to be due to a Divine influence exerted on his own mind (Is 1 1, 21 2, 22 1; Mic 1 1; Hab 2 2); or it may be an objective appearance built out of the prophet's mental store and serving as a vivid picture, both to himself and to his hearers, of the truth to be imparted through him (Is ch 6; Jer 1 5; Am 7 8); or, finally, it may be a construction more or less of his own, projected for the sake of convenience into objectivity and adding to the vividness of the impression of his message. Ezekiel's visions (ch. 1) are either of this kind or of the type just preceding; Daniel's are certainly of this class. It was this vehicle of prophecy that led to the development of Apocalyptics. (See Apocalyptic Literature, § 1.)

11. Direct Revelation. Theophany. A more direct contact with God is named in Ex 33 11 and Dt 5 4 as a speaking "face to face." The phrase is apparently clear, but exactly what is meant by it is found on closer examination to elude investigation. It does not mean a peculiar and unique prophetic experience; for it is predicated of the whole people in the passage in Dt. On the other hand, it does not mean merely an immediate approach to God and a free and full communication with Him, for it is a privilege given to his special servant, Moses. Beyond this, the general idea of a face-to-face revelation does not evince clear characteristics (cf. also Jacob at Peniel, Gn 32 30). Finally, theophany is in a sense revelation. But it does not appear that it ever was a source of addition to the knowledge of God and of His will. The theophanies (see Angel, § 3, and Glory, § 4) are manifestations of God's presence for purposes of attestation, rather than revelations of His nature. They presuppose a knowledge of Him sufficient to serve as a basis of recognition, but do not add to its fulness.

12. Revelation Through Prophets. Prophecy is not identified with any particular mode of revelation. Its characteristic in the earlier stages was heightened feeling, often culminating in ecstasy. But prophets were also given messages through dreams and oftener through visions and subconsciously formed convictions (cf. Prophecy, Prophet, in general, and especially §§ 5, 12 f.). The persistent elements in prophecy are not to be found in the form in which the message comes, but in the certitude of its reality (Am 3 7 f.) and the irresistible impulse to publish it (Jer 20 9).

13. Revelation in N T. In the N T revelation is known to take place through the Spirit of Prophecy, designated more definitely the Holy Spirit, and recognized as the source of all revelation in the O T times (Mk 12 36; Ac 1 16; He 3 7, 9 8). But the nature of the truth revealed might prevent the human agents through which it was given from fully grasping the meaning of it (I P 1 11). In any case, however, the prophets appointed to communicate saving truth committed their message to writing under the controlling influence of the Holy Spirit. See Church Life, § 6. In general, the work of the Holy Spirit in the mind is to be recognized as a means of revealing the mind of God to individuals (Jn 14 26). There is, however, also direct revelation from the Father (Mt 16 17).

14. Jesus Christ as a Revealer. But all other forms of the revelation of God's character, mind, and will come to a climax in the life, words, and work of Jesus Christ (He 1 1 f.), who is explicitly declared to be "the effulgence of his glory, and the very image of his substance" (He 1 3). Jesus Himself claimed to possess and impart knowledge regarding God which no other person can have attained except through Him (Mt 11 25, 27). In the Logos idea of the Fourth Gospel (Jn 1 1 f.) this conception is worked out into the doctrine that the eternal rational principle in God finds self-expression in the incarnation. Hence Jesus can say: "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father" (Jn 14 9). Accordingly, even Paul states that the revelation of God's love is made to himself through the vision of Jesus Christ (Gal 1 12). Christ is "the mystery of God in whom are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col 2 3); but He does not remain a mystery permanently: for in the incarnation He assumes the form of a human person (Col 2 9), i.e., becomes the self-manifestation of God in life and action (see also Col 1 15, 19; II Co 4 3, 6).

REVELATION OF JOHN, THE: The last book of the Bible, entitled in some later MSS. The Revelation of St. John the Divine.

1. Title. Strictly speaking, it was not John who made the revelation, but God who gave it to Jesus Christ, and He through His messenger to His servant John. This work has been known historically as the Apocalypse ('revelation'), because cast into the form of a vision, or dramatic representation, seen as if by the 'unveiling' of the eternal world before the eyes of the seer.

2. Contents. The book opens with the announcement by the author as to the method and purpose of his revelation (1 1-3). This is followed by a series of seven messages to the Seven Churches (1 4–3 22). As an introduction to these, the author attaches the usual self-naming and greeting of the typical epistle (1 4-8), and adds an account of the circumstances of the vision received at Patmos, and of the Sender of the messages, as He was seen in the vision (1 9-20). Next come the messages: (1) to Ephesus (2 1-7), (2) to Smyrna (2 8-11), (3) to Pergamum (2 12-17), (4) to Thyatira (2 18-29), (5) to Sardis (3 1-6), (6) to Philadelphia (3 7-13), and (7) to Laodicea (3 14-22). With the close of the seventh message the book takes a new turn. A picture of a heavenly court is presented, with a throne set in the middle, and four living creatures and twenty-four elders surrounding the throne, and giving glory to Him that was seated on it (4 1-11). On the right hand of the throne there is a sealed book, which no one is able to open or read until a Lamb appears, who undertakes to do so, whereupon doxologies are sung in praise of the Lamb (5 1-14). Upon the opening of the first seal, a warrior riding a white horse appears (6 1 f.); the second seal ushers in a red horse with its rider (6 3 f.); the third seal, a black horse, whose rider predicts a famine (6 5 f.). Upon the opening of the fourth seal, a symbolical figure representing death appears upon a pale horse, and behind him Hades (6 7 f.). As the fifth seal is opened, the souls of the saints underneath the altar present their complaint (6 9-11). With the breaking of the sixth, an earthquake takes place, and the great day of wrath is brought in (6 12-17). At this point, the sealing of the Redeemed is given in a separate vision, closing with the enumeration of their blessings (7 1-17). The opening of the seventh seal is followed, after a half-hour's silence (8 1 f.), by the sounding of seven trumpets, divided into four and three. The first four signal the occurrence of various forms of destruction upon the earth (8 3-13). The fifth trumpet is followed by the plague of locusts, declared to be the first wo (9 1-12). The sixth looses four angels with their destructive armies of horsemen upon the earth (9 13-21). Then comes the vision of the strong angel and the seven thunders, the contents of which the seer is forbidden to reveal, followed by the vision of the angel with the little book (10 1-11) and the two witnesses (11 1-13), the appearance of whom closes the second wo (11 14). The seventh trumpet is the signal for doxology, and for the revelation of the Ark of the Covenant in the heavenly temple (11 15-19). The vision which follows is that of the woman with the child and the Dragon, who seeks to devour the child (12 1-16). This leads to a struggle, a war in heaven, whose result is the overthrow of the great Red Dragon, who is at this point identified with "the Devil and Satan" (12 7–13 1). In another vision there appears a beast coming out of the sea, followed by another beast coming out of the earth (13 1-18). Again the Lamb appears, now on Mount Zion (14 1-5); and this appearance is followed by three proclamations delivered by special angels (14 6-12), and three minor visions symbolical of the end of all things (14 13-20). At this point the symbolism upon the canvas changes. Seven angels appear with seven golden bowls, whose contents are plagues (15 1-8). These they pour out upon the earth, the sea, the rivers, the throne of the beast, the Euphrates, and the air respectively (16 1-21). Then follow the mystery of the great and wicked Babylon (17 1-18), and its condemnation and destruction (18 1-24); whereupon a fourfold hallelujah is sung in heaven, and other tokens of jubilation are observed (19 1-20). Satan is bound and cast into the abyss (20 3), and Christ reigns for one thousand years (20 4-6), after which Satan is loosed, but is again overcome, and cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, together with his associates (20 10). All enemies of God are then brought to judgment (20 11-15); a new heaven and a new earth are announced (21 1-8) and described (21 9–22 5). The book then closes with a threefold conclusion: first, the words of the Revealer (Christ) are given (22 6-7); next, John's attestation (22 8, 9); and finally, an additional confirmation and invitation (22 10-20), closing with the benediction (22 21).

3. Form. The most striking feature of Rev is its literary form, that of an apocalypse, which places it in a special class of literary works (cf. APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, § 1). The apocalyptic form serves mainly to explain the symbolism and eschatology of Rev. Some of this symbolism is directly, or indirectly, derived from earlier apocalypses, from the books of Daniel and Ezekiel, and even from Babylonian sources (so Gunkel and Bousset). But whether borrowed from other sources or created by the author, these figures are simply the material out of which the author constructed the vehicle for his thought; they are merely the alphabet of his language.

4. History of the Book. Rev was known and certainly used as early as the middle of the 2d cent. Echoes or vague evidences of its existence appear still earlier in the Apostolic Fathers (II Clem. 17 7; Hermas, Vis. I, 3 2, 4 1; II, 2 7, 4 1; III, 5 1; IV, 1 10, 2 1, 4; Mand. X, 3 2; Ign. Eph. 15 3). Papias is reported to have quoted the book in his lost writings (cf. Andreas Cæsariensis, in Apoc. 34; Sum. 12). Justin Martyr distinctly names John as its author (Dial. ch. 81, p. 308 B; Eus. HE, IV, 18). After Justin, it is frequently ascribed to the Apostle John (cf. Charteris, Canonicity, pp. 239–256). On the other hand, in consequence of misinterpretations of the book, its authority and authorship were seriously disputed. The Alogi, quite early, ascribed it, together with the Fourth Gospel, to Cerinthus. Dionysius of Alexandria, a follower of Origen, comparing the language and contents of the Fourth Gospel with that of Rev, argued that, while the former was Johannine, the latter could not be (Eus. HE, VII, 25). But his motive for so doing was evidently drawn solely from the exigencies of his controversy with the Chiliasts. There were also those who, like Marcion in the 2d cent., did not hesitate to reject its authority, without disputing its Johannine authorship. Those to whom Apostolic authorship, ipso facto, carried authority sought to discredit Rev by proving that John did not write it. These and other considerations developed a difference between the Eastern and Western branches of the Church. In the E., while in the Syrian Church judgment was pronouncedly and persistently unfavorable, in Alexandria and elsewhere opposition gradually diminished, and toward the end of the 8th cent. disappeared. The early lists of the canonical books made in this part of the Church omit the book. (See Charteris, Canonicity, pp. cxvii ff., and 18 ff.) The Western Church, on the other hand, from the beginning accepted Rev into its canon. Jerome occupied an anomalous position, accepting it, but assigning it to a deuterocanonical place among the scripturæ ecclesiasticæ. At the time of the Reformation, the attitude of Erasmus was similar to that of Jerome. Luther wavered, and at last put Rev at the end of the N T, with James, and Jude, and Hebrews, breaking the connection in paging between this section and the rest of the volume. Zwingli excluded it from the Bible, and Calvin wrote no commentary on it. The state of opinion since the beginning of the criticism of the 19th cent. will be discussed best under the subjects of Authorship, Canonicity, and Interpretation.

5. Authorship.

After Dionysius of Alexandria (247–265 A.D.), F. C. Baur was the first to provoke a new investigation of the authorship of Rev. Baur took the ground that the book, as the product of a Jewish tendency in the earliest Church, was certainly the work of John. This formed one of the chief positions of the theory of the Tübingen school. The school of Schleiermacher, on the other hand, assuming that the Fourth Gospel was a Johannine work, regarded Rev, because of its differences from the Gospel, as non-Johannine. In the ensuing controversy, the position of Baur secured a temporary preponderance. Hase, Reuss, Sabatier, and many others adopted it. Later, the criticism of Rev was extricated from its associations with that of the Fourth Gospel, and, under Weizsäcker's leadership, its Johannine authorship was rejected. The latest stage in the discussion has taken the form of a redaction theory. This was worked out independently by Völter (*Die Entstehung d. Apoc.*² 1885) and Vischer (in TU, 1886). The former holds that a work of small compass was worked over and expanded through three or four redactions into the present book; the latter, that it is a Christian redaction of a Jewish apocalypse. The same general theory was further elaborated in extreme ways by Spitta and P. Schmidt (Anmerkungen üb. d. Composition d. Offenb. Johannis, 1897). Gunkel (Schöpf. u. Chaos, 1894) and Bousset (Der Antichrist, 1895, Krit.-exeg. Kommentar, 1896) search for the sources of the work in antecedent written and unwritten lore derived from Babylonia. Reduced to this form, the question of integration, or redaction, becomes simply a question of the use of existing materials by the author and is certainly consistent with the largest amount of independence and originality. It is evidently not possible to give a dogmatic answer to all questions regarding the origin of R., but it certainly arose within a Jewish-Christian setting; for its author uses familiar apocalyptic symbolism and language, and perhaps incorporates fragments of apocalypses current in his day. He repeatedly names John as the seer of the visions reported; but the apocalyptic nature of his writing demanded that he identify himself with the seer. Whether seer and author are the same person is thus left an open question. The name John frequently occurs in N T times, and may have been intended to indicate another John than the Apostle. In these two facts are rooted the uncertainties that hide the personality of the author, whom tradition has identified with the Apostle John, the author of the Fourth Gospel also. Of mediating theories between the total denial of Johannine authorship and the traditional view, one assumes that neither one of these works was written by its author ipsissima manu. If this be granted, all arguments based upon the literary aspects of the books, and most of those which are grounded in the nature of the contents, at once lose their force. Another view ascribes Rev to John, but insists that it was written during the days of the Neronian persecution, whereas the Gospel was composed toward the end of the Apostle's life, during the reign of Domitian. The interval of thirty years is deemed sufficient to account for the development of the style and the quality of thought of the Apocalypse into those of the Gospel. While this interval is certainly long enough to admit of considerable changes in an author's method of thought and expression, no such identification of the author can be made which is not open to challenge upon quite strong grounds. The author was certainly a Jewish-Christian with a universalistic outlook. He was thoroughly familiar with the O T, and appreciated the honor and prerogatives of the Jews as God's first chosen people (7 1-8, 11 1-13). He felt himself called to the work of a prophet, i.e., to bring a message to God's people under the special guidance of the Holy Spirit (20 18).

6. Date.

As to the date of Rev recent research and discussion point quite precisely to the reign of Domitian (94–96)—a return to the earliest tradition. Irenæus (175–200) asserted that the Apocalypse "was seen at Patmos at the end of Domitian's reign." Conflicting traditions, recorded by Tertullian and Epiphanius, are less trustworthy. The critical grounds for this date are: (1) the allusions to the violent persecution of the Church (6 9, 13 1, 14 9), and (2) the expectation that Nero was about to return (17 11). This expectation was popularly entertained, and served the author as a vehicle for the ideas he wished to address to his own audience. The argument based on 11 1, for a date before the destruction of Jerusalem, is scarcely strong enough to counterbalance these considerations, especially the fact of the vivid picture of deadly opposition on the part of the imperial government toward Christianity as such. Under Nero, or at any time before the fall of Jerusalem, such opposition did not exist. Furthermore, the expectation of a New Jerusalem (21 10 ff.), to take the place of the Holy City destroyed by Titus, before the catastrophe of 70 would have been only a prophetic ideal; but after that date, it became a glowing hope intimately associated with the Golden Age (analogous to Ezk 40 48).

7. Interpretation.

Rev has always puzzled the Christian reader, mainly because of its unique position as the only extensive apocalyptic production in the N T, making it impossible to compare it easily with other similar works, and master its peculiar modes of presentation. Moreover, the key to this class of literature was lost quite early. From the nature of the case there was a great risk involved. An apocalyptic book is composed in a language intended to reveal, and at the same time to conceal, the author's mind, to express it to his audience, but to conceal it from others, especially the hostile powers it pictures and denounces. Its language is esoteric. It therefore makes a definite appeal to be understood (13 18, 17 9), and the reader, belonging to the special audience addressed, is supposed to have the key, of which the outsider must remain ignorant.

The methods which have been used in the interpretation of Rev are usually grouped under three heads: the Futurist, the Preterist, and the Continuous Historical. (1) The Futurist assumes that Rev is a predictive description of the events that shall immediately precede the end of the world. The author was given a preternatural portraiture of the far-off events which should close the world's history. Just as Genesis throws before the eye in grand pictures the beginning, so Rev depicts in equally grand, and far more impressive, pictures the end of cosmic and human development. The one shows the origin of the world, especially the beginnings of sin upon the earth, the other reveals the end, giving a conception of the ultimate victory over sin, and the restoration of complete dominion to God, the Creator of all. For the author's own time, and for the intervening period, the book could be useful only as a ground of assurance, though a very strong one, that some time God would triumph over evil and bring it to its just termination. The reader meantime must be in expectancy, so that when the predictions of the book shall begin to be fulfilled he may see their meanings, and always have confidence that all the reverses of the Church and triumphs of the enemy are temporary, and that the cause dear to him is safe in the hands of the Almighty. Chs. 1 and 2 are excepted from this method of interpretation, as they seem to be directly addressed to existing churches. Able exponents of this view are B. Newton, J. H. Todd, C. Maitland, S. R. Maitland, I. Williams, D. Burg, and others. (2) The Preterist view is exactly the opposite of the Futurist. It assumes that the author's concern was solely with his own times. He speaks to the men of his own generation and regarding conditions then existing, predicting only events which occurred soon afterward. He speaks with the conviction that his own generation is the last upon earth. The end is near. Jesus is about to come the second time in glory, to establish the Kingdom of God according to His promise, and what was transpiring was simply the preparation for this coming. Consequently, all the symbolism of the book is to be explained upon the basis of events and personages within the 1st cent. Babylon is Imperial Rome; the Beast is the dynasty of the Cæsars, or some special member of it; the False Prophet is the religious hierarchy of Rome. The number 666 signifies Nero, and is to be read by gematria, נרון קסר (Nero Cæsar). The significance of the book thus becomes purely historical, though for the author and his contemporaries it had a present value. The most eminent expounders of this view are Grotius, Bousset, Calmet, Wettstein, Eichhorn, Hug, Herder, Ewald, Lücke, De Wette, Düsterdieck, Stuart, Maurice, and Farrar. (3) The continuous historical view avoids the one-sidedness of both of the preceding. It assumes that, while the apocalyptist's vision is of the things that must be at the end of the world, it necessarily includes the interval between his own day and that end. Thus the exponents of this theory have attempted to identify in the symbolism of Rev historical events of cardinal importance, such as the conquest of Mohammedanism, the growth of the Papacy, the Crusades, the Reformation, the discovery of the Western hemisphere, and a thousand others. The chief supporters of this standpoint are Vitringa, Bengel, Sir Isaac Newton, Mede, Faber, E. B. Elliott, Wordsworth, Hengstenberg, Ebrard, and Alford. These three methods have not always been applied exclusively. Futurists at times admit the use of symbolical forms referring to the environment. Continuous historical interpreters have recognized the primacy of ideas underlying the events portrayed, and have found the fulfilment of the predictive imagery not in single events, but in a series of recurrent ones having a similar character and import. Some preterists have finally seen in the description of the historical situation of the 1st cent. A.D. an interest projected into the present and the future. But the effort has always been to identify portraitures with events, and thus all three theories have been failures. (4) Consequently, since the rediscovery of the true nature of apocalyptics a fourth method of interpretation has been tried, which may be designated the recurrent prophetic method. This method assumes that the book was composed primarily to meet a present need within its day, and was designed to be understood by the men of that generation which knew and used apocalyptic language. Its allusions are largely to the current affairs of the day. Some of its forms are ancient, traditionally traceable back to the Babylonian mythology, some were constructed by the author himself de novo, others he found in apocalyptic fragments current in his day. But to all he attached peculiar meanings according to the demands of his own task. The need, however, which the book as a whole is designed to meet is a recurrent one. And the principles presented in it can be used upon every emergence of the same circumstances; so that, while the events with which Rev deals are imminent (1 1), their interest is permanent. They are samples and illustrations of a long series lasting to the end of time. The book does not purport to give items of historical character and importance, but an account at a glance of the whole course of the Church's experience. The futurist and continuous-historical methods fail in that they fasten on external events, rather than the living principles illustrated and symbolized by the imagery used. Similarly, the preterist errs when it limits the author's view to the events of the environment, and makes him simply a painter in highly colored symbols of these facts. He was more than that. He was a prophet who saw eternal forces at work in the play of affairs about him and declared them to be the underlying spiritual realities of the whole course of time, whether that were to continue for millenniums or to come to an abrupt close within a generation. The Muratorian Canon, as early as the 2d cent., points to the right method of reading Rev. It says: "John, too, in the Apocalypse, although he writes only to seven churches, yet addresses all."

8. Methods of Interpretation.

Though the early Church did not unanimously accept Rev (cf. § 4, above), if canonicity means the right to a place in the Church's rule of faith and practise, there can be no question that Rev has canonicity. The book represents the mind of Christ, is infused by the Holy Spirit, and contains valuable, nay indispensable, lessons for the enlightenment, comfort, and equipment of the Church and all Christians. Its inspiration is put beyond doubt by the fact that every devout and serious reader is inspired by it to greater confidence in the power and goodness of God through Christ Jesus, and enters the trials and tribulations of the world with the perfect assurance that the Christian community will be vindicated against all the brutal forces of evil, and that wickedness, even if enthroned as Rome-Babylon was, will be at last overthrown and brought to its just punishment.

10. Design. The primary object of Rev was evidently to encourage. The Christian community was to pass through a struggle involving suffering and distress to many, and apostasy on the part of some. The end was not to be uncertain to believers, but during the struggle they should be thrown into a state of agitation and gloom. It was of the utmost importance to them to realize that their trials were known to God, and that He was on their side in the conflict. Their enemies were His enemies. They belonged to a lower order of brutal beings, and derived their strength from God's great enemy, Satan. God would overcome and punish all enmity against Himself, although He takes a longer time to do so than human reason in its weakness would justify. The power of the brutal world-forces to do harm was only temporary. The Parousia was imminent. The book begins with the promise, "Lo, I come" (1 3, 7), and ends with it and the prayer, "Come, Lord Jesus" (22 20). But this is also a warning to the vacillating and weak, and a positive threat to the apostate and enemy. For the latter the author holds out no hope, and makes no effort to be understood by them. Their fate is portrayed in a form intended to deepen the sense of security in the faithful and urge them to continued fidelity and patience rather than calculated to affect or arrest the wicked course of God's enemies. These are left in the hands of the Great Avenger.

11. Theology. The background of thought is Jewish. The Messianic idea stands at the center. But Jesus is the Messiah, and His work is partly in the past and partly in the future. In the past lies the spiritual work of redemption; in the future, the political and cosmic work of conquest and world-renovation. The doctrine of the Second Coming of Christ thus takes a very prominent and, in a sense, a controlling place in the thought of the author. The first coming, however, has also a large significance. Through His death as the Lamb of God, Jesus has washed away the sins of His people. He stands in the place of supreme practical importance in religion. Though it is not explicitly so stated, it is probable that the reference to Him as the Lamb of God points back to Is ch. 53. In God, the aspect of majesty and sovereignty, rather than of universal love, is put into the foreground. He is seated on a great white throne, surrounded by a hierarchy of created ministers. Angels mediate between Him and even His most faithful and favored servants. A certain distance is thus put between Him and the world. But it is not fair to infer that there is a lapse in this doctrine from the thought of God's fatherly love as revealed in Jesus Christ and taught by Paul and John. It is the apocalyptic form of the book which determines the introduction of angelic mediation. Even those who believe in Him and are the objects of His care are put under the special charge of angels. Contrary to a prevalent view, it must be asserted that the eschatology of Rev is neither definite nor a prominent feature. Its symbolism allows us to see a confident expectation of the triumph of God's cause and of a general judgment with rewards for the faithful and a fearful doom for all classes of enemies. But special expressions, apparently referring to details of the future, are a part of the apocalyptic garb, and can not be pressed into definite predictions of special events. Underlying the whole texture of the thought are the ideas of immortality, redemption, and restoration to God of those who are affiliated to Christ by faith.

REVENGER OF BLOOD. See BLOOD, AVENGER OF.

REWARD: This term renders the Heb. and Gr. words: (1) 'aḥărīth, 'sequel,' or that which follows what it is given for (Pr 24 14, 20). (2) 'ēqebh, 'heel,' 'footprint,' hence 'consequence' (Ps 19 11). (3) shillūm, shillūmāh, shalmōnīm, 'completion [of what is in itself imperfect]' (Mic 7 3; Ps 91 8; Is 1 23). (4) 'ethnāh (Hos 2 12), 'ethnān (Ezk 16 34), both based on a doubtful text, and derived probably from the same root as mattan, 'gift' (I K 13 7). (5) gᵉmūl, gᵉmūllāh, 'just dealing,' 'recompense' (Ps 94 2; II S 19 36). (6) mas'ēth, 'present,' 'largess' (Jer 40 5). (7) maskōreth, 'wages' (Ru 2 12). (8) pᵉ'ūllāh, 'work' whose equivalent is the reward. (9) pᵉrī, 'fruit' (Ps 58 11). (10) sākhar, sekher, 'wages' (Gn 15 1; Pr 11 18). (11) shōḥadh, 'bribe' (Dt 10 17). (12) ἀνταπόδοσις, 'restoration' (Col 3 24). (13) μισθός, 'wages' (Mt 5 12). A. C. Z.

REZEPH, rē'zef (רֶצֶף, retseph): A city named with Gozem, Haran, and the "children of Eden," cities conquered by Assyria (II K 19 12 = Is 37 12). Most probably the Raṣappa of the inscriptions (Ῥησάφα of Ptolemy), the modern Ruṣāfa, between Palmyra and the Euphrates. The inscriptions show that it was an important trade-center. C. S. T.

REZIA, rē-zai'a. See RIZIA.

REZIN, rē'zin (רְצִין, rᵉtsīn; the original vocalization of the name was, however, probably raṣon; cf. LXX. and Peshitto, supported by the Assyr. ra-sunna): 1. King of Damascus (732 B.C.). With Pekah of Israel, he undertook a campaign against Ahaz of Judah (II K 16 5; Is 7 1-8), to coerce him to join the Syro-Ephraimitic alliance against Tiglath-pileser III. The king of Judah, contrary to the advice of Isaiah, appealed to Assyria for aid, offering rich presents (II K 16 7-9). Tiglath-pileser promptly came to the rescue. Rezin withdrew into his fortified capital, which, however, was easily captured, resulting in the death of the king and the reduction of Syria to a province of Assyria. Rezin is also named as a son of Tabeel (Is 7 6) (cf. Winckler, Alttest. Unters. pp. 74, 75; Schrader COT, I, 257). 2. The "Sons of Rezin" was the name of a family of the Nethinin (Ezr 2 48; Neh 7 50). A. C. Z.

REZON, rî'zŏn (רְצוֹן, r'tsōn) (I K 11 23): The son of Eliada and general under Hadadezer, King of Zobah. There is some question as to the correct original spelling and vocalization of the name. It is believed by some (Klostermann, Winckler, Alttest. Unters. pp. 61 ff.) that the name Hezion (I K 15 18) was reduced, first to "Hezron," and then to "Rezon." But the grounds for this view are not convincing. Rezon was the founder of a dynasty in Damascus which ruled from 950 (the age of Solomon) to 732 B.C. To this dynasty belong the Ben-hadads, Hazael, and Rezin. A. C. Z.

RHEGIUM, rî'gi-ŭm (Ῥήγιον): An old Greek colony in Italy, at the entrance to the straits of Messina, here 6 m. wide. Its important position gave it great prosperity, and, notwithstanding the vicissitudes of war, it remained a large city under Greek influence during the Empire, until at least the time of Pliny, and was a center for the philosophy of Pythagoras. Owing to the dangers to navigation in those days from the rock Scylla and the whirlpool Charybdis, ships were often detained at Rhegium by unfavorable winds. Perhaps this was the reason why Paul's vessel, after waiting three days in Syracuse, spent one day at Rhegium (Ac 28 13). On the second day the ship reached Puteoli. R. A. F.

RHODA, rō'da (Ῥόδη), 'rose': A maid in the house of Mary the mother of John Mark (Ac 12 13 f.). Whether she was a servant, or a member of the household, or simply one of the company assembled at the house is not known. E. E. N.

RHODES, rōdz (Ῥόδος): An island about 40 m. long by 20 m. wide, with a capital city of the same name, lying 12 m. off the SW coast of Asia Minor. Its harbors and situation gave it great importance as a port of call or transshipment on the voyage from Syria or Egypt to Rome. Paul touched here on his journey from Troas to Cæsarea (Ac 21 1). From 304 to 168 B.C. it enjoyed much prosperity, of which its beautiful coins are an index. Under able rulers Rhodes attained great sea-power, repressing pirates, and reaping a large trade as the fruit of wise home and foreign policy. Its magnificent, if somewhat decadent, sculpture, illustrated by the colossal figure of the sun at the harbor entrance—one of the world wonders—and its widely known school of rhetoric testify to its intellectual brilliance. Though its commerce was ruined in 168 B.C. by the Romans, and later, owing to its loyalty to Julius Cæsar, further reverses came upon it, its fortunes were retrieved so that in N T times it had become a large and beautiful city, probably including within its walls many Jewish colonists. To this restoration Herod the Great among others contributed. Claudius disfranchised it in 44 A.D., on account of the crucifixion of some Roman citizens, but restored its privileges in 56, and under Vespasian it became a part of the province of Asia. R. A. F.

RIBAI, rai-bê'ai or rai'bê (רִיבַי, rībhay): The father of Ittai (II S 23 29). E. E. N.

RIBBAND: The rendering of pāthīl, 'thread' or 'cord' (Nu 15 38 AV); the RV gives the correct rendering "cord." E. E. N.

RIBLAH, rib'lā (רִבְלָה, ribhlāh): 1. A place in Hamath, where Pharaoh Necho (608 B.C.) put Jehoahaz of Judah in chains (II K 23 33; cf., however, II Ch 36 3), and where Nebuchadrezzar (586 B.C.) passed judgment on King Zedekiah and put out his eyes, etc. (II K 25 6 f., 21 f.; Jer 39 5 f., 52 9 f., 26 f.). It is the modern Ribla, on the right bank of the Orontes, in the broad valley between Lebanon and Antilebanon. Many read Riblah for Diblah in Ezk 6 14. 2. Hā-ribhlāh (with the article). A place on the E. border of Canaan, S. of Hazar-enan and N. of the sea of Chinnereth (Galilee) (Nu 34 11); probably further S. than 1. Dillmann and others, following Wetzstein, suggest harbēlāh, 'to Harbel,' and identify it with Harmel (or Hörmül) 8 m. SW. of Riblah, 1. This site does not seem probable. C. S. T.

RICHES. See Wealth.

RIDDLE. See Proverb, and Wisdom, Wise Men, § 2.

RIDER: As used in the OT this word may signify either the rider mounted on his horse or mule, or as in Ex 15 1, 21, one of the riders in the war-chariot. See also Arms and Armor, § 6, and Warfare, § 4. E. E. N.

RIE. See Rye.

RIGHT: In most instances "right" (in the ethical sense) in the O T is the rendering either of yāshār, 'straight,' 'even,' or mishpāṭ, 'judgment' (or the conduct that is according to a just sentence of judgment). Other terms occasionally rendered "right" are: (1) 'emeth, 'truth' (Gn 24 48; Jer 2 21; on Neh 9 33 cf. RV). (2) kūn or kōn, root-idea 'erect,' 'upright' (Nu 27 7; Job 42 7 f.; Ps 51 10, 78 37). (3) nākhōaḥ, 'straight,' 'exact' (II S 15 3; Pr 4 25, 24 26; Is 30 10; Am 3 10). (4) tsedheq, tsedhāqāh, 'just,' 'right,' 'righteous' (II S 19 28; Neh 2 20; Ps 17 1; Ezk 18 5 ff., 33 14 ff.). (5) kāshōr, 'fitting' (Est 8 5). (6) The incorrect rendering of AV in Ru 4 6, Ps 45 6, and Ec 4 4 is avoided in RV. In the N T, apart from δίκαιος (ον), 'just,' we find εὐθύς, 'straight,' 'level' (Ac 8 21, 13 10; II P 2 15), and ὀρθῶς, 'correctly' (Lk 10 28). 1. Definition.

Of necessity, and always the basis of the notion of righteousness is conformity to a standard of perfection. The Biblical terms (tsedhāqāh, δικαιοσύνη; cf. tsadhīq, δίκαιος) present the conception as either a matter of recognized rule of conduct (Gr. from δείκνυναι, δίκη, 'custom,' 'usage') or a quality of inherent and inalienable normality (Heb. from tsādhaq, 'to be straight,' 'straightness').

But righteousness is not absolute perfection. Job claims for himself righteousness as a robe (29 14), and is called a "perfect and upright man, one that feareth God, and turneth away from evil" (1 1, 8, 2 3). Some of the Psalmists similarly call themselves "righteous," "innocent," and "pure" (Ps 7 8, 18 20 ff.). Noah, Job, and Daniel are named by Ezekiel as possessing righteousness, which would suffice "to deliver their souls" (14 14, 20). Such expressions could mean either that the righteous men mentioned were sinless or that a righteousness was attributed to them consistently with some sins, or sinfulness, in character. The first alternative is scarcely admissible in view of the fact that David is reckoned a man of such righteousness as specially to please God and secure for himself God's sparing loving-kindness, and for many unworthy successors covenant blessings. He is, moreover, chosen as the type of the Messiah, through whom God would save His people (I K 11 4, 3 14; Is 37 35). And yet certain crimes are laid to David's account, without the least effort to palliate them or explain their consistency to this estimate of his character. Moses himself, exalted above all the prophets, committed sins of such gravity that in punishment for them he was excluded from the Holy Land (Nu 12 6-8; Dt 34 10-12).

2. The Absolute Righteousness of God.

On the other hand, behind all statements imputing righteousness to men, an ideal looms into view by which as they are measured they all come short. Job, for instance, to whom is most explicitly conceded the character of a righteous man, is presently found acknowledging himself as sinful (Job 7 21, 9 20, 13 26). In fact, in the judgment of the author of the book, all men are under sin (14 4). The very thought of a man being righteous seems to be self-contradictory ("What is man, that he should be clean, and he that is born of woman, that he should be righteous?" [Job 15 14; cf. also Ps 130 3, 143 2; I K 8 46]). This ideal of righteousness is, like all other perfections, furnished by the character of God. But as the word for justice in Heb. is the same as that for righteousness, it is not easy to discriminate between the special attribute of justice, according to which God deals equitably with all His creatures, and righteousness, which is much broader, including in its scope other perfections, and approaching in content the conception of holiness. In the preaching of the prophets, however, where the necessity of righteousness in man is urged, the righteousness of J" is also shown to be a controlling attribute of His character (Is 41 10); He speaks righteousness (Is 45 19, 61 1), and acts it in all the relations of life, calling upon His people to have confidence and hope, as He comes nigh, because He is "the God of righteousness" (Is 51 5, 7 f.). Consequently, the key to the prophetic preaching is the Psalmist's dictum, "J" is righteous; he loveth righteousness" (Ps 11 7). God's righteousness, however, is a quality of His which comes into view with the nation of His choice. All His dealings are illustrations of His character. His punishment of Israel is righteous, even though it involves the apparent contradiction of the triumph over Israel of the heathen nations, which are more remote from His Law than Israel. These nations are not taken into account in those dealings, as they are only instruments in His hand for the chastisement and purification of His beloved people. Moreover, there always lies in the background the certainty of retribution for them after they have served this end.

3. Righteousness as a Religious Ideal.

In the development of the idea of righteousness, therefore, an element of piety appears prominently. The righteous man is contrasted with the unfaithful and godless. He is distinguished from the sinner, who cares little or nothing for J" (Ps 1 5, 7 9). The chief desire and motive of the righteous is to live in accordance with the will of J", as revealed in His Law. At first, this Law was identified with the simple requirement of zeal for, and devoted adherence to, J" worship. Of course, this included inner intellectual, spiritual, and moral elements. But these were held in solution and hardly differentiated from one another.

4. Righteousness as an Ethical Attribute.

With the prophets the ethical element was brought into prominence. The essence of righteousness was seen to be in conformity with the pure moral standards given in the character and the will of J". The righteous man, in their teaching, is the man of upright conduct, of pure mind and clean hands. The prophets of the Assyrian period found much in social life that was far from ideal in this regard (Hos 10 12); and their message was all the more distinctly spoken, because the thought of merit in ritual observance was gaining ground and overshadowing the real spiritual significance of the religion of J". According to Amos, God would not accept sacrifice or worship of any sort ("noise of thy songs," 5 23), but required that justice should "run down as waters, and righteousness as an ever-flowing stream" (5 24 mg.), and according to Hosea (6 6), He "desires goodness and not sacrifice, and the knowledge of God more than burnt offerings." The most explicit and striking statement, however, is the summary of Micah (6 8): "He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth Jehovah require of thee, but to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God." This is further shown by the contrasted notions of unrighteousness, which is predominantly moral. Ezekiel places over against the righteous man the wicked one (3 16-21); but both stand upon individual and personal character, without any commutation or artificial advantages inuring on account of non-moral considerations. This conception of righteousness as an ethical quality absolutely necessary in the normal relation with J" abides through to the latest times. It is the doctrine of Zeph (2 3) and Jer (9 24, 22 3), of Ezk (chs. 18 ff.) and Deutero-Isaiah (58 2, 60 17), and of Hag and Zec. Naturally, great emphasis is placed throughout the prophetic teaching upon the collective righteousness of the nation as a whole. For, after all, in spite of the individualism which appears incipient in Jeremiah and more clearly developed in Ezekiel, it is the Covenant

People as a body that concerns J″, and it is sin as a national sin and righteousness as national righteousness that draw upon it either His condemnation or His favor.

5. Legal Righteousness.

But the idea of righteousness has an administrational connotation. Righteousness is the right attitude toward an existing norm, which is God's will; but as this is expressed in the constitution of a theocracy, and becomes a legal system, righteousness, too, develops a judicial aspect. This is of extreme importance for the understanding of the later phases of the notion. It leads, on the one side, to a righteousness which is a forensic relation; and, on the other, combined with a developed emphasis on piety, or the association of righteousness with the worship of J″, it becomes the germinal center of another form consisting mainly in the punctilious observance of prescribed formal precepts. As a judicial notion, righteousness is sharply distinguished from holiness. It is never a question whether holiness is a transferable quality. Even when it was looked upon as consisting in the main in the observance of laws of taboo (cf. HOLINESS, § 1), it is an individual and personal affair [condition or quality]. But that righteousness was viewed as capable of availing for others than those who earned its merit is clear from Ezekiel's definite warning against this error (Ezk 14 14, 20). It is this aspect of it that gives significance to the statement made of Abraham, i.e., that "he believed in Jehovah, and he reckoned it to him for righteousness" (Gn 15 6); i.e., a different thing (faith) was viewed as righteousness. This statement illustrates the three aspects of the concept found in the O T—i.e.: (1) The religious aspect, according to which he is righteous who relates himself ideally with J″; (2) the ethical aspect, according to which that is a righteous act or righteous conduct which conforms to the express will of J″; and (3) the judicial aspect according to which that is righteousness which harmonizes with the order or Law of J″; and, therefore, one act may be viewed before the Law as a substitute for another, or one person as the representative of another. On this ground it is further possible to understand the comparison of righteousness to a robe (Is 61 10), or a breastplate (Is 59 17). In the first case, it is a cover and ornament; in the second, a weapon of defense. It is not necessary that these characteristics of externality and transferability should be considered very late growths. Probably from the very earliest time righteousness was viewed as something that might in a sense be detached from one and attached to another person. In the Hasmonean period a revival of zeal for the Law brought into prominence the strict observance of it as the distinctive national constitution. Accordingly, he was regarded righteous who most strictly adhered to the Law. And the Righteous (Ḥasīdhīm; see PHARISEES, § 3), from whom the Assidæans as a party were named, assumed more and more the rôle of the true ideal of the Jew. On the other hand, the ethical element in righteousness was felt increasingly to be the common property of all mankind, and lost its distinctiveness as a characteristic of God's people. This brought its fullest fruit in the Pharisaic ideals and teachings.

6. Jesus and the Pharisaic Ideal.

Thus when Jesus Christ appeared, the Pharisaic ideal had already reduced the notion to a carefully registered conformity to scribal interpretations of the Law, involving minute details of ritual matters (Lk 11 39 f.). Such righteousness Jesus declared to be insufficient, not offensive or sinful, but utterly inadequate. It might even become the occasion of sin, if it led to the neglect and omission of the weightier matters (Lk 11 42). His own disciples must see that their righteousness exceeds that of the Pharisees (Mt 5 20). What they should be Jesus did not leave undetermined. With great clearness and emphasis He authoritatively reiterated the prophetic teaching that the true righteousness is ethical fulfilment of God's ideal. In the N T, however, the same relative sense, noted as prevalent in the O T, is also found. Joseph is called a righteous man (Mt 1 19); so also is Joseph of Arimathæa (Lk 23 50), and even Cornelius the Gentile (Ac 10 22). Jesus, too, speaks of many righteous men, who with the prophets have desired to see the things which His disciples saw (Mt 13 17). By James the term is applied to the moral or virtuous man (5 6), also to the religious-minded (5 16). By Peter it is used of Jesus (I P 3 18) and of the Christians in general (I P 4 16). In He the Pauline idea of faith is read into that of righteousness, and the quality thus conceived is predicated of Abel (11 4) and, in general, of the saints of the O T as a class (12 23). But, in spite of non-technical usage, the teaching of Jesus presents righteousness predominantly as an inner quality. Outward standing and relationship are worthy of consideration only when they correspond with the inner condition. Not only does He warn His disciples against the defective idea of the Pharisees, but He rebukes the Pharisees themselves for transferring the seat of righteousness from the inner to the outer life (Mt 23 28). It must become an object of the most earnest endeavor and search, like food and drink (Mt 5 6, 10). It must be actuated by the desire to please God (Mt 6 1, alms AV), and it must take its rule and ideal from God's character. Therefore it is called "his righteousness," and stands associated with His Kingdom (Mt 6 33).

7. Paul's Conception of Righteousness.

The final stage in the development of the concept within Biblical limits was reached when Paul took it up and made it the kernel of his idea of religion. According to Paul, righteousness is the right or moral relation of man to God. It is the opposite of sin. But both sin and righteousness are also related to law, and while the one is the result of failure to comply with the Law, the other is secured through absolute conformity to it. But conformity must be perfect. In other words, righteousness is sinlessness. But sinlessness must not be understood as primitive innocence maintained throughout, else there could be no righteousness for any one, for all have sinned. The sinlessness which Paul has in mind is freedom from the condemnation of sin in the presence of God. Such sinlessness ('guiltlessness' = 'righteousness') is secured by the transgressor of law through faith in Jesus Christ, who through His life and death works out a righteousness ample enough to cover all transgression. It is the result of a process of justification. It is rightness with God, who is in this process looked at as a judge acquitting or condemning. Those whom He acquits, upon whatever ground, are righteous. They are acquitted when they secure freedom from guilt through appropriation by faith of Christ's righteousness. Accordingly, the righteous man is the man of faith (Ro 1 17). And the peculiar character of the righteousness thus achieved is expressed in the phrase "the righteousness of faith" (Ro 10 6). This, however, is not a new thing, but only a new name; for the true essential righteousness of all previous ages (e.g., Abraham's righteousness) was none other than this (Ro 4 13), and that of the Gentiles apart from the Law could be none other (Ro 10 30).

8. The Righteousness of God.

As the central kernel in the idea of religion, this is the righteousness of God, not as an attribute of God's character, but as the privilege of normal relationship bestowed by Him upon the believer in Jesus Christ (Ro 1 17, 3 5, 21-26). God's justice as a ruler of the universe and judge of men is not ignored by the appropriation of this phrase to this usage. It is rather assumed as beyond the need of an argument (Ro 9 14; II Th 1 5 f.; II Ti 4 8). The righteousness of God, from another point of view, is His administrative perfection as He deals with men. God is righteous, because He clears the innocent and condemns the guilty, enforces His law of equity toward all, and defends the weak against the strong, the widow and the orphan against the greedy and the extortioner. This involves more than the function of the modern judge, i.e., pronouncing upon the evidence placed before him. It includes the task of discovering the evidence in behalf of the helpless. God's righteousness at this point passes into His grace. With the Pauline idea of righteousness the conception has run its complete cycle. In the idea of sanctification, which is the complement of justification, the Pauline thought returns to the ethical notion of the prophets and of Jesus Himself. A. C. Z.

RIMMON, rim'ən (רִמּוֹן, rimmōn), 'pomegranate': I. The father of Baanah and Rechab, the murderers of Ishbosheth (II S 4 2 ff.). II. 1. A city of Simeon (Jos 15 32; I Ch 4 32; Zec 14 10; also called En-rimmon [q.v.] in Neh 11 28, so that Ain in Jos 15 22 and I Ch 4 32 is probably but a part of the compound name). Map II, D 3. 2. A Levitical city in Zebulun (I Ch 6 77, Rimmono RV; Jos 19 13, Remmon-methoar AV). Map IV, C 7. 3. A rock in Benjamin (Jg 20 45 ff.). Map III, F 5. III. The Semitic deity Rimmon. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 31. E. E. N.

RIMMONO, rim-mō'no. See RIMMON.

RIMMON-PEREZ, rim''ən-pî'rez (רִמּוֹן פֶּרֶץ, rimmōn perets, Rimmon-parez AV): A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 33 19 f.). Site unknown. E. E. N.

RING. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II, § 1 f.

RINNAH, rin'ā (רִנָּה, rinnāh), 'shout': The ancestor of several Calebite clans (I Ch 4 20). E. E. N.

RIPHATH, rai'fath (רִיפַת, rīphath): A son of Gomer (Gn 10 3; I Ch 1 6, Diphath RV). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11. E. E. N.

RISE: This term is used to render a number of Heb. and Gr. words, but, with two exceptions noted below, there is nothing especially significant in this usage. (1) The Heb. verb shākham, often rendered "to rise up early," means 'to load on the back [of a beast]' or 'on the shoulder [of a man]' As this usage had special reference to the lading of beast or man preparatory to starting on a journey, and as the proper time for such a start was early in the morning, shākham came to be the equivalent of 'to rise up early.' (2) For the use of the word in reference to the Resurrection, see RESURRECTION. E. E. N.

RISSAH, ris'ā (רִסָּה, rissāh): A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 33 21 f.). Site unknown. E. E. N.

RITHMAH, rith'mā (רִתְמָה, rithmāh), 'place of the juniper' (?): A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 33 18 f.). Site unknown. E. E. N.

RIVER: The Heb. and Gr. words rendered "river" are the following: (1) nāhār, 'stream' (Nu 24 6; Job 14 11; Aram. nehār, Ezr 4 10 ff.). (2) y'ōr, 'watercourse,' an Egyptian loan-word usually applied to the Nile (Gn 41 1, etc.), or its canals (Is 7 18), but also to other streams (Is 33 21; Dn 12 5 ff.). (3) 'ūbhāl, 'ubhāl, 'canal' (Dn 8 2 f., etc.). (4) yūbhāl, 'stream' (Jer 17 8). (5) 'āphīq, 'channel,' 'streambed' (Ezk 6 3, 31 12, etc. AV, "watercourses" RV; Song 5 12; Jl 1 20, 3 18 AV, "water-brooks" RV). (6) naḥal, naḥălāh, 'torrent,' the equivalent of the Arab. word wâdy (Lv 11 9; Jos 12 1; Ezk 47 9). (7) peleg, p'laggāh, 'channel,' 'division' (Job 29 6; Is 30 25). (8) ποταμός, 'river' (Mk 1 5; Rev 8 10, etc.).

The great rivers known to the Hebrews were the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Nile, and the Jordan (q.v.). Of the other streams, the more important were those within Palestine itself, such as the Shihor Libnath (Jos 19 26); the Kishon, which drains the Plain of Esdraelon and empties into the Mediterranean near the foot of Mt. Carmel (Jg 5 21); the Kanah (Jos 16 8); the "river of Egypt" (Gn 15 18); the Jabbok (Gn 32 12); and the Arnon (Nu 21 13, etc.). The importance of rivers was generally appreciated, but their use for intercommunication or as highways of navigation is very rarely alluded to (cf. Is 18 2). As boundary-lines, however, they are very commonly noted (Gn 15 18; Nu 34 5; Jos 1 4; Jg 4 13; II K 10 33, etc.). They were also regarded as sources of mysterious power, which is probably the reason for their association with supernatural visions (Ezk 1 1; Dn 10 4; possibly "the place of prayer" in Ac 16 13 represents a trace of such a notion in N T times). Finally, the river as a source of life and blessing became the symbol of all spiritual good (Ezk 47 1 ff.). Consequently, general destruction and ruin were fitly portrayed by the pouring of a vial of wrath upon the great rivers (Rev 16 4, 12), and the final blessed state has also its "pure river of water of life" (Rev 22 1). A. C. Z.

RIVER, THE: Where the expression "the river" occurs in the O T, without any explanatory statement in the context, it refers to the River Euphrates, the "great river" of SW. Asia (Gn 36 37; Ex 23 31; Dt 1 7; Jos 1 4; II S 10 16, etc.). E. E. N.

RIVER OF EGYPT (נַחַל מִצְרַיִם, naḥal mitsrayim, "brook of Egypt" RV): A torrent valley or wâdy, on the S. border of Judah toward the Mediterranean (Nu 34 5; Jos 15 4, 47; cf. Ezk 47 19, 48 28). It was considered the S. border of Solomon's kingdom (I K 8 65 =II Ch 7 8), and on the border of Egypt (II K 24 7; Is 27 12; in Am 6 14, "the brook of the Arabah" may be the same). It is identified with the Wâdy el-'Arîsh, which runs N. and NW. from the middle of the Sinaitic peninsula, and flows into the Mediterranean about 50 m. SW of Gaza. A long and deep watercourse, it is full only after heavy rain. It may have received its name from its location on the border of Egypt (mitsrayim). Others, who claim that Musur (mutsur) of the Assyr. inscriptions and mitsrayim of the O T are frequently the name of a N. Arabian district, through which this wâdy flowed, would derive the name from this country. C. S. T.

RIZIA, riz'i-a (רִצְיָא, ritsyā', Rezia AV): A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 39). E. E. N.

RIZPAH, riz'pā (רִצְפָּה, ritspāh): A daughter of Aiah, and a concubine of Saul, whom Abner took to himself (II S 3 7, Lucian's LXX.) after the death of Saul. Ishbosheth, Saul's son, looked upon this as an attempt to seize the royal power, and upbraided Abner for his disloyalty, who thereupon deserted the cause of the house of Saul and went over to David (II S 3 6 ff.). Much later, a three years' famine came upon Israel, and was viewed as due to the unexpiated sin of Saul in slaying the Gibeonites (II S 21 1-14). David therefore, at the demand of the Gibeonites, delivered seven descendants of Saul, among them Armoni and Mephibosheth, sons of Rizpah, to the Gibeonites to be hanged. Rizpah watched over their bodies, protecting them from birds and beasts of prey until falling rain showed that God's anger was appeased. On hearing of the mother's devotion, David had the bones of the seven, with those of Saul and Jonathan, interred in the family sepulcher of Kish, Saul's father. C. S. T.

ROAD: For "road" in I S 27 10 AV, read, with RV, "raid." See WAY for roads in general, also PALESTINE, §§ 5–13, and TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 2. E. E. N.

ROAST. See FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 10, and SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 16.

ROBBERY: In Ph 2 6 the Gr. ἁρπαγμός means, not 'the act of seizing,' but 'the thing seized.' In N T times the classical distinction between nouns in -μος, as active in their signification, and nouns in -μα as passive had been greatly weakened, as is evidenced abundantly in the N T itself (cf. active sense in ἀπαύγασμα, He 1 3; σύντριμμα, Ro 3 16 [from LXX.]; passive sense in θερισμός, Mt 9 37; μολυσμός, II Co 7 1); so that the RV rendering "a thing to be grasped" is certainly better than the AV "robbery," if by "grasped" be understood the selfish holding of a thing already possessed, rather than the ambitious reaching after a thing not yet secured, Paul's idea being that in His pre-existent state Christ already possessed equality with God in His being in the existence form of God (ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ). On robbery as a crime see CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2. M. W. J.

ROBE. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 4.

ROBOAM, ro-bō'am or rob'o-am (Ῥοβοάμ, Mt 1 7 AV). See REHOBOAM.

ROCK: This word renders in the AV five Heb. and two Gr. words. (1) ḥallāmīsh, 'flint' (Job 28 9, "flinty rock" RV; cf. Dt 8 15, 32 13; Ps 114 8). (2) kēphīm, 'rocks,' pl. only, perhaps an Aram. loanword, used as a "place of refuge" (Jer 4 29), and as a "dwelling-place" (Job 30 6). (3) mā'ōz, 'a place of safety' (Jg 6 26, "stronghold" RV. Moore Int. Crit. Com. suggests a natural stronghold, not a fortification). (4) ṣela' and (5) tsūr seem to be used interchangeably. Both words are used for that which is hard, barren, unfruitful, and also for a strong and safe place of refuge. ṣela' is the inaccessible and lonely home of goats, eagles, and doves (Job 39 1, 28; Song 2 14). It is also a symbol of obstinacy (Jer 5 3), flagrancy (Ezk 24 7, 8), and a figure of a razed city (Ezk 26 4, 14). tsūr is a symbol of firmness (Nah 1 6; Job 14 18, 18 4), of enduring material (Job 19 24). Both are used as a figure of God, often equivalent to J" and Elohim, to designate Him as the sure support, defense, and refuge of the godly, or as the trusty one (ṣela' only in Ps 18 2 [3] =II S 22 2, and Ps 31 3 [4], where it is equivalent to tsūr; also Ps 42 9, 10, 71 3); tsūr is used more often (Dt 32 4, 15, 18, 30 f.; II S 22 3, 32; Ps 19 14, 27 5, 28 1, 61 2 [3], 78 35, 89 26 [27], 92 16, etc.). In Is 31 9 RV ṣela' is possibly a figure of the Assyrian god, as is tsūr for a heathen god (Dt 32 31; Is 44 8 RV). (6) πέτρα, 'rock,' 'ledge,' as something that is firm and enduring (Mt 7 24 f.; Lk 6 48), or unfruitful (Lk 8 6, 13); as a figure of Christ, from whom springs the living water (I Co 10 4); also metaphorically for a firm, strong man. (7) τραχεῖς τόπους (Ac 27 29), to be rendered as 'rocky [rough] ground' RV C. S. T.

ROD: This term renders the following words: (1) ḥōṭer, 'shoot,' 'twig' (Is 11 1, "shoot" RV, a fresh growth from a tree-stump, the figure of a personal Davidic ruler; Pr 14 3 'a rod [shoot] of pride,' or "a rod [instrument of punishment] for his pride"). (2) maqqēl, 'rod,' more often "staff"; used by Jacob in breeding his flocks (Gn 30 37 ff.); a symbolic rod (Jer 1 11); a symbol of power (Jer 48 17). (3) maṭṭeh, a 'staff' or 'rod' of dry wood, and commonly carried by the Hebrews, but not always as a support in walking. It was used by shepherds (Ex 4 2, 4 ff., 7 15 ff.); for beating out black cummin (Is 28 27); was carried by a warrior (I S 14 27, 43; cf. "goad" Jg 3 31; I S 13 21); Aaron (Ex 7 9 ff., 8 1 f.) and the Egyptian magicians (7 12) had wonder-working rods. In Nu 17 2 f. [17 f.] mention is made of rods taken from the tribes; that belonging to Aaron blossomed. It was a figure of punishment or power (Ps 110 2; Is 10 26; Ezk 19 11 ff.). In Ezk 7 10, 11, a green 'shoot' is probably intended. (4) shēbheṭ, often equivalent to (3), a 'rod' or 'staff,' probably shorter than maṭṭeh and with one end enlarged, used for smiting (Ex 21 20; Pr 10 13, 23 13 f., etc.); for threshing cummin (Is 28 27); by shepherds (Ps 23 4; Mic 7 14). It is a figure of chastisement (Pr 13 24, 29 15, etc.), especially of Divine chastisement (II S 7 14; Ps 2 9; Is 10 24, etc.). By metonymy, both (3) and (4) are the terms for tribe (q.v.). (5) ῥάβδος, 'staff' or 'walking-stick,' the LXX. rendering of (2), (3), (4), above, and has the same variety of meanings in the N T (I Co 4 21; He 9 4; Rev 2 27, 11 1, 12 5, 19 15; cf. Ac 16 22; II Co 11 25, ῥαβδίξειν, where reference is to the Roman 'scourging' with the rod). C. S. T.

ROE, ROEBUCK. See PALESTINE, § 24.

ROGELIM, rō'gę-lim (רֹגְלִים, rōgelīm): The home of Barzilla, the Gileadite (II S 17 27, 19 31). Site unknown. E. E. N.

ROHGAH, rō'gā (רָו[ו]הֲגָה, ro[w]hgāh): An Asherite (I Ch 7 34). E. E. N.

ROMAMTI-EZER, ro-mam''ti-ī'zęr (רֹמַמְתִּי עֶזֶר, rōmamtī 'ezer): An expression taken by the translators as a proper name, but perhaps it should be rendered "thou hast set help on high" (I Ch 25 4, 31). See JOSHBEKASHAH. E. E. N.

ROMAN, rō'man: Roman citizenship (civitas) was confined originally to patricians, but was extended in full to plebeians in 337 B.C. The patricians and plebeians constituted the aristocratic citizens, while a half-citizenship was held by freedmen (ærarii), from which slaves and foreigners were excluded. The civitas conferred the rights of suffrage, of holding office, of appeal to the people (later to the emperor) against sentences of magistrates, of contracting legal marriage, of holding property, and involved the duties of paying taxes and bearing arms. It was indicated externally by the man's name (nomen, prænomen) and the white toga. This right was jealously guarded till after the 1st cent. It was obtained by birth or by manumission, or was conferred on men of wealth and position by the assembly (later by the emperor). Under the Empire civitas was valued because it conferred exemption from physical punishment (Ac 22 25), the right of appeal to the emperor (Ac 25 11), freedom from direct taxation, the right to hold office, and to become a senator. In the provinces every Roman citizen was an aristocrat. The Roman civitas superseded all other citizenship. Paul's family had the Roman civitas (Ac 22 28); hence it was certainly wealthy and influential, and had probably settled in Tarsus about 175–164 B.C. When among the Jews Paul used his Jewish name, Saul, but assumed his Roman name (Paulus or Paullus) at Paphos (Ac 13 9), as the Apostle to the Gentiles. His other Roman names are not known.

ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE

ANALYSIS OF CONTENTS

1. Introductory
2. Contents
3. Integrity
4. Composition of the Church
5. Date and Purpose of Letter
6. Relation of Letter to Paul's Work

This epistle belongs to the group of Paul's uncontested letters (cf. CORINTHIANS, EPP. TO THE, § 1), standing foremost, not only in this group, but among all his writings, as the most systematically doctrinal statement which we possess from him. It is this characteristic which has made the Epistle in all ages of the Church a great field of doctrinal controversy.

1. Introductory.

The letter opens with a rather elaborate greeting (1 1-7), followed by a thanksgiving for the readers' faith, in which he refers to his desire to visit them (1 8-15), closing with a passage which is practically a statement of the Epistle's theme, viz.: that the only righteousness acceptable to God is that which rests on faith (1 16 f.).

2. Contents.

This theme is then taken up and worked out with great elaborateness and a skilful arrangement of argument—covering in the process fully one-half of the Epistle (1 18–8 39). It is discussed first, negatively, showing how both Gentile and Jew had failed to secure an acceptable righteousness by works (1 18–3 20). This negative argument is presented (1) by a vivid statement of the condition of the Gentile world in the Apostle's day—showing it to be one on which rested the judgment of God, and, consequently, one which evidenced this world as having failed to secure acceptance with God for such religion as it had practised (1 18-32), and (2) by an almost equally vivid and a most skilfully presented statement of the condition of the Jewish world (2 1–3 8), showing that the Jew, far from having anything to boast of as to his standing before God, compared with that of the Gentile, was really under greater condemnation in God's sight, even in his Divinely given religion of the Mosaic Law; since he had had, through the revelation of truth which God had granted him in that Law, greater opportunity to know the right and to do it; whereas he was actually guilty of the same iniquities as the Gentiles around him (2 1-24); so that the Law in which he had trusted had put him under the judgment not only of God, but even of the lawless heathen world itself (2 25-29). It is a severe arraignment of his own people. In fact, the Apostle is so conscious of its severity that he feels called upon to remind his readers that, in spite of all the Jews' abuse of God's blessings in the covenant with them into which he had entered through the Law, these blessings were real, and would be ultimately fulfilled on God's part, because of this covenant in which they were involved (3 1-8). He then returns to sum up his argument so far, drawing the inference which it had rendered irresistible, that the entire human race, on the basis of its religion of works, stood guilty in God's sight (3 9-20).

Having finished with this negative treatment of his theme, the Apostle comes now to its positive treatment, which consists practically in a discussion of the righteousness which alone is acceptable to God—the righteousness by faith (3 21–8 39). This discussion is opened with a statement of the historical fact of the provision of such a righteousness through the death of Jesus Christ (3 21-26), from which is drawn the necessary conclusion as to the impossibility of any self-gratulation on man's part in the matter of acceptance with God; since faith excludes all that element of self-merit on which alone self-gratulation can rest (3 27-30), while, at the same time, it does not set aside the Law itself (3 31). This last statement is then elaborated into a disclosure of the fact that even Abraham, the head and representative of the covenant of circumcision, was himself justified by faith (4 1-8), before he had received circumcision (4 9-12) and independently of the Law (4 13-15), showing what had been God's purpose in such faith on Abraham's part (4 16 f.), and how that faith had manifested itself in Abraham's life (4 18-22), with the bearing of his case on the justification of the Christian (4 23-25).

After this statement of the agreement with Scripture of the principle of justification by faith, the Apostle proceeds to bring this principle to the test of the present life, showing its surety against all experience of need, both here and hereafter (5 1-9), through its impartation to us of the vitalizing power of the life of Christ (5 10 f.). The largeness of this idea of the coming to us of the life of Christ leads the Apostle into a consideration of Christ's relation to the life of the race, in which he contrasts the results of Christ's work with the effects of Adam's sin, showing how the former, through its element of vitalizing grace, must inevitably overcome and supplant all the death which the latter has wrought (5 12-19). In fact, where the Mosaic Law, which came into the history of the human race between Adam and Christ, intensified the death results of Adam's sin, there the grace of Christ intensified its vitalizing power to the destruction and removal from our life of these results (5 20 f.). This raises, however, the practical question regarding the Christian's relation to sin in his living. This question is taken up in the form of two self-stated objections to the Apostle's argument: (1) The objection that, if grace more abounds where sin abounds, the Christian should continue in sin, in order that grace may abound (6 1). This is answered from the point of view of the impossibility of such a life on the Christian's part, because (a) of the principle involved in his death to sin (6 2), and (b) of the ultimate moral end of his baptism into the death of Christ (6 3-14). (2) The objection that, if the Christian is no longer under law but under grace, he can afford to indulge in sin (6 15). This is answered from the impossibility of such indulgence, because of the mutually exclusive laws of service to sin and to righteousness (6 16-23).

From this general consideration of the spiritual and moral results of justification by faith, the Apostle proceeds to one of the most interesting portions in his letter, where, after an introductory passage illustrating the freedom from the claims of the Law which the Christian has secured by the death of Christ (7 1-6), he discloses to the readers, through an introspection of his own soul's life, the spiritual conflict in which the Christian must constantly participate while the principle of the unregenerate nature (the "flesh" ver. 23) and the principle of the regenerate nature (the "mind" ver. 23) are at war within him (7 7-23). From this conflict, however, the Christian will ultimately be delivered through the vitalizing Spirit of Christ (7 24–8 11)—a certainty of outlook which obligates him to subject his life to the control of that Spirit, and so to realize his relation to God as son and heir of all his glory (8 12-17). This mention of heirship leads the Apostle into an elaborate presentation of what is involved in the Divine inheritance for the Christian (8 18-39), with which his general discussion of the Epistle's theme is brought to an end.

The three chs. (9–11) which intervene between this formal argument (1 18–8 39) and the practical conclusions drawn from it (12 1–15 13) offer to the student of the Epistle an interesting problem, viz.: the relation of the contents of these chs. to the argument of the Epistle. After an introductory statement of an apologetic nature (9 1-5), there is given a plain affirmation of the liberty which God has exercised in His election of the spiritual Israel (9 6-29), which is followed by an equally plain affirmation of the responsibility which nevertheless rests upon the unspiritual Israel in its non-election (9 30–10 21). There is then outlined the plan God has for the unspiritual Israel, in view of its relation to Him as His Covenant People (11 1-25), to which is added a closing summary review of the situation (11 26-36). This closes the doctrinal portion of the Epistle.

Based upon the truths brought to light in this portion, there then follows a practical presentation to the readers of the consequent duties of character and life demanded of them, covering the fields of (a) duties to God and the Church (12 1-13; 14 1–15 13), (b) duties to the State (13 1-7), and (c) duties to Society (13 8-14). Upon this follows the general conclusion of the Epistle (15 14–16 27)—though the thought evidently returns in 16 17-20 to the urgency of the duty needful on the readers' part toward those who are causing faction and strife among them.

This gives us the contents of the Epistle as it stands before us. It is obvious, however, that the study of the Epistle must be determined by what constituted its contents when it was written. On this point there has been, and is to-day, wide difference of opinion. That there is cause for this difference can not be denied. (1) The existing MSS. give evidence that very early there was considerable variety in the place assigned the doxology of 16 25-27. In some it stands at the close of the Epistle, as it does in the accepted text; in some it stands between the last verse of ch. 14 and the first verse of ch. 15; in some it stands both at the close of ch. 14 and at the close of ch. 16; in some it is omitted altogether. (2) The fact that the Church at Rome had not been founded by Paul, nor even visited by him, when he wrote the letter, makes the last chapter with its long list of salutations seem peculiar and out of keeping with this situation.

3. Integrity.

There can be no question that, as far as agreement of thought is concerned, the doxology fits better at the end of ch. 14 than it does at the end of ch. 16. In ch. 14 Paul is speaking of those in the Chureh whose consciences are yet sensitive in the matter of eating food and observing days (14 1 f.). He urges both those whose consciences are thus bound and those whose consciences are freer in these matters to be charitable toward each other in their judgments (14 8-12). Especially does he urge those who are of free conscience not to put a stumbling-block in the others' way, but, in the spirit of Christ Himself, to sacrifice their own pleasure in these things for the sake of the weaker brother (14 13-23). Upon this train of thought the doxology would quite naturally follow with its ascription of praise to God, as one "that is able to establish them" (16 25); while the thought of the doxology itself would be immediately taken up by the thought of ch. 15, which in its opening verses is simply a development of this appeal to the spirit of Christian self-sacrifice on the part of those who are strong in conscience. There is no such connection of thought between the doxology and the list of names which immediately precedes it in ch. 16. There is also no question that ch. 15 closes with a benediction such as is found at the end of several of the Apostle's letters (15 33; cf. II Co 13 11; I Th 5 23; II Th 3 16; Ph 4 9; see also Eph 6 23; Gal 6 16), and, inasmuch as the doxology at the end of ch. 16 so well agrees with a position between chs. 14 and 15, the way would be open for a removal of ch. 16, with its list of strange names, without disturbing the conclusion of the Epistle. In view of this fact, and also of the fact that some of the names in ch. 16 seem better to agree with a residence in Ephesus and the province of Asia than in Rome, it is the almost general opinion of scholars that this chapter does not belong to this Epistle, but constitutes a brief note commending Phœbe (16 1) to the Church at Ephesus.

Apart, however, from the position of the doxology, there are reasons which compel us to assign this ch. to this Epistle, chief among which are: (1) There are no MSS. extant which omit ch. 16; so that, if it was not written by Paul himself in this letter to Rome, it must have been added to the Epistle before it was prepared for general circulation by the church of that place, and thus successfully foisted upon the Church at large from the very beginning. This is most unlikely. (2) Though Aquila and Priscilla (16 3) were in Ephesus not long before Paul wrote the Epistle (Ac 18 24-26), it is to be remembered that these intimate companions and fellow helpers of Paul regulated their movements from place to place by the missionary plans of the Apostle (cf. Ac 18 2 with 18 18). Knowing therefore Paul's settled purpose of proceeding from Ephesus to Rome (Ac 19 21), they may quite naturally have returned to their home city (cf. Ac 18 2) ahead of him—as they had practically done at Ephesus (Ac 18 18-21)—accompanied by Epænetus (16 5), who, as "the firstfruits of Asia unto Christ," was more likely to have been their convert than Paul's. In fact, it is interesting, if not evidencing, that from inscriptions and archeological remains practically all the names in ch. 16 can be shown to be possible Roman, while those Prisca, Amplius, Nereus, and Apelles are connected definitely with the early history of Roman Christianity. There is no such intimate relation between these names and Ephesus, or the province of Asia, or the history of the Church in this region. (3) Paul's custom is to give more personal salutations to the churches he had not founded or visited than to those which had been established directly by his hand (cf. the closing ch. of Col and the closing verses of Phm with the concluding portions of I, II Th, I, II Co, Ph, and Eph). The fact that he was unknown to these churches made it almost necessary for him to single out for salutation such persons in their membership as he personally knew; for so only could he establish between himself and them the points of personal contact which would give influence to his message to them, or prepare the way for his visiting them.

The fact, therefore, that Paul in this Roman letter is writing to a church to which he was a stranger leads us to expect just the personal salutations which we find in ch. 16; while the fact that there should be so many there he knew is only natural in view of his twelve years of mission work in the East and the frequency of communication between the eastern shores of the Mediterranean and Rome.

4. Composition of the Church.

The city of Rome, as other cities, had doubtless received its first knowledge of the Gospel from Jewish traders and pilgrims returned from the Holy Land (cf. Ac 2 10, as interpreted by 17 21), so that such preaching of the new religion as was attempted was first within the circle of the synagogue. When Paul wrote, however, the church was unmistakably Gentile in the great majority of its membership (cf. 1 5 f., 11 13, which are confirmed by such passages as 1 13-15 and 15 14-16 —passages that would have no meaning for Jews). Doubtless the edict of Claudius (49–50 A.D. [?], Ac 18 2) expelling the Jews from Rome had given the Gentiles a preponderance in the church, which the return of the Jews would rather accentuate by bringing to issue the inevitable separation between the church and its previous Jewish surroundings (cf. the apparent ignorance of the Christian community on the part of the Jews in Ac 28 22). It was to this Gentile element that the church owed such organization as it possessed. Indeed, Jewish converts generally failed to appreciate the need of a church organization for their new faith. Their conviction that Christianity was to come to the world through a reformed Judaism made the existing organization of the Jewish Church sufficient to their mind; so that, as a matter of fact, in spite of the wide distribution of pilgrim converts from Pentecost over Paul's mission-field, the Apostle was compelled everywhere he went to organize the church life of the new community (cf. Ac 14 23; Tit 1 5).

In Rome, however, the organization was evidently not such as it would have been had the Apostle personally founded the church. In fact, Paul nowhere in the Epistle speaks of the local church—the fully organized ἐκκλησία—as he does in I Co (1 2), II Co (1 1), Gal (1 2; I Co 16 1; cf. Ac 14 23), I Th (1 1), II Th (1 1), and by implication in Ph (1 1, 4 15). The exhortations of 12 5-8 are phrased in an indefinite way (especially vs. 7 and 8, "He that teacheth to his teaching; or he that exhorteth to his exhortation he that ruleth with diligence"), as though the church was without the distinctive officers evident in other localities (cf. Ph 1 1; Ac 14 23, 20 17); while one can not but notice the group character of the membership disclosed in the salutations of ch. 16 (vs. 3-5, "Salute Prisca and Aquila and the church that is in their house"; ver. 14, "Salute Asyncritus, Phlegon, Hermes, Patrobas, and the brethren that are with them"; ver. 15, "Salute Philologus and Julia, Nereus and his sister, and Olympas, and all the saints that are with them"), as though the church in its lack of official organizing had grown up through associated groups of converts scattered over the city, each under its leaders, who taught them in the truth, and instructed them in the Christian life (cf. evidences of this same group organization in Col 4 15 and Phm ver. 2).

5. Date and Purpose of Letter.

To this community of Christians at Rome Paul wrote this letter during the three months of his last visit to Corinth (Dec., 56–Mar., 57). He was then through with his work in the East and was about to enter upon the accomplishment of his long-desired journey to the imperial city (Ro 15 22-24; Ac 19 21; cf. Ro 1 8-15, 15 29, 32). His purpose in sending this letter in advance, however, was not simply to prepare the way for his coming; nor to instruct the readers, as strangers to himself and his work, in the principles of his Gospel, so that his teaching might not seem so unfamiliar to them and be hindered in its results. The presence among the leaders of the church of those who were not only the spiritual fruits of his ministry, but had been workers with him in its service (16 2 f., 7, 9, 12), is warrant that these principles of his Gospel were already known to them, and give enough significance to such statements as 6 17 and 16 25 to render it likely that these principles had been fully accepted by them.

The situation makes clear that the occasion of Paul's letter was the partizan condition of the church. The appeal in 15 1 to those who were strong among the readers to bear the infirmities of the weak; the command in 14 1 that those who were weak in the faith should be received, but not "for decision of scruples"; the reminder in 12 3-5 that, though many, they were yet one body in Christ and "severally members one of another"—these all show that this partizanship consisted in the presence of a strong party, lording it over the weak, and that the strength of this party was not so much in its numbers as in the broadness of its convictions, the freedom of its conscience, and the consequent moral ease of its life. In other words, this strong party drew its followers from the Gentile majority of the church and found those whom it oppressed in the Jewish minority (cf. the rest of ch. 14 and § 4, above, but especially 11 17-20). It was animated by a spirit of hyper-Gentilism, whose tendency was to overpress Paul's Gospel in the direction of antinomianism (cf. the significant prominence given by Paul to objections which seem to arise out of his own argument, and which would be urged against it in support of just such antinomian positions as this party would naturally take, 3 5-8, 6 1-14, 6 15-23, 7 7-25), and, consequently, to ignore both in and out of the Church the Jew, with his scruples of conscience (14 1-19) and his identification with the past dispensation of the Law (11 13-26). There is, indeed, no other way to explain the addition of chs. 9–11 to the Epistle's already completed argument, except as they constitute the Apostle's reminder to the self-satisfied Gentile element in the church that even the unbelieving Jews were still the Covenant People of God and would finally be saved.

Paul's purpose in writing the Epistle was, consequently, to take up his own Gospel and show that it was not to be overpressed in the service of an antinomian living (3 5-8)—that it gave the Gentile element in the church no license against the Law (6 1-23, 7 7-25) and no liberty against the Jewish Christian (11 17-20), that it did not separate these race elements in the church, but rather united them (3 9, 28-30)—that it did not ignore O T truth (1 1-3), or the people of the O T dispensation (10 1-4, 11 1-5), but gave them their rightful place in the church, holding that even the unbelieving Jews had a certain future of salvation in the plan of God (11 25-32). This motive explains the unfavorable review of the Gentile world at the beginning of the Epistle (1 18-32), as well as the caustic warning to the Gentile Christian in chs. 9–11. Such arraignment of the Gentile element in the church could easily have been called forth by the arrogant position of this hyper-Gentile party, and must have had a humbling effect upon its pride. The corresponding arraignment of the Jews in ch. 2 is simply owing to the fact that, through his training in the Law, the Jew was always in danger of misunderstanding Paul's law-free Gospel, and so always, when questions of race difference tempted him to self-satisfaction in his covenant relations to God, needed to have its principles clearly presented to him. This motive accounts also for such irenic tone as the Epistle contains, e.g., the placing of Jew and Gentile together in their relationship to God (1 14, 16, 2 9-12, 3 9, 22, 28-30, 10 12 f., 11 32) and the apologetic attitude toward the Jew (9 1-5, 30-33, 10 1-4, 11 1-5, 11 f., 25-28); since the Apostle's effort is to bring the two elements together. Finally, it gives reason for such didactic tone as is in the Epistle, e.g., the lengthy presentation of his Gospel in its bearing upon faith and works (chs. 1–4); since the Gentile element was in need of careful instruction as to the remainder of his Gospel, and both elements alike had to be reminded anew of its basis on the one condition of faith—the only condition which placed both elements equally within the scheme of redemption.

6. Relation of Letter to Paul's Work.

This Epistle throws significant light on the development of conditions surrounding and affecting Paul's mission labors. It shows not only that the Judaizing propaganda in the East was not likely to reproduce itself fully and completely in Gentile regions (see CORINTHIANS, EPP. TO THE, § 12, and notice that Ro 16 17-20 does not describe the principles of the Judaizing party), but that the very success of Paul's conflict with it was likely to produce a reaction to its opposite extreme in regions which, because of their dominant gentilism, were likely to be unfriendly to the Jewish element in the Church. In the Roman situation, consequently, the dualism in the Church comes to its first real serious threatening of the solidarity of the Christian brotherhood; for this situation showed, not so much a natural insistence of the original Jewish membership to the maintaining of the Church on a Jewish basis (as in Galatia), but rather the arousing of the newly admitted Gentile element into a spirit of hostility to all the historical origins of Christendom, a fatal misunderstanding of all the moral claims of Christianity, and an attitude of counter-exclusivism to the Jew which threatened more of a real cleavage in the Church than did the propaganda of the Judaizers. It was a situation the seriousness of which is increasingly evident in the Epistles Paul wrote from the time of his arrival in Rome (see PHILIPPIANS, EP. TO THE, § 1), and which finds its most significant treatment in the theme of his Ephesian letter (q.v.).

LITERATURE: Among the Introductions available for English readers Jülicher (Eng. transl. 1904) and Zahn³ (Eng. transl. 1908) represent respectively the advanced and conservative sides, though the marvelous treasures of learning stored in the latter make it valuable for scholars of all positions. Consult also the Introductions to the Comm. of Godet (Eng. transl. 1889), Lipsius (1891), Luthardt (1894), B. Weiss (1899), Denney (Expositor's Greek Test. 1900). Especially valuable is the Introduction to the Com. of Sanday and Headlam (Int. Crit. Com., 1895).

A particularly fine presentation of the contents of the Epistle is given in Liddon's Explanatory Analysis of Ep. to Romans (1893). M. W J.

ROME, rōm (Ῥώμη): The capital city of Italy, and one of the centers of Christianity in the Apostolic Age.

1. Sketch of History of R. to Constantine.

It is situated in about the middle of the Italian peninsula on the river Tiber, which was navigable in antiquity. It interests all classes of students, because it has an unbroken history from the mythical date of its founding (753 B.C.) to the present day. But prehistoric R. goes back far beyond that date. The first settlement is said to have been made by Romulus on the Palatine Hill (Roma Quadrata), distinct traces of which have been laid bare by excavations. The Quirinal Hill was next settled. The Forum, lying between the Palatine and the Quirinal, formed the political center of the city, while the Capitoline Hill was the religious center. Other hills were settled in turn. Servius Tullius extended the city limits, and enclosed the whole within the Servian walls. Though the Tarquinian kings embellished Rome they were expelled, and a republic was formed 509 B.C. Then followed long-continued wars with the Etruscans and Veii, but Rome was victorious in 396 B.C. The Gauls invaded and destroyed it in 390 B.C. The city was hastily rebuilt with narrow streets, while the houses continued to be wretched down to the time of Augustus (31 B.C.–14 A.D.). After the destruction of Carthage (146 B.C.) Rome was greatly enlarged, the streets and roads were paved (Via Appia), great buildings and tombs were erected, many of which may still be identified. Rome was further embellished by Augustus, who restored eighty-two temples, reorganized the municipal government, and introduced policemen and firemen. It was burned by Nero (64 A.D.), and rebuilt with broad streets. Nero's Golden House enclosed gardens, lakes, and lawns, and covered a vast area. The Flavian emperors (69–96 A.D.) further beautified the city with temples, arches, baths, forums, and mausoleums. The population was about 1,500,000 at this time, but after the reign of Marcus Aurelius (161–180), there followed a century of civil wars and invasions of barbarians which reduced the population to 750,000 in the time of Diocletian (284–305). Along therewith went decadence in architecture and art, as the buildings of the period still show. From the end of the Punic wars (146 B.C.), Rome remained unwalled for 400 years. It was rewalled by Aurelian (270–275) in order to protect the city against the barbarians. This wall is still practically extant. The last great buildings were erected by Constantine (Basilica, Baths, Arch), the founder of Constantinople, whither he transferred the seat of government (330 A.D.). Herewith began the decline of Rome.

2. Christianity in Rome.

The catacombs were the subterranean cemeteries of the early Roman Christians, until the edict of Constantine placed Christianity on an equal footing with other religions (313 A.D.). Peter is said to have founded the first church in Rome in the house of Pudens—now Pudenziana (but see ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE, § 4). Constantine was accredited with the foundation of several churches in Rome, among them the Lateran and St. Peter's, though he was not baptized until 337 A.D. (on his death-bed). In 408 the property of the ancient religions was confiscated by Honorius. Many pagan temples were destroyed by Christian fanatics, though many were also preserved to us, because they were converted into Christian churches. Many churches were built at this time (five patriarchal churches), and also many monasteries. The decay of Rome had now set in, caused partly by the lapsing of the Campagna into a malarious marsh, and partly by the successive incursions of the Vandals and Goths, against whom Belisarius fought with varying success. Rome was finally incorporated into the Byzantine Empire in 552. The city was preserved from utter extinction, because it was the center of Christianity and the residence of the Pope, who was now powerful and aggressively active. The temporal power of the Pope began with the year 727, when Luitprand, King of the Lombards, gave the town of Sutri to the Pope. Next the exarchate of Ravenna was given to the Pope in 755 by Pepin, the Frankish king, who also made the papacy independent of Constantinople. The crowning of Charlemagne by Pope Leo III on Christmas day 800 A.D. marks the beginning of the Holy Roman Empire and of the Middle Ages. Greece propounded and, in part, solved the great problems in the realm of the mind; she gave to the world unrivaled treasures of literature, sculpture, and architecture. But Rome's great legacy to the world is law and government. It was Rome that taught us how to organize and to govern a united state, and transmitted to us the basis of our system of laws. J. R. S. ROOM. See HOUSE, § 6 (c), (g), (h), (i).

ROOT: This term renders shōresh and ῥίζα, and, in the Bible, is generally used of persons or people under the figure of a tree or vine (Job 14 8, 30 4, used lit.; 28 9 = lowest part, and 36 30 = bottom). As roots spread out and down into the soil, and are the channels of moisture and nourishment, the ideas of firmness and sustenance are suggested by the term (Am 2 9; Hos 9 16, 14 5 [6]; Is 14 30; II K 19 30 = Is 37 31, 5 24; Mal 4 1 [3 19]; Job 8 17, 18 16, 29 19; Pr 12 3, 12; Jer 17 8; Ezk 31 7; Is 53 2; cf. Mt 3 10, 13 6, 21, and ‖s). It means also 'stock,' 'family,' from which new branches may spring (Is 11 1, 10; Dn 11 7; Is 14 29; cf. Ro 15 12; Rev 5 5, 22 16) and 'source' or 'cause' (Dt 29 18 [17]; cf. He 12 15; Job 19 28). C. S. T.

ROOT OF DAVID: A symbolic designation of Jesus Christ, used in the Apocalypse (Rev 5 5, 22 16). E. E. N.

ROSE. See PALESTINE, § 22.

ROSH, rosh (רֹאשׁ, rō'sh), 'head': 1. A 'son' of Benjamin (Gn 46 21), not in the list of Nu 26 38 f. (cf. I Ch 8 1 ff.), but necessary to make up the fourteen names of Gn 46 22. Some would correct the Heb. text by Nu 26 38, and read for "Ehi and Rosh, Muppim" (אחי וראש מפים), "Ahiram and Shupham" (אחירם ושופם). 2. In Ezk 38 2 f., 39 1, the RV gives "prince of Rosh" as the rendering of nᵉsī' rō'sh, making "Rosh" the name of a people or country like Meshech and Tubal, but it has not yet been identified. AV renders "chief priest." C. S. T.

ROUND TIRES LIKE THE MOON: The rendering of the Heb. sahărōnīm (Is 3 18 AV, "crescents" RV). See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II, § 2. E. E. N.

ROWER. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

ROYAL CITY: The rendering of 'īr hammᵉlūkāh (II S 12 26, but "city of waters," 'īr hammayim, in ver. 27) taken by Joab in his attack on Rabbah (q.v.), or, in full, Rabbath-bene-Ammon, on the headwaters of the Jabbok. It was perhaps the royal castle or citadel which guarded the water-supply of the city. At the northern point of the triangular plateau, on which the city was built, and between the two wâdys that are here separated only by a low neck of land, was a large cistern, hewn out of the rocks, which was connected with the castle by an underground passage (Polyb. v. 71). The place captured by Joab was probably near this tank. Joab left the capture of the city proper to David. Wellhausen would read 'īr hammayim as in ver. 27. Klostermann would read in ver. 27 'ain hammayim, 'spring of waters,' which was within the 'royal city' captured by Joab. Cheyne suggests for ver. 26 'īr milkōm, 'the city of Milcom [the god].' C. RUE. See PALESTINE, § 23.

RUFUS, rū'fus (Ῥοῦφος): 1. The son of Simon, who, according to Mk 15 21, bore Jesus' cross. The reference implies that Rufus and his brother Alexander were known to the readers of Mk. 2. The man who, with his mother, is saluted in Ro 16 13. It is not likely that 1 and 2 are identical. According to later traditions, Alexander and Rufus accompanied Andrew and Peter on their journeys (cf. Lipsius-Bonnet, Apoc. Apostelgesch. II, 117, 5; 118, 9; 119, 13; Forbes Robinson, Coptic Apoc. Gospel, p. 50). J. M. T.

RUG: The rendering of the Heb. semīkhāh (Jg 4 18, mantle AV). The exact meaning of the Heb. word is not known; "rug" or a "wrap of coarse stuff, such as is used to sleep in, or worn as a mantle in cold or stormy weather," corresponds to the traditional opinion (cf. Moore, Int. Crit. Com., ad loc.). E. E. N.

RUHAMAH, ru-hā'mā (רֻחָמָה, ruḥāmāh), 'compassionated': A name to be given to the daughter of Hosea's unfaithful wife (Hos 2 1 [3]) in place of her first name, "Lo-ruhamah" (q.v.), 'uncompassionated.' The new name typified the changed relation of Israel to J" (Hos 1 10 ff. [2 1 ff.]; cf. Ro 9 25 f.; I P 2 10). C. S. T.

RULER: In the O T this term is used somewhat loosely to render a number of Heb. terms, most of which are of general rather than technical significance. (a) The more general terms are: (1) mōshēl (Gn 45 8; Jg 15 11, etc.). (2) nāsī', 'one lifted up' (Ex 16 22, 22 28, etc.). (3) qātsīn, 'a decider,' 'judge' (Is 1 10, 3 6, etc.). (4) sar, a common term for an official, frequently used of high officers and even of kings, etc. (Gn 47 6; Ex 18 21, etc.; in Ezr 10 14; Neh 11 1; Est 3 12, 8 9, 9 3, "prince" RV). (5) rōdhēh (Ps 68 27). (6) rōzēn, 'weighty one' (Ps 2 2). (7) shilṭōn and shallīṭ (Dn 3 2 f.; Ec 10 5; Dn 2 10, 5 29). (8) rō'sh, 'head' (Dt 1 13; Is 29 10, "heads" RV). (b) More specific terms are (1) nāgīdh, a word indicative of preeminence, and usually rendered "prince" in RV (I S 25 30; II S 6 21, etc.). (2) ṣāgān, 'the representative of another,' a 'deputy,' but often used loosely (Ezr 9 2; Neh 2 16, etc.; in Jer 51 23, 28, 57, "deputy" RV). (3) māgēn (Hos 4 18) is figurative; the literal meaning of the word is 'shield.' The expression "ruler of the city" (Jg 9 30; II Ch 29 20; cf. I K 22 26; II K 10 1) means probably some one appointed to such a position by the king (in Jg 9 30 by Abimelech, the petty tyrant). The ancient Hebrew city was governed by "elders," not by one man. In the following cases RV gives "ruler" in place of other renderings of AV: Gn 45 26; Ps 22 28, for mōshēl; Gn 49 10, "ruler's staff" for meḥōqēq, "lawgiver" AV (This word must mean a thing, not a person, as it is parallel to "scepter" in the preceding line; cf. also Pr 25 15; Ec 7 19; Jer 2 8; Zec 10 4.) E. E. N.

In the N T "ruler" occurs most frequently as the rendering of the following words: (1) ἄρχων, meaning a member of the Sanhedrin (Jn 3 1, etc.), or a judge or magistrate (Ac 23 5), and ἀρχισυνάγωγος, a ruler of a synagogue (Mk 5 35, etc.; see SYNAGOGUE). (2) ἡγεμών, a term of general significance, 'leader,' 'ruler,' 'governor' (Mk 13 9; Lk 21 12). (3) ἀρχιτρίκλινος (Jn 2 9). Here the meaning is somewhat doubtful—either a chief servant or a guest chosen as the chairman of the company. (4) πολιτάρχαι (Ac 17 6, 8). See CITY, RULERS OF. (5) κοσμοκράτορες (Eph 6 12), signifying rulers of this world (as opposed to the Ruler of the universe, παντοκράτωρ). The reference is to the spiritual powers of evil, which were thought of as having sway over this darkened world. S. D.

RULERS OF THE CITY. See RULER and CITY, RULERS OF.

RUMAH, rū'mā (רוּמָה, rūmāh): The home of Pedaiah, the maternal grandfather of King Jehoiakim (II K 23 26). Josephus (Ant. X, 5 2) has Ἀβουμᾶς (Ἀρουμᾶς?), which suggests Arumah (Jg 9 41), the mod. el-'Ormeh, not far from Shechem. There was another Rumah in Galilee mentioned by Josephus (BJ, III, 7 21). C. S. T.

RUN, RUNNER: In ancient warfare, much depended on the agility of the individual. Consequently, those who were swift of foot, like Asahel (II S 2 18), were counted most valuable soldiers. The officials who rode in chariots were attended by a company of runners (II S 15 1). Elijah seems to have assumed the position of attendant courier to Ahab after the event on Mt. Carmel (I K 18 46). Certain runners, often employed as couriers, were so well known that they could be distinguished at a distance by their peculiar manner of running (II S 18 24-26). In I S 22 17 we should read "runners" instead of "guard," and it is likely that Doeg the Edomite was the chief of this band of runners (I S 21 7, corrected text), who were in close attendance on Saul. Paul frequently refers to the running in the race-course as symbolic of the Christian's course of life, in which he should strive to gain the prize of attainments in his own character and of good results in the lives of others. RUTH, rūth (רוּת, rūth, contracted from רְעוּת, rē'ūth), 'companion': The heroine of the book discussed below. L. G. L.

RUTH, BOOK OF: An anonymous idyllic narrative, of rare beauty, which tells how a Moabitess named Ruth came to marry Boaz of Bethlehem, thus becoming the great-grandmother of David (4 13-20), and therefore an ancestor of Jesus (cf. Mt 1 5). The chief aim of the book is to give details concerning the ancestry of David which had not been set down in I S (possibly I Ch 2 11 ff. had not yet been written), and, in particular, to explain the Moabitish strain in the blood of the great Hebrew king (cf. I S 22 3 ff.).

Incidentally, the author manifests considerable interest in the ancient marriage laws of Israel, and apparently emphasizes the duty of the next of kin to marry a childless widow; but it is hardly likely, as some have thought, that the story of this mixed marriage is told as a protest against the drastic reforms of Ezra (Ezr chs. 9–10) and Nehemiah (Neh 10 30, 13 23 ff.).

The date of composition is uncertain. The linguistic data are inconclusive (see Driver LOT). The beauty and simplicity of the style seem to point to the period before the Exile, but very many critics put the book much later. At any rate, it must have been written long after "the days when the judges judged" (1 1); for the customs described are obsolete (4 7 f.), and the whole narrative pictures a simple pastoral age, the memory of whose actual roughness and cruelty (which we find in the Book of Judges) had been long mellowed by time.

RYE: The rendering of kussemeth (Ex 9 32; Is 28 25, Rie AV). But rye is not known in Palestine, and probably we should read "spelt," as in RV

7. The Christian Sabbath

The Sabbath is the weekly rest-day of the Hebrews. Its name (shabbāth, Σάββατον, from shābhath, 'to break off,' 'to desist' [the derivation from shebha', 'seven,' is illusory] indicates its original nature to have been that of a time of cessation from work. But comparison with the Assyr. sappatu shows a different and more primitive root, whose exact significance is not very clear.

1. Name.

In the Biblical accounts of the institution of the Sabbath, two grounds are given for it in the two versions of the Decalogue. The first (P) associates it with the creation of the world, and the example of the Creator as He completed His work in six days and rested on the seventh (Ex 20 11); the second (Dt) bases the day upon the deliverance from Egypt ("therefore Jehovah thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath day," Dt 5 12 ff.). In other portions of the legislation characteristic differences appear. By JE the notion of refreshment and recuperation is emphasized as either lying at the foundation or incidentally accompanying the Sabbath (Ex 23 12). But everywhere the fundamental conception of cessation from labor remains the same, and the slight difference in the different codes as to the kind of labor, whether agricultural or commercial, to be abstained from on the Sabbath can not be pressed profitably. And yet, mere cessation from labor does not exhaust the idea of the Sabbath. It is not to serve solely as a convenience for man, but has a religious significance as well. It is a holy day. In the Decalogue this aspect of it is put into the foreground. It is to be hallowed to J". The pith of the idea is then the consecration of time to God. It stands parallel to the consecration of places, the setting up of shrines to J", and the offering up of gifts, sacrifices, or victims hallowed by their devotion to Him.

2. Day of Sacred Rest.

This conception of it holds true only of the fully developed institution as defined in the codes. As to its origin, it has been held that the lunar month, with its convenient subdivision into four parts by the successive phases of the moon, first furnished the seven-day period as the unit for the sanctification of time and separation from labor. But more recent researches, while still showing the lunar period to be at the foundation, do not bear out the idea of the original fourfold subdivision of the month according to the moon's phases. Among the Assyrians it appears that the one day positively known to have been called sapattu is the 15th, reckoned to be that of the moon at the full. Accordingly, Meinhold (Sab. u. Woche im A T, 1905) contends that the Sabbath originated with the festival of the full moon. But sapattu and Sabbath are not the same, and the conjecture that the first is the older form is not corroborated by outside considerations. The question then still remains as to how the observance of the full moon as a festival day was in itself the result of the recurrent seven-day Sabbath. In the reign of Asshurbanipal the 7th, 14th, 19th, 21st, and 28th days of each month were designated "abstinence days," i.e., days to be avoided in the performance of certain transactions. But the observance of these days does not seem to have any vital connection with the Hebrew legislation on the subject. The data are not sufficient to warrant a final judgment; but, upon the whole, it appears probable that the Assyrian abstinence days and the Hebrew Sabbath are both derived from some more primitive moon period to which religious significance was attached; and that the Assyrian usage either maintained it in its cruder form or allowed it to fall into a still cruder one, whereas the Hebrew characteristically purified, spiritualized, and settled it into the Biblical Sabbath as an institution expressive of the monotheistic religious idea and a strong help to the cultivation of a pure religious life. On the other hand, the discovery of a crude primitive Sabbath, either among Semitic peoples or mankind in general, should not be despaired of, or regarded in any way as destructive of the distinctiveness of the Biblical notion of a day of sacred rest. This lies, not in the outward form, but in the inner meaning of it as shown by Jesus Christ.

3. Origin of the Sabbath.

4. The Sabbath in the History of Israel.

With the elaboration of the ceremonial system in the Pentateuchal code, the Sabbath was also made the subject of minute restrictions. Some of these passed out of the region of strict religion, and are merely legal and disciplinary (Ex 16 23-30, 31 12-17, 35 1-3; Nu 15 32-36). To speak more accurately, these are not void of religious value, but only indirectly religious, i.e., as they influenced the Israelites toward a steadier and more systematic expression of the spiritual life. Other provisions, however, are designed to afford a more direct and uninterrupted opportunity for the cultivation of character. At the same time they contain a more humanitarian regard for the refreshment and recuperation from the curse and fatigue of sustained relentless toil (Lv 23 3 f.). The contention that the Sabbath is a comparatively late development in Hebrew history (Meinhold makes it post-exilic) finds insuperable difficulty in the uniformity of the tradition which traces the observance of the day as far back as the period of the Exodus (Ex 16 23 ff.). To say nothing of its incorporation in the Decalogue, it certainly appears in historical records of the 9th cent. B.C. (II K 4 23), and is associated with the new-moon festival in the pre-exilic literature (Is 1 13; Hos 2 11; Am 8 5). But it may be mentioned as a singular fact that the Sabbath is never alluded to in the Psalms (except in the title of the 92d), or in Job and Proverbs. It is also ignored in the Deuteronomic legislation after its mention in the Decalogue (5 12-15). By Ezekiel it is alluded to as "Jehovah's day" (20 12 f., 22 8, 23 38, 44 24). One of the signs of a revival of national life after the Exile was the enforcement of the Sabbath laws by Nehemiah (Neh 10 31, 13 15 ff.). In the Maccabean struggle the observance of the Sabbath became the badge of distinction between the faithful and the lukewarm. From I Mac 2 39-41 (Jos. Ant. XII, 2), it appears that the literal obedience to the Law was carried to such an extreme as to prove a source of great danger to the faithful. These refused even to defend themselves against attacks of armed enemies on the Sabbath day; and as advantage was taken of the fact by Ptolemy, Mattathias issued a declaration to the effect that it was lawful to engage in warfare on the Sabbath, if necessary.

5. Sabbaths.

The use of the word in the plural points to the inclusion under the Sabbath idea of several other days besides the weekly, or seventh, day. How early this was done does not clearly appear. The first day of the lunar period was observed as a Sabbath (cf. New Moon). The first and last days of the Feast of Tabernacles, the Day of Atonement, and the first and last days of the Passover were also Sabbaths. The seventh year (Lv 25 1-7; cf. Sabbatical Year) and the Year of Jubilee, or Year of Release, which closed a period of seven Sabbatical years, were also regarded in their entirety as Sabbaths.

6. Jesus on the Sabbath.

In the hands of the Rabbis, the few laws of the OT on the subject became the nucleus of an elaborate system covering two large volumes of the Talmud (Shabbat and Erubin). Yet it was conceded that to do good, even when it required hard work, was lawful. The burdensomeness of these prescriptions furnishes the occasion for the apparently new departure of Jesus and His insistence that it should be a means of all sorts of good to men, and that it fulfilled its purpose only as it was made such a means of good. "The Sabbath was made for man" (Mk 2 27). Consistently with this notion, the custom of meeting in synagogues for the purpose of hearing the Law and the Prophets read and expounded was followed by Him and His disciples (Mk 1 21; Lk 4 16 f., 13 10 f.), thus giving rise to services of worship on the Sabbath Day in the Christian Church (Ac 13 14, 15 21, 17 2). On the other hand, the overburdening of the day with countless restrictions He denounced as contrary to the intention of the institution.

7. The Christian Sabbath.

When Christianity was established as a distinct faith, its adherents, following the example of Jesus, observed the Sabbath with the evident intention of using it as a means of spiritual edification. At the same time, the custom arose among them of meeting on the first day of the week in commemoration of the Master's resurrection (Ac 20 7; I Co 16 2). This was called the Lord's Day (Rev 1 10). For a time, the two days were observed together, but for very distinct and different reasons. They were not rival or antagonistic to each other, neither was the Lord's Day substituted for the Sabbath. And yet it was inevitable, as Christianity became more and more clearly differentiated from Judaism, that two days so nearly alike in purpose should be confused with each other. After the 3d cent. of the Christian era, the ideal Sabbath of Jesus was identified with the Lord's Day, and the Jewish Sabbath fell into disuse, and the conviction grew that it had been abrogated. SABEANS, sa-bî'anz (שְׁבָא, shᵉbhā', Job 1 15; שְׁבָאִים, shᵉbhā'īm, "men of Sheba," Jl 3 8 RV; סְבָא, ṣᵉbhā', Is 45 14; סְבָאִים, ṣᵉbhā'īm, Ezk 23 42, Qᵉrē, "drunkards" RV): The last of these Heb. words is a reading introduced by the Massoretes and no part of the primitive text, which read as rendered by the RV. As to the other two terms, their resemblance in sound has furnished the occasion for some confusion in the sources and consequent division of opinion concerning their exact meaning. It seems probable, however, that the etymological difficulty of identifying ṣᵉbhā' with shᵉbhā', though not amounting to an impossibility, is very great and that the solution of the problem must be sought in connecting Seba (ṣ·bhā') with the son of Cush (Gn 10 7; I Ch 1 9) and locating the country and people in Africa in the neighborhood of Ethiopia. Sheba (sh·bhā'), on the other hand, is called in Gn 10 28, "the son of Joktan" and in Gn 25 3, "the son of Jokshan." These two designations are manifestly slightly variant ways of describing the same relationship. Sheba was accordingly a Semitic people and more particularly belonged to the Keturah group of Arabian tribes. It was located in S. Arabia, and is to be identified with the Sabeans of that territory, who have left abundant traces of a unique civilization and a great empire (see Glaser, Skizze der Geschichte und Geographie Arabiens, 1890). In the O T Sheba and the Sabeans are known as a nation of merchants. Their "caravans" (Job 6 19) brought gold, precious stones, and spices from their own country and other merchandise secured from more distant lands (e.g., India and Africa, Ezk 27 22 ff.; Ps 72 10). It seems further that they dealt in slaves also (Jl 3 8). The glory of the Sabean Empire was still impressive when the Queen of Sheba (q.v.) made a visit of state to the court of Solomon in Jerusalem (I K 10 1-13). SACAR, sē'cār (שָׂכָר, sākhār): 1. A Hararite, the father of Ahiam, one of David's heroes (I Ch 11 35 = Sharar the Ararite, II S 23 33). 2. A son of Obed-edom and the eponymous ancestor of a family of doorkeepers (I Ch 26 4). C. S. T.

SACK: A bag made from a coarse fabric of goat's or camel's hair, and used for transporting grain and other goods. The word occurs especially in the account of the visit of Joseph's brothers to Egypt. In the J narrative 'amtaḥath is used and nowhere else in the O T (Gn 42 25b, 27, 28, 43 12, 18, 21, 23, 44 1, 2, 8, 11, 12). E uses saq (Gn 42 25, 27a, 35; cf. Lv 11 32; Jos 9 4), and k·lī occurs in Gn 42 25 as parallel to saq. C. S. T.

The term "sacrifice" is used in EV with extreme latitude. It denotes everything brought to the altars of God. Its synonyms offering and oblation, though also used with a measure of elasticity, have more specific meanings. The first is practically limited to the designation of the gifts of flour-cakes, or other bloodless offerings (minḥāh, 'gift,' 'tribute'; t·rūmāh, 'lifted up,' 'contribution'; qorbān, 'means of approach'; προσφορά, δῶρον). The second, so far as it is not a strict equivalent of the first, passes outside the limits of ritual usage, and is applied to gifts of all descriptions (cf. Nu 7 3, etc.; Ex 35 22, 24, etc.).

1. Usage of Terms.

Of the O T terms: (1) zebhaḥ, 'slaughter,' is the one used in the vast majority of instances, both as a verb and as a noun; but as all eating of flesh was primitively sacrificial, 'slaughter' was the equivalent of 'sacrifice.' Other words used are (2) minḥāh, 'gift' ("oblation" in I K 18 29, 36 RV; Ezr 9 4 f. RV; Ps 141 2 RVmg.); (3) ḥāg (Ex 23 18; Ps 118 27; Is 29 1, "feasts" RV); (4) 'ishsheh, "fire-offering" (Nu 28 2-24, 29 6, 13; Jg 13 14; cf. § 7, below); (5) 'āsāh, 'to make [sacrifice]') (Lv 23 19; II K 17 32). The N T usage is limited to the single term θύειν, 'to kill,' and its derivative θυσία, 'slaughter,' i.e., for sacrifice.

In general, sacrifice is an offering made to God with the design of expressing, securing, or promoting friendly or normal relations with Him. It is based on the fundamental assumption that the worshiper and God are capable of holding personal relations, which may become closer and more intimate, or else hostile and more strained, which may, in fact, be broken by failure on the part of the worshiper to conform to God's will.

2. Definition.

Outside of the Bible, sacrifice is found to be a universal element of worship. Within the circle of nations around Israel, there are from the beginning abundant traces of special forms and prescriptions on the subject. The relation of these to the system which prevailed in Israel may be variously viewed as that of dependence of one upon the other, or dependence of both upon common earlier forms. If the first of these views be assumed as true, the heathen sacrifices are: (1) either degradations of Israelite practise, or remnants of a primitive revelation which became obscured, or (2) conversely, Israel derived its system from the heathen. The first of these two possibilities is based upon precarious foundations, and for the second there is no evidence. If, however, both Israelite and non-Israelite sacrificial practise go back to more primitive forms, the essential idea of it might be: (1) the pure expression of homage; but this could be true only where a very high degree of appreciation of God's character as a righteous ruler prevailed, and such is not the case among primitive peoples; or it might be (2) a propitiatory gift; but if so, it is very difficult to understand in what sense some features of sacrifice, such as the pouring of blood on or around the altar, could be considered a desirable gift by the deity; or (3) sacrifice might be a means of expiation, in which case its chief feature is the death of the victim representing the death or punishment of the worshiper. The worshiper in such a case recognizes in the act his own sinfulness and the justice of God's wrath (cf. S. Ives Curtiss, Primitive Relig. Tradition To-day, 1902). This view, however, does not account for the many forms of sacrifice in which the sacrificial materials are taken from the vegetable kingdom. (4) But sacrifice may be a recognition, either plain or sacramental, of the household or tribal unity of the worshiper and his God. In its symbolical or sacramental form, this view assumes the development of a mystical sentiment, too elaborate to be natural among primitive races. In its direct and plain form it assumes the presence and participation of the god in a common meal. That such presence was firmly believed in by primitive races has been proved by W Robertson Smith (Religion of the Semites[2], 1894, p. 269 f.) and Wellhausen (Skizz. u. Vorb.[2], 1897). The root, then, of sacrificial practise from which Hebrew and heathen forms issued is the table-bond between the worshiper and his god. In the notion of such a bond all the other ideas, expiatory, propitiatory, and tributary, are germinally present. But the typical table-communion significance of sacrifice appears nowhere in its purity in the O T. It belongs to a stage antecedent to that pictured in the Mosaic codes. How clearly it was present in the consciousness of the Israelite of the later period, it is impossible to say. There is no doubt, however, that in human relationships a common meal was conceived of as cementing alliances and constituting a bond and a pledge of common friendship; and, in the covenant sacrifice on Sinai (Ex 24 5 ff.), as well as in the Passover festival (Ex 12 3 ff.), there is an unmistakable occurrence of the same idea (cf. Ps 50 5).

4. Kinds of Sacrifice.

In the Mosaic legislation, sacrifices are broadly distinguished as of two kinds, according to the class of products offered, i.e., the vegetable and the animal (bloodless and bloody). To these may be added a third, consisting of liquid offerings ("drink-offerings"), and a fourth, whose virtue lies in the still subtler element of fragrance ("incense-offering"). In their fully developed form, these sacrifices are best given in P, representing the practise in any case of the second Temple.

5. Animal Sacrifices: Selection of Victims.

The selection of victims for animal sacrifices was not left to individual predilection, but determined by some very definite principles. (1) Animal victims must be of the clean class; and in this class choice was limited to cattle (bullock, ox, cow, heifer, goat, kid, ram, lamb, calf), and certain birds (pigeon and turtle-dove). (2) They must be perfect or without blemish (Dt 15 21, 17 1; Lv 22 18-25). This qualification excludes specifically the blind, the broken, the maimed, the ulcerous, the scurvied, the scabbed, the bruised, the crushed, and the castrated. All these defects are defined as blemishes. (3) As to age in general, no victim could be accepted before the lapse of seven days from its birth (Lv 22 27). The first-born were all to be redeemed under a year of age (Ex 13 15). The passover lamb, the victims in the burnt-offering, sin-offering, peace-offering, must be more than one year old (Ex 12 5; Lv 9 3, 12 6; Nu 6 12, 14, 7 15, 23, 15 27). (4) In the case of the red heifer, whose ashes were to be used in mixing the water of purification, she must have done no work nor borne any yoke (Nu 19 1-10; Dt 21 3 f.). (5) All victims must be the lawful property of the offerer (II S 24 24).

6. Classes of Animal Sacrifices: Burnt-Offering.

As to purpose and meaning, animal sacrifices are distinguished as burnt-offering, sin-offering, peace-offering, and guilt-offering. The burnt-offering ('ōlāh, Lv 6 8 f.; Ex 29 38-42; Nu 28 3 f., etc.) was the most general of all sacrifices. It certainly antedates all the others, and was more generally practised by Semitic peoples. The victims of this sacrifice were to be taken from the herd or flock, in exceptional cases from among the birds. If from the herd or flock, the animal must be a male. The ritual involved the laying on of the hands of the offerer, the killing of the victim at the door of the sanctuary to the north of the altar, the flaying and cutting of the body, the washing of the entrails and legs, the sprinkling of the blood, and the burning of the whole victim on the altar. It was the sacrifice that accompanied the morning and evening worship of the people as a rule, and characterized special occasions of great importance. Its significance, adoration, is expressive of a normal or ideal relationship to God.

7. Fire-Offering.

The special class of burnt-offerings offered daily was called "the continual burnt-offering" (tāmīdh, Nu 28 6), because it was repeated morning and evening. This, however, was also known as "an offering made by fire" ('isshēh, Nu 28 6 ff., "sacrifice by fire" AV). But either this variety differed from the ordinary burnt-offering ('ōlāh) in being partly consumed by the priest, or else the name is more broadly used of sacrifices any portion of which was burned on the altar.

8. Sin-Offering.

The sin-offering (ḥaṭṭ'a, Lv 4 1 ff., 8 14; Nu 15 24) was expiatory in its character, and the victim was different according to the person or persons in whose behalf it was offered. (a) For a ruler the victim was a he-goat. (b) For an ordinary person it was a she-goat, a ewe lamb, a turtle-dove, or a young pigeon, or even a meal-offering. (c) For a priest or a Levite at the time of installation (Nu 8 8) and (d) for the whole congregation it was a bullock and a he-goat. (e) On the Day of Atonement, for the high priest a bullock was offered, and for the people two he-goats. The ritual of the sin-offering included the laying on of hands, the confession of the offense, the killing of the victim by the offerer, or, in the case of the congregation, by the representatives of the congregation, the sprinkling of the blood before the veil, the smearing of it on the horns of the altar, and the pouring of the remainder at the base of the altar, and the disposition of the body. This latter was divided into three parts: one, consisting of the fat, defined as "J"'s portion," was burned on the altar; a second, consisting of the skin and entrails, was burned without the camp; and the third, consisting of the remaining flesh of the victim, was the priests' portion, and appropriated by them, unless the sacrifice was in their behalf, in which case it was burned without the camp. The design of the sin-offering was the 'covering' or removal of minor sins (sins of ignorance, Lv ch. 4; Nu ch. 15, "in error" RV).

9. The Guilt-Offering.

The guilt-offering (trespass-offering AV) ('āshām, Lv 5, 7 1-10) was like the sin-offering in general meaning and nature. Its occasion was more specifically an unwitting transgression of the ordinances of God in respect of holy things or of the rights of property (Lv 6 1 ff.). The sacrifice consisted of the offering of a ram, supplemented by the addition of a fine, or pecuniary compensation, in the case of damage done to one's neighbor. The amount of reparation was computed according to the loss in value sustained by the injured party, plus 20 per cent. (one-fifth) for the priest.

10. The Peace-Offering.

The peace-offering (shellem or zebaḥ shelāmmīm, Lv 3, 7 11 f.) expressed general friendly relation with God, and not merely the celebration of the restoration of a broken peace, as the name might be superficially interpreted. There are three varieties of it described. (a) The thank-offering, (b) the vow-offering, (c) the free-will offering. In all these, however, God is recognized as the bestower of blessing. In the first, the blessing is a thing of the past. The sacrifice simply signifies its acceptance. In the second, it is looked upon as still in the future and greatly desired by the worshiper, who makes his offering as an expression of loyalty and a condition for the bestowment of the blessing. In the third, the function of the offering was auxiliary to the prayer, rather than a condition for the reception of the blessing. Victims for the peace-offering were selected, either from the herd or the flock, and might be male or female, but in either case without blemish. The animal victim was to be accompanied by an oblation of a meal-offering with oil. In the variety known as the thank-offering the ritual included, as in the burnt-offering, the laying on of hands, killing the victim, and sprinkling the blood; but in the disposition of the sacrificial material it differed. The body of the victim was in this case divided into three portions. The first was J"'s portion, and consisted of the fat which covered the inward parts, the tail entire, the two kidneys, and the "caul upon the liver." All these were burned upon the altar. The blood which was sprinkled around the altar was also a part of J"'s portion. The second portion was the priests' It consisted of the right shoulder and breast of the victim as a "wave-" and a "heave-offering" respectively (cf. § 11, below). The third part was the worshiper's portion, and consisted of all that was left of the victim. If the sacrifice was a thank-offering, all these parts must be used on the day of the sacrifice; if a free-will or a vow-offering, they must be used on the second day. Any portion of them remaining until the third day would render a sacrifice invalid, which was then called an "abomination." Hence, if the victim could not all be consumed at the sacrificial banquet, what was left of it must be burned "without the camp."

11. "Wave"- and "Heave"-Offerings.

The terms "wave-offering" and "heave-offering" are applied to the priests' portion, and denote a peculiar ceremony consisting in the holding of the right shoulder of the victim horizontally and moving it forward toward the altar and backward away from the altar, in order to signify that the part was J"'s, but was given back to the priests by Him. Similarly, the term "heave-offering" signifies the moving of the breast of the animal upward and then downward, in token of presenting it to God as His and receiving it again as a gift from Him.

12. Vegetable-Offerings. The Meal-Offering.

Of vegetable-offerings, there were chiefly two, the "meal-offering" and "showbread." Of the meal-offering (minḥāh, meat-offering AV, Lv ch. 2, etc.), it has been contended that this was never an independent sacrifice, but always an accompaniment and adjunct of an animal, or bloody, sacrifice. But this view can be maintained only upon a priori grounds. Three varieties of the meal-offering are described: The first consists in the offering of a simple unbaked fine flour; the second, of baked cakes or loaves; and the third, of parched ears of corn. In the first form, oil was mixed with the flour and salt, and frankincense put upon it (Lv 2 15). The ritual of the offering included the presentation of the materials before J", the burning of a handful upon the altar with frankincense, and the eating of the remainder by the priests, never by the worshiper; therefore, when the worshiper was a priest, no part of it could be eaten, but all must be burned. The cakes of the meal-offering must be made without leaven, for leaven, as the emblem of fermentation, was unholy. Honey was excluded from sacrifices for a similar reason. Although the meal-offering might be presented as a complete sacrifice under stress of necessity (because of the poverty of the worshiper), usually it was an adjunct of a peace- or burnt-offering, neither of which was complete without it (Nu chs. 15, 28, 29). A special variety of the meal-offering was the oblation prescribed for cases in which a husband, suspicious of infidelity on the part of his wife (jealous), brought her to the priest with "the tenth of an ephah of barley-meal." A handful of this was then burned upon the altar, while, through an elaborate ritual including the use of the water of jealousy (water of bitterness RV), the woman was given an opportunity of swearing to her innocence and presumably proving it (Nu 5 14-31).

Of the showbread ("bread for a memorial" Lv 24 5 f.; but in Ex 25 30, 35 13, 39 36, leḥem pānīm, 'bread of faces,' "presence bread" RVmg.; it is also called ma'ărekheth, 'pile bread,' or 'bread of arrangement,' II Ch 2 4; and leḥem ha-tāmīdh, 'continual bread,' Nu 4 7): The two ways of naming this offering are quite different in their implication; the first has reference to the fact of its being brought into the presence of J", the second to the manner of its exhibition before Him (so as to indicate its significance). These two modes of naming are perpetuated in the LXX. and the Vulgate. The showbread consisted of twelve loaves of unleavened bread, each one made of one-fifth of an ephah of fine flour. They were laid upon a table (see TEMPLE, § 13) in the Holy Place, one upon another, in two columns (six in each). They were allowed to remain there for a whole week, at the end of which period they were removed and eaten by the priest upon holy ground, i.e., within the precincts of the sanctuary. For other persons than priests to eat of the loaves of the showbread was regarded sacrilegious (I S 21 2 f.; Mt 12 4), for they were "holy" ("hallowed bread" AV). The offering of the showbread does not appear to have been an exclusively Israelitic one, though the citation of the Greek and Roman lectisternia as parallels is scarcely admissible. The O T itself furnishes traces of the practise of making the bread to be used in idolatrous worship for the Queen of Heaven (Jer 7 18), and the Babylonian inscriptions speak of loaves of sweet, or unleavened, bread presented upon altars or tables set before the gods. These loaves numbered at times as many as three times twelve (Zimmern, Beitr. z. Kenntn. d. Bab. Rel. 1901). This number was probably astronomical in its origin and significance. Its relation to the Israelitic number of loaves is obscure. If the twelve loaves of the showbread were at one time connected with the three times twelve loaves of the Babylonian bread-offering, the connection was certainly broken before the formation of the Code, where the number twelve is made to represent the twelve tribes of Israel (Lv 24 8). The significance of such offerings among the non-Israelitic peoples is no doubt to be found in the thought that the gods were participants at the tables set before them. In Israel, by a characteristic purification and spiritualization, the showbread was made to mean the recognition of God's being the source and origin of the nourishment that sustains and strengthens the worshiper. In history, the first mention of the showbread is in connection with David's experience at Nob. At this place there was a sanctuary of J", and David and his young men were allowed to satisfy their hunger with the hallowed bread upon condition that they were ceremonially clean (I S 21 6). After this, the showbread is referred to again in connection with the construction of the Temple of Solomon, in which a special table overlaid with gold ("of gold") was provided for it (I K 7 48). In the second Temple a provision was made for the maintenance of the showbread, together with other sacrifices, through a tax levied for that end (Neh 10 32). The table of showbread is said to have been carried away from the Temple by Antiochus Epiphanes (I Mac 1 22) when he entered Jerusalem and stripped the Holy Place of its treasures. It was replaced with a new one by Judas Maccabæus (I Mac 4 49). With the destruction of Herod's Temple by Titus, it was taken along with other things as a trophy to Rome, and its image appears on the Arch of Titus in the representation of the triumphal procession.

13. The Showbread.

Drink-offerings (neṣekh) appear in the ritual as accompaniments of the burnt-offerings, never as independent sacrifices. The prevailing material is wine (Ex 29 40 f.; Nu 28 7). No ritual is specified in the legislation, but, from Sir 50 15, it appears that the offering was poured at the base of the altar. According to the Talmud (Suk. 4 9, 5 1), drink-offerings were made on the occasion of the Feast of Tabernacles. But this offering consisted of water, and the time for it was the morning of each of the seven days of the feast and, more precisely, the hour of the burnt-offering. From this it appears that it was meant to be a counterpart of the libation of wine. A unique water-libation is named in I S 7 6; but neither its particular significance nor its place in the ritual system is given.

14. Libations or Drink-Offerings.

Of offerings of fragrance or odor, incense is the most striking. Some have supposed that the requirement of fresh showbread every week was meant, at least partly, as a savor-offering, since when the bread became stale and lost its fragrance its value as an offering was gone, and fresh loaves must be substituted. But this is fanciful. As to the use of incense, there is no doubt that it has played a large part in forms of worship in general. In Biblical usage, however, a distinction is made between incense and frankincense (qṭōreth and l'bhōnāh). The first of these is more strictly sacrificial smoke, and does not necessarily represent the fragrance of any particular substance. The second is primarily the smoke made by the burning of the incense gum, then the gum itself. It is probable that in the earlier period the burning of incense was unknown in the service of J", that it was even against the law which required that J" should be honored only with the products of His own chosen land, and that from other lands He would accept, not their products, but their money. At all events, in the historical books there is no clear case of the offering of incense in the worship of J"; the Prophets rather discourage and rebuke it as associated with idolatry (II Ch 34 25; Jer 48 35). But in the legislation as completed in P, incense finds a clear and prominent place. The substance itself, so called in this Code, is a mixture of several odoriferous vegetable products (opobalsamum, onycha, galbanum, and pure frankincense) in equal portions, together with some salt. Only when thus mixed could frankincense be used in sacrifice. Incense, however, was used also as a perfume in luxurious living (Song 3 6, 4 6, 14), and was regarded as a sign of wealth and self-indulgence (Mt 2 11; Rev 18 13). See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 2. In the sacrificial system it was burned upon a special altar, called the Altar of Incense, which was situated just before the Most Holy Place (cf. TABERNACLE, § 3, and TEMPLE, § 25). On the Day of Atonement the high priest took a censer with burning incense into the Most Holy Place (Lv 16 12 f.). The symbolical significance of the fragrance of incense, as far as defined, was that of prayer (Ps 141 2; Rev 8 3 f.). In N T times mention is made of incense in Lk 1 10.

16. Sacrificial Acts. Sacrificial acts were either (1) primary or (2) mediate. The primary carried the notion of the sacrifice itself; the mediate were necessary means for the completion of the primary. The mediate acts included the washing (Lv 1 9) of certain portions of the sacrificial victim, the flaying of the animals (the burnt-offering, Lv 1 6), the dipping of his finger by the priest in the blood, for the purpose of sprinkling (Lv 4 6), and the various ways of preparing the flesh of the victim, in order that it might be eaten (roasting of the passover lamb, Ex 12 8; seething, "boiling" RV, of the consecration lamb in the service of the consecration of the priests, Ex 29 31).[1] Soaking with oil (fried, Lv 7 12 AV) of the wheaten cakes of flour in the meal-offering was also one of the mediate sacrificial acts. The killing of the victim in all animal sacrifices has long been held to be a primary sacrificial act. There is no evidence, however, in the O T to show that it was at first, or during the O T period, regarded as anything more than a means of securing the blood, which was considered to be the life of the animal (cf. BLOOD). If this view of it be correct, it must be classified with the mediate sacrificial acts. Of the primary sacrificial acts, the most important are the laying on of hands (sometimes with confession of sin, Lv 16 21), by which the worshiper symbolically signified his union with the victim, or his appropriation of it as a part of himself (Lv 3 2, 8, 4 4), the sprinkling of the blood upon the altar and on the mercy-seat, in the case of the great sacrifice of the Day of Atonement (q.v.), or the pouring of it at the base of the altar, in token of the offering of the life of the victim and of the atonement or expiation of sin thereby (Lv 3 2, 16 14), the smearing of the blood on the horns of the altar, and the pouring of the remainder at its base were likewise signs of expiation (Lv 4 18). The act of burning was sometimes, as in the case of the incense-offering, a mere means toward an end, i.e., it was designed to secure the odor, which was the real sacrifice; but in the case of the sacrifices strictly so called, it was probably the very act in which the connection of the sacrificed animal with God was symbolized.

17. Offerings and Oblations. Apart from the strict technical sense of the word "offering," as it occurs in the expressions, "burnt-offering," "peace-offering," etc., and the still more specific sense in "heave-offering" (terūmāh), and "wave-offering" (tenūphāh), and "meal-offering" (minḥāh), there are two special senses in which the term is used. (1) The fire-offering ('ishshēh, "offering made by fire," Ex 29 41) signified a sacrifice, or portion of a sacrifice, whether animal or vegetable, consigned to the fire from the altar (Lv 1 9 ff.; Dt 18 1; Jos 13 14; I S 2 28) to be consumed as a whole. Though the act coalesces with the chief feature of the burnt-offering ('ōlāh), the name is broader, and is applied to other sacrifices than the burnt-offering. (2) Corban, or offering in the narrower sense (qorbān, 'that which is brought near,' "oblation" RV, except in Ezk 20 28). The term is distinctive of Ezk and P, though in the former it is used only twice (Ezk 20 28, 40 43). Its meaning is general. It is used either of sacrifices, in the stricter sense of the word, or of pure gifts (Lv 2 12; Nu 7 12, 18, etc.). By N T times, "corban" had crystallized into a simple equivalent of sacrificial gifts.

18. Non-Sacrificial Offerings: Gifts. Offerings which were not strictly sacrificial (gifts) were occasional, and not prescribed by the Law. The term "gift," however, is, in the EVV, used with great latitude to denote also sacrificial gifts. Especially is this the case in the N T, where that which is brought to the altar is called δῶρον ("gift," Mt 5 23 f., 23 18 f.), but the term was also applied to contributions of money (Lk 21 1). In He especially, "gift" and "sacrifice" are correlative and complementary terms. Together they constitute the offerings of the priest in the sanctuary (5 1, 8 3 f., 9 9). Exceptionally, things dedicated to the service of the sanctuary, but not offered as sacrifice, are further called gifts (I Ch 26 26; I K 7 51, 15 15, etc.; Nu 7 84 f. RVmg.). A wood-offering is further mentioned by Neh (10 34, 13 31), consisting of wood "to burn upon the altar of Jehovah," but though this is said to be "as it is written in the Law," nothing more is known of such an offering.

19. First-Fruits: Firstlings. In the O T the etymological sense of the word "gift" frequently crops out. It may then mean either a sacrificial offering or, more directly, a contribution to the equipment or support of the sanctuary. The most notable of the non-sacrificial class of gifts are the "first-fruits" or "firstlings." The distinction between these two is simply that of the sphere from which they are drawn as vegetable or animal (field and garden on the one side, and flock or herd on the other). The law of first-fruits is given in successive forms, growing in fulness, in Ex 23 16, 34 22; Dt 18 4, fleece; Lv 23 10-14; Nu 18 12-18. It may be reasonably questioned whether first-fruits and firstlings were dedicated to God, first as a tax, or as a sacrifice. Frazer (Golden Bough, II, pp. 68–90, and 373, 384) cites examples of both ideas. In any case, the offering was supposed to legalize the use of the remainder of the crop or brood by the owner, and its practical effect was the utilization of the offering as a tax, since such first-fruits and firstlings went for the support of the priesthood.

20. Sacrifice in the N T. Attitude of Jesus. The birth of Jesus Christ was signalized by the offering of the customary sacrifice of purification (Lk 2 22). But in His life and ministry, He placed the sacrificial system as a whole in a very subordinate position. As a topic of direct teaching, in fact, He completely ignored it. He alludes to it only in order to illustrate some principle of deeper and inner importance (Mt 5 23), or to rebuke the tendency to attach to its external acts and forms the significance rightly belonging to spiritual principles, especially the dominant affection of love to God (Mt 9 13, 12 7). As it was possible for the individual Israelite to go through life without being obliged to offer sacrifice for himself, even though loyal to the O T, it is not easy to draw inferences from the silence of Jesus on the subject. As far as known, He never offered sacrifice. To what extent His conduct should be interpreted as a formal rupture with the sacrificial system, and how far, if at all, He regarded it of use, can not possibly be ascertained. It is certain, however, that by shifting the center of thought and practise from the outward to the inner sphere, Jesus effectively introduced a new view of religion, which was inevitably destined to result in the abrogation of the old system. His disciples evidently so regarded the case.

[1] Evidently this was also done in other connections, as appears from the violations of the law by the sons of Eli (I S 2 13). It was forbidden to seethe the kid in its mother's milk (Ex 23 19, 34 36; Dt 14 21).

21. Practise of the Apostolic Age. In the development of N T thought upon the basis of the life and teaching of Jesus, sacrifice gradually receded into the background. The teaching and practise of the Apostles laid less and less stress upon it, and the system was evidently allowed to fall into disuse, and finally to disappear entirely. The only case on record in the N T of the offering of sacrifice by early Christians is that of Paul in fulfilment of his Nazirite vow (Ac 21 26).

22. The Work of Jesus Christ. This result was completely justified when it was realized that all the ideas embodied and expressed in the sacrificial system had found their perfect fulfilment in the life, work, and death of the Master Himself. In He the position is clearly reached that every cardinal thought of the ancient ritual, and many subordinate ones, had been brought to their full expression and, therefore, superseded by the person of Jesus. Jesus Himself did not use the language of the ritual in laying before His disciples the meaning of His own work, and especially of His death. His expression with reference to giving His life "a ransom for many" (Mk 10 45) is open to debate, but in all probability it is not drawn from the sacrificial system. The nearest approach made by Him to identifying His death with an O T sacrifice, as regards significance, is that contained in the words of the institution of the Lord's Supper (q.v.). But the Apostolic interpretation, in both the Pauline and Johannine forms, very clearly works out the meaning of the Gospel along the lines of sacrificial symbolism.

SACRILEGE: The expression "commit sacrilege" occurs in Ro 2 22 AV as the rendering of ἱεροσυλεῖν, "rob temples" RV The reference is not to withholding temple dues and offerings. Paul insinuates that, notwithstanding his professed abhorrence to idols, the Jew might be guilty of robbing heathen temples, perhaps simply through receiving property stolen from them. He was himself exonerated from this charge at Ephesus (Ac 19 37). For the O T prohibition, see Dt 7 25 f., and cf. Jos. Ant. IV, 8 10.

S. D.

SADDLE: This is the rendering of merkebh, 'riding-place' (Lv 15 9, "carriage" RVmg.). The verb ḥābhash, 'bind on,' is used of equipping a beast (always an ass) for riding (Gn 22 3; Nu 22 21; Jg 19 10; II S 16 1, 17 23, 19 26 [27]; I K 2 40, 13 13, 23, 27; II K 4 24). The ass was ridden without a saddle, or with a saddle-cloth. When carrying heavy burdens a thick cushion was laid on the back to relieve the pressure. For the camel's saddle (Gn 31 34 RV, "furniture" AV) see FURNITURE. See also plate of ARTICLES OF TRAVEL, Fig. 11.

SADDUCEES, sad'yu-sîz, THE (Σαδδουκαῖοι): A section of the Jewish people who, in N T times, were possessed of the high-priesthood, and in general represented the non-scribal tendency in Judaism. Their name is derived either from Zadok, the typical high priest, or from tsaddīqīm, righteous ones. According to Josephus (Ant. XVIII, 1 3; BJ, II, 8 14), who was not in sympathy with their position, they held only to Mosaism, as distinct from the "oral law" developed by the Pharisees. They were also believers in free will, and disbelievers in immortality, or, at least, in the resurrection. According to Ac 23 8, they did not believe either in resurrection or in angels and spirits.

1. Name and Tenets.

The Sadducees were not, strictly speaking, a party, but were a group of wealthy aristocrats who, in a measure, represented that phase of development in the Jewish state that the Maccabæan revolt had checked. For a considerable period prior to the revolt under Antiochus Epiphanes there had been a decided tendency among the Jews toward Hellenistic culture. In this movement the high priests had been leaders. It would hardly be fair to say that they had planned the destruction of the worship of Jehovah; but they were certainly opposed to the current tendency represented by the Chasidim toward the development of the Jewish cult and the rejection of Greek culture (see PHARISEES, § 3). From the beginning of the revolt against the Syrians until the time of John Hyrcanus this Hellenistic party suffered severely at the hands of the enthusiasts for Judaism, and were plainly of the party of the opposition. Yet they came again into the possession of the high-priesthood when John Hyrcanus transferred his sympathy from the Pharisees to them. From that time, almost without exception, until the destruction of Jerusalem the high priests were from their group. Their relation with the Hasmonean house made the Sadducees objects of Herod's peculiar suspicion, and among the first acts of his reign was the execution of a number of Sadducees who were members of the Sanhedrin. Under the Romans, however, the Sadducees regained their power, and became in large measure the party favorable to the government. The Sadducees were not popular with the people, and apparently found it necessary at times to adopt the Pharisaic policy, in order to win popular favor. The revolt of 66 A.D. seems to have been directed against them, as well as against the Romans, and a number of them, including the high priest Ananias, were massacred. The importance of the priesthood was greatly diminished by the destruction of the Temple, and the Sadducees as a party lost prestige and influence. Individual Sadducees, however, continued to appear in the discussions of the Talmud, and almost invariably as opponents of what the Rabbis regarded as the true interpretation. In the rabbinical development of Judaism, however, the Sadducees had really no place. These references were hardly more than the utilization of the names of ancient enemies for the purposes of debate.

SAINTS: In the O T this term is the rendering of two Heb. terms: (1) ḥāṣīdh, primarily, 'loving,' 'good,' 'compassionate.' The term came to be used in the sense of 'godly' or 'pious,' i.e., full of love and loyalty to God. It is used almost exclusively in Pss (I S 2 9 AV; II Ch 6 41; Ps 30 4, 31 23, 37 28, etc.). (2) Derivatives of qādhēsh, 'to be holy,' and hence 'the holy one(s).' Outside of Dn the sense of the expression is general, usually referring to those (in Israel, of course) who are faithful to J". In Dt 33 2 AV the heavenly array of holy ones appears to be meant, if the ordinary text is correct. But it is probable that we should read "And he came from Meribah-Kadesh." In Dn (7 18 ff.) the term refers to Israel as the head of the Kingdom of God on earth, with the emphasis probably on the loyal portion of Israel. E. E. N.

In the N T "the saints" is the rendering of οἱ ἅγιοι, 'the holy.' Objectively, it means those who are objects of God's holy, redeeming love, His chosen and peculiar people, who are dedicated to and belong exclusively to Him (Ro 1 7; I Co 1 2; Eph 1 4, 18; Col 3 12). Subjectively, it means those who are separated from all defilement and pollution (Eph 1 4; Col 1 22), and are partakers of God's own holiness (Eph 5 3; Col 1 10; I P 1 15; Rev 19 8). S. D.

SALAMIS, sal'a-mis (Σαλαμίς): A town on the SE. coast of Cyprus. It was founded by the Phœnicians, and belonged successively to the Assyrians, Egyptians, and Persians. It became Greek in the 6th cent., and was the capital of Cyprus under Evagoras (410–374). It fell to Ptolemy in 323 B.C., and became Roman in 58 B.C. It was evangelized by Paul (Ac 13 5), with what success is unknown. J. R. S. S.

SALCAH, sal'cā, SALCHAH. See SALECAH.

SALECAH, sal'ē-ca (סַלְכָה, salkhāh, Salcah, Salchah AV): A city on the extreme NE. boundary of the kingdom of Bashan (Dt 3 10; Jos 12 5, 13 11; I Ch 5 11). The modern name is Salḥad. See Map of Ancient Semitic World. E. E. N.

SALEM, sē'lem (שָׁלֵם, shālēm): The city of which Melchizedek was king (Gn 14 18; Hb 7 1 f.). Eusebius mentions a tradition, according to which Abram and Melchizedek met on Mt. Gerizim. Salim, a village E. of Nâblus, is the basis of this view. Jerome identified it with Salumnias, 8 m. S. of Scythopolis. Josephus and other Jewish writers generally (Ps 76 2) have regarded it as a synonym of Jerusalem. Since Uru-salim was discovered to be the ancient name of Jerusalem in the Amarna letters, Salem has very generally been identified with that city (see JERUSALEM, § 19, and MELCHIZEDEK). J. A. K.

SALIM, sē'lim (Σαλείμ): A place referred to in Jn 3 23 as near Ænon, where John the Baptist was baptizing. Its site has never been determined; it certainly lay W. of the Jordan. Eusebius and Jerome located it 8 m. S. of Scythopolis (cf. SALEM). Robinson identified it with Salim, E. of Nâblus; others have advocated a location in Wâdy Suleim; others near 'Ain Karim. See ÆNON. J. A. K.

SALLAI, sal'la-i (סַלַּי, ṣallay): 1. One of those chosen to dwell in Jerusalem (Neh 11 8). 2. The name of a priestly family (Neh 12 20; called Sallu in ver. 7). E. E. N.

SALLU, sal'lū (סַלּוּ, ṣallū): 1. The head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 9 7; Neh 11 7). 2. See SALLAI, 2. E. E. N.

SALMA, sal'ma (שַׂלְמָא, salmā', שַׂלְמָה, salmāh), and SALMON (שַׂלְמוֹן, salmōn): An individual (or family) of Calebites who are represented as having founded Bethlehem (I Ch 2 51, 54) and from whom David was descended (Ru 4 20 f.; I Ch 2 11). Called Σαλμών in Mt 1 4 f. (Σαλά in Lk 3 32). E. E. N.

SALMAI, sal'mai or mē (שַׁלְמַי, salmay, Shalmai AV): The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim (Neh 7 48). E. E. N.

SALMON, sal'mən, SALMA, sal'mā (שַׂלְמוֹן, salmōn): The father of Boaz, husband of Ruth, and grandfather of Jesse, father of David (Ru 4 21; = Salmah Heb. in 4 20; = Salmā', I Ch 2 11; = Σαλμών, Mt 1 4, 5; = Σαλά, Lk 3 32). It is stated (Mt 1 5) that Rahab was his wife. If the Salma (I Ch 2 54) is the same person, then he was the father, i.e., founder, of Bethlehem. C. S. T.

SALMONE, sal-mō'nē (Σαλμώνη): The NE. promontory of the E. end of Crete. Luke alone gives the name Salmone. Samonium appears in Strabo, Ptolemy, Pomponius, Mela, and Pliny; Salmonium in Strabo; Salmonis in Apollonius of Rhodes and Dionysius Periegetes; Salmonia in an inscription. It is now called Cape Sidero. J. R. S. S.

SALOME, sa-lō'mi (Σαλώμη, fr. Heb. shālōm, 'peace'): 1. The grandniece of Herod Antipas (mentioned by name only in Jos. Ant. XVIII, 5 4. See HERODIAS), whose dancing before Herod led him to promise to grant any request she might make (Mk 6 17-22 and ‖s). 2. One of the women present at the cross and tomb of Jesus (Mk 15 40, 16 1), and probably to be identified with the mother of the sons of Zebedee in Mt 27 56. She has also been identified with the unnamed sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus, in Jn 19 25, making the sons of Zebedee Jesus' cousins (Zahn, *Einl.*² II, 455; Forschungen, VI, 338–341). But this identification is hardly more than a conjecture. See MARY. J. M. T.

SALT: The word for salt, melaḥ (Gr. ἅλς, ἅλας), is common to all Semitic languages. This shows how general was its use in antiquity. The Hebrews secured salt by evaporating the waters of the Dead Sea, or more readily from the Khashin Usdum, a cliff of rock salt, extending for 7 m. along the SW. shore of the Dead Sea (cf. "the pillar of salt," Gn 19 26; also Ezk 47 11, see PALESTINE, § 12, and LOT'S WIFE). S. was used in seasoning food (cf. Job 6 6) and therefore in large quantities (Ezr 6 9, 7 22) in the sacrifices (vegetable, Lv 2 13; with animal sacrifices also, Ezk 43 24; cf. Mk 9 49 mg.). The rights of protection and friendship were connected with eating together, and as salt was used in the food, we find the expression "covenant of salt," i.e., 'an eternal covenant' (Nu 18 19; II Ch 13 5; Lv 2 13; the fact that salt is a preservative may also add to the meaning). A salty land (Jer 17 6, mᵉlēḥāh) is a barren or desert land (Dt 29 23 [22]; Job 39 6; Ps 107 34), therefore "to sow a city with salt" (Jg 9 45; cf. Zeph 2 9) meant to doom it to perpetual desolation. According to II K 2 20 f., salt made impure water sweet. It was a custom to rub new-born babes with salt (Ezk 16 4). In the N T the preservative and seasoning qualities of salt are used figuratively (Mt 5 13; Mk 9 50; Lk 14 34; Col 4 6; cf. also the ref. to salt as a purifier, Mk 9 49). See also FOOD, § 4. C. S. T.

SALT, CITY OF. See CITY OF SALT.

SALT SEA. See DEAD SEA.

SALT, VALLEY OF (גֵּיא־הַמֶּלַח or גֵּיא־מֶלַח, gē'-melaḥ, gē'hammelaḥ): This was a place where important victories were won from the Edomites (II S 8 13; read "Edom" for "Aram" [Syrians]) by Israel under David (II S 8 13; I Ch 18 12; Ps 60 title [2]) and under Amaziah (II K 14 7; II Ch 25 11). It was between Jerusalem and Edom, and has been identified by some with Wâdy el-Milh E. of Beersheba, where are found remains of the City of Salt and good springs; by others, with the plain just S. of the Dead Sea, in the lower part of El Ghor.

C. S. T.

SALTWORT. See PALESTINE, § 22.

SALU, sê'lu (סָלוּא, ṣālū'): The father of Zimri (Nu 25 14). E. E. N.

SALUTE, SALUTATION: These words in EV are translations of bārakh, 'bless' (cf. I S 13 10 mg.), shā'al lᵉshālōm, 'to ask concerning one's welfare' (II K 10 15; cf. Jg 18 15), and ἀσπάζεσθαι (ἀσπασμός), which includes both greetings and embraces. In He 11 13 ARV, and often in AV, ἀσπάζεσθαι is translated greet. See especially the unnecessary and confusing alternations of 'greet' and 'salute' in Ro 16 3-9. In Ac 20 1, ARV reads 'took leave.' Biblical salutations consisted of acts as well as words (see also KISS and KNEEL). Verbal greetings were epistolary (Ezr 4 11, 7 12; Ac 15 23, 23 26; Rev 1 4; and see also EPISTLE) or conversational. The latter included inquiries (II S 20 9) and benedictions (Gn 43 29; Ps 129 8), which sometimes shaded into encouraging assurances (Jg 6 23; I Ch 12 18; Dn 10 19). The word shālōm, as used in O T salutations (e.g., I S 1 17, 25 6; Dn 10 11), means, not 'peace' (q.v.) as opposed to war, but general well-being, including health, security, and prosperity (cf. Gn 43 27; Ex 18 7). This form of salutation (whence the Anglicized 'salaam') is still common in Palestine, but is used only between 'brethren' of the same religion (cf. Mt 5 47; II Jn 10). In N T times χαῖρε, hail! (Mt 26 49; Mk 15 18; Lk 1 28) took the place of 'peace' as the ordinary greeting (cf., however, Lk 10 5; Jn 20 19), and λέγειν χαίρειν was equivalent to 'greet' (II Jn 10 f.). The salutation to royalty was "Long live the king!" (I S 10 24; I K 1 39; II K 11 12) or, in the Persian form, "O king, live forever!" (Dn 2 4; cf. Neh 2 3). The manifold and reiterated salutations of modern Palestine are irksome to one engaged in pressing business (cf. II K 4 29; Lk 10 4), but are not necessarily more insincere than our curt English phrases. Every situation in life (e.g., returning from a journey, dining, shaving, wearing new clothes) has its own formulas, in which the salutation and reply differ sufficiently to indicate the speakers (cf. Ru 2 4). Besides these set greetings, extempore expressions of great beauty are prompted by the tact and courtesy which are so characteristic of even illiterate Syrians and Arabs.

LITERATURE: In JE (art. Salute) some characteristic salutations of modern Jews are given. Baedeker's Palestine and Syria, p. cix, contains a number of Syrian salutations. See also Mackie in HDB, s.v. L. G. L.

The words "save," "Savior," "salvation," represent in the EVV of the O T mainly derivatives from the root yāsha', 'to deliver' (cf., however, Gn 12 12: "they will save thee alive," from hāyyāh, 'to keep alive'; also Ex 1 17; Jg 21 14, etc.; II S 19 5, mālaṭ, 'to save'; II S 19 9, nātsal, 'to snatch away,' and Job 2 6, shāmar, 'to keep,' 'to preserve'). In the N T the same words represent derivatives from σώζειν (σωτηρία). In all cases, the idea is that of deliverance from present or impending evil. Salvation is thus, in its most general sense, either deliverance from distress or preservation from danger.

1. Usage of Terms. But this generic idea is narrowed in the N T to the notion of the deliverance from the penalty, power, and pollution of sin, and this by a special way of which Jesus Christ was the revealer and guide (He 12 2).

2. Historic Development of the Idea. In the O T, when the term "salvation" is used without qualification, it has a special meaning, viz., that of deliverance from national calamity or peril. The safe crossing of the Red Sea and the destruction of the pursuing host are called "salvation" (Ex 14 13, 15 2). Deliverance from foreign oppression wrought through the hands of "Judges" is salvation. Othniel and Ehud are "saviors" (Jg 3 9, 15). The exploit of Jonathan and his armor-bearer at Michmash is a "great salvation" (IS 14 44), as are also the frequent deliverances of the Israelites from the hands of the Philistines. At the same time, not only extrication from distress or help and victory in warfare, but also the maintenance of security and the continuation of prosperity are included in the conception. This usage appears quite frequently in the Psalms (67 2); the favor of J" is thus made synonymous with salvation (cf. also Ps 91 16). These ideas are gathered up and combined into one in the Messianic eschatological notion which makes salvation summarily the expectation of a Golden Age for Israel in the future. The notion appears simultaneously, and runs parallel, with the Messianic hope (Is 52 10, 56 1, 62 11). It persists down to N T times, and is easily recognized as the thought of Simeon (Lk 2 30). But the Messianic Age is dominated by an ethical principle. It is reserved for a regenerated and morally purified people, whose character conforms to the Law of God. Furthermore, at the end of the O T period and during the intertestamental age, there arose a growing consciousness of individual participation in God's favor; and this was naturally drawn into the general idea of salvation, which, by the infusion into it of ethical content and individualistic application, was reconstituted in its technical sense above defined.

3. The O T System as a Plan of Salvation. Meantime, another development in the O T had prepared the way for thus approaching the subject from a different view-point. Communion with J" came to be regarded as the highest good (summum bonum). To enjoy His favor and live in perfect accord with His desire came to be the passion of the faithful Israelite. But the Israelite saw himself constantly thwarted in his effort to reach this highest good. He perceived also that sin was not necessarily permanent—that God out of His grace could restore him to His favor, and would do so upon certain definite conditions. This was not all expressed in the verb 'to save,' or the noun 'salvation,' but was embodied in the ethical and sacrificial system of the O T, and in the ultimate analysis that system was a means of salvation.

The postulates of the Biblical doctrine of salvation are: an idea of the highest good (summum bonum), conscious failure to attain it, the conviction that this failure is not final, but may be overcome by the help of Divine power, and that there is a way of enlisting that power toward this end. The correlation of these principles, with proportionate emphasis upon each, is a distinctive feature of the Biblical conception. No other race than that of the Hebrews succeeded in making a perfect synthesis of them. Among the Greeks and Romans, the idea of a highest good existed, but the consciousness of failure to attain it (the sense of sin) did not exist in sufficient strength. Among the Persians, while an evil principle was recognized as working in the world, it was considered eternal and independent, and the hope of overcoming it (salvation) was accordingly vague, if, indeed, it existed at all.

4. Postulates of the Biblical Doctrine.

But even among the Hebrews, the proper balance of thought was not always maintained. In the Pharisaic creed, for instance, the belief prevailed that the ravages of sin could not, in all cases, be arrested and counteracted. When Jesus declared that He came "to seek and to save that which was lost" (Lk 19 10), and chose the degraded and apparently hopeless as subjects for His regenerative efforts, His motives were called into question and His character was suspected. But He definitely assumed and asserted the principles underlying salvation, i.e., the possibility of reform, and the necessity of self-sacrifice in order to accomplish it. At the same time, the soteriology of Jesus raises the question, (1) Whom did He mean by the "lost"? and (2) How did He purpose to save them? In answer to the first, Jesus' own conduct shows that He deemed "lost" those who lived careless and godless lives; for it was because He associated with such that He was challenged. In the Parables of the Lost He distinctly characterizes those of this class as cut off from touch or communion with God (the coin from its owner, the sheep from the shepherd —and from the rest of the flock, and the son from his father—and from his home, Lk 15 14 ff.). This involves loss in a double sense, the owner or father in each case loses something, but also what is lost is in another sense the loser, illustrated more particularly by the cases of the lost sheep and the lost son, where not only the owner is deprived of his property, but the lost is by the same act plunged into misery and despair, and must be rescued for his own sake. But this rupture with God is precisely what is elsewhere called sin.

5. Teaching of Jesus on Salvation.

The answer to the question how Jesus purposes to save the lost is more complex. It is given partly in Jesus' attempt by social touch to lift the degraded. When He entered the house of Zacchæus (Lk 19 9), He declared that "salvation had come" into it. In the circumstances, His own entrance into the house was in itself salvation (the means of salvation); for it meant the revelation of the true nature of God and the attraction of its inmates to God by the mere holding before them of God's fatherly love. Zacchæus was saved when he turned from his sin to God (Lk 7 50).

6. Salvation by the Revelation of God.

But Jesus' conception of salvation is not exhausted in His mere coming. It has a positive aggressive side which, as given by the Synoptists, consists in the acceptance of the Kingdom of God and participation in its benefits. He who enters the Kingdom begins a life of loyal obedience to the fatherly reign. He does it, however, not without cost to himself. He must humble or deny himself, and become as a little child (Mk 10 15); he must risk his all, sell all he has in order to invest it in the purchase of this pearl or treasure-field (Mt 13 44, 46); he must leave all and follow Jesus, and, if necessary, hate father and mother, etc. (Lk 14 26).

7. Salvation: Entrance into the Kingdom of God.

Again, salvation is the complete reproduction of the image of God in the believer, because he realizes his true relation to God as his own father (Mt 5 45, 48). This realization brings the spirit of the Father into the heart (Mt 10 20), emancipates from the bondage of human authority (Mt 23 9), transforms the character, rendering men merciful and kind (Mk 11 25; Lk 6 36), creates childlike trust (Lk 12 30) and, in general, admits to all the privileges of the Father's house that had been forfeited by sin (Lk 15 22).

8. Salvation: Realization of Sonship.

In all its foregoing phases, salvation appears in the light of a change in the human subject of it. It has another side, which may be called Godward. It is also a change of the attitude of God toward the changed man. This side is present in Jesus' preaching of forgiveness (q.v.). In forgiveness, sin disappears as a consideration in the relation with God. But, in order to secure its removal, it is necessary to comply with the two conditions of forgiveness, i.e., repentance and faith. Such compliance is conversion (Mk 4 12), or return to God.

9. Salvation: Forgiveness of Sin.

Jesus' own work in salvation consists in revealing to the sinner God's love, his own possibilities, and the promise of forgiveness of sin upon condition of repentance and faith. How much more is involved in it is not clearly set forth in His own words. In one of His much-disputed utterances He characterizes His death as the giving of His life "a ransom for many" (Mk 10 45); and in the Last Supper He speaks of His blood as "shed for many for the remission of sins" (Mt 26 28). In neither of these passages, however, is there any undoubted reference to the efficacy of His death in changing the attitude of God toward the sinner as a condition of salvation. Rather, both may be regarded as expressions of God's propitious attitude awaiting to be availed of by man.

10. Jesus the Mediator of Salvation.

On the other hand, in the Johannine representation of the teaching of Jesus there is a constant reference to the primary significance and object of His life and ministry under the quite different form of an impartation of life (Jn 10 10). This life, from the fact of the drawing of its force from the eternal sphere, of its affiliation with the eternal sphere, and of its issuing in final adoption into the eternal sphere, is called eternal life (5 24, 10 28, 6 40). But eternal life is the gift of Christ, through the spiritual process of the knowledge of, and fellowship with, Himself; it is the result of faith (3 15 f., 36, 6 47). It is, indeed, the very knowledge of God brought into view by Jesus (17 2 f.).

11. Salvation: Eternal Life.

The conception of salvation found in the teaching of Jesus is thus fourfold. It involves: (1) Rescue from sin as a present evil. The lost are found and brought out of their misery and destitution; (2) the preservation of all the good that is found in the sinful, and the use of what was morally indifferent in making up the now saved; (3) a positive blessing for the present. The saved are put into the normal relation with God, and, therefore, have a new and large source of happiness in this life; and (4) inheritance of an abundant reward in the life to come (Mt 19 29).

12. Teaching of Jesus: Summary.

In the hands of the Apostolic teachers and the N T writers, the doctrine of salvation was developed along two lines. On the one side, it became a doctrine as to what God did for man through Jesus; on the other, as to what He does in man through the Holy Spirit. Of these, again, the first was viewed, partly as the work of revelation, instruction, and inspiration, and partly as atonement. The first of these two parts is accomplished by Jesus through His life; the second, through His death, whether this be viewed as a thing in itself or as the means for the complete offering up of His life in a sacrifice. What God does in man through the Holy Spirit is again either an act of transformation or a process of gradual conformation to ideals.

13. Apostolic Teaching: General.

Salvation is the work of Jesus Christ for man. At the very beginning of the Apostolic Age, Jesus was presented to the Jews as the Messiah and the only Savior from sin. Whether the annunciation narrative be one of the earliest or one of the latest productions in the Gospel story, it contains the belief of the days immediately following the Crucifixion and Resurrection. It proclaims Jesus as the One "who shall save his people from their sins" (Mt 1 21). The sum and substance of the preaching of the first disciples could not have been other than it is represented as being in the first chapters of Acts, viz., that the Jesus whom the Jews had caused to be crucified was the Messiah predicted by the prophets; but that as the Messiah He was a spiritual Savior, and the only one through whom salvation from sin could be secured (Ac 2 38, 3 19, 4 12).

14. Jesus the Messiah: the Savior.

But it is in the hands of Paul that this side of the doctrine was shaped into its fullest and final form. Paul recognizes in the work of Jesus an element of spiritual illumination. The Gospel, which "is the power of salvation unto every one that believeth," is first the revelation of God's righteousness and His wrath against sin (Ro 1 17 f.). But it is also the expression of God's love for man, and naturally comes to its fullest form in God's dealings with those who accept 15. Pauline Conception of Jesus as Revealer.

Christ as their Savior (Ro 5 8; Gal 6 14). There are, however, two ways of viewing the revelation of God's love in Christ, i.e.: (1) either that God reveals His love, and thus redeems men, or (2) that He redeems men through Christ, and so reveals His love. Both of these are correct and are included in Paul's teaching, but they present different aspects of the subject. Christ reveals God not only as a father who may be approached in the filial spirit (Ro 8 15), but also as a perfect pattern to which the child should conform (Ph 2 5 f.).

16. Atonement and Salvation.

But Paul lays the greatest stress on Christ's work for man through His death. This is the aspect of it which is commonly termed atonement. It may be well to observe that in speaking of atonement, Christ's work for man may be viewed as in his behalf or as in his stead. There can be no doubt whatever that, so far as Christ's death secures a reconciliation of man to God and is a bending of the human will Godward, Paul clearly sees it to be an effect of Christ's death on the cross. Every occurrence of the word "reconciled" in the Epistles has reference to man's reconciliation to God, not God's to man (Ro 5 10; II Co 5 18-20). Christ's life and death so present God to man as to win gratitude and love in response to God's love. The result secured is, accordingly, without the possibility of contradiction, a work in behalf of man. It inures to the benefit of man. The question remains simply whether the doctrine of the Apostle further includes an element or part that may be looked at as an indispensable condition for the securing of God's good pleasure toward man, or, in other words, whether Christ's life or death changes the attitude of God toward the sinner from an unpropitious to a propitious one. This is not a question that can be answered with a confident categorical affirmative or negative. That Paul places great emphasis on the Crucifixion of Christ is very clear (I Co 1 17; Col 2 14). In Gal 3 13 he seems to make the very form of crucifixion, as a mode of death, pivotal in the interpretation of Christ's saving work. It is because He died on the cross and incurred the curse pronounced on that mode of death (Dt 21 23) that He was able to take Himself and those who are joined to Him beyond the reach of the Law and thus set them free. But, in general, it is not crucifixion as a mode of death, but the fact that Christ's death was consummated on the cross that gives the expression "the cross" its meaning. And in this sense "the cross" is certainly central in Paul's view of salvation.

17. Analysis of Paul's Doctrine.

In the last analysis, Paul's view of Christ's death will be found to be clothed in terms of three different spheres of life, the forensic, the sacrificial, and the purely personal or mystical. Each representation, according to the nature of the sphere from which its materials are drawn, if carried by logical processes to the extreme limits of its application, would come into irreconcilable conflict with either and both of the other two. At least, great confusion is certain to arise from limiting Paul's thought to one of the representations. Neither is it safe to take one and carry it to its legitimate consequences, and at the same time to ignore or interpret away those portions of the others which do not completely coalesce with a doctrine constructed out of the first. The fact is that its richness and complexity forbid its being completely cast into a simple mold derived from a single department of life.

18. Forensic Atonement.

The forensic formulation of the atonement puts the subject in the language of law. Sinners are offenders against God (transgressors of law). By the terms of the Law, they are subject to condemnation and penalty. The cross of Jesus represents God's plan whereby He, being just and remaining just, even as a judge, can still absolve the sinner of the guilt and penalty of his sin. The cross accomplishes this, because Christ the innocent suffers for the guilty. The requirements of the Law are satisfied, and those who have faith are united to Christ and acquitted (II Co 5 21; Gal 3 13; Col 2 14). The ethical principles underlying this formula are the least clear of any of the portraitures of Christ's work in Paul's teaching; and for this reason the formula should not be made either the exclusive or the primary basis of Paul's doctrine of the atonement.

19. Sacrificial Atonement.

The sacrificial formulation is drawn from the Levitical system. It looks upon sin as a stain, and, therefore, as an absolute bar to communion with the Holy God. To remove it a sacrifice is necessary. The special sacrifice that would appear most appropriate in the circumstances could not be the burnt-offering, whose significance is the expression of adoration and praise, nor the peace-offering in any of its varieties (thank-offering, free-will offering, vow-offering); but the sin- or guilt-offering. Yet the victim of the sin-offering is a goat, whereas in Paul's mind Christ's sacrifice is that of the Passover lamb (I Co 5 7). But there is no manifest intention by Paul to be precise in the use of ritual terminology. Consequently, it must be inferred that the main point was to indicate the efficacy of Christ's death in removing the stain and offense of sin, and that sacrifice as a means toward this end is looked at as a composite affair comprising some general underlying principles. It is not one of the definite offerings of the ritual that represents Christ's death, but the ideas signified by them altogether. Further, in the sacrificial representation of Christ's death, it is left undecided whether the article of death in itself is what atones, or the life which is surrendered in death. This question was not present in the Apostle's mind, and if an answer to it must be secured, it will be through reversion to the O T thought of sacrifice and the meaning of the death of the victim in it.

20. Mystical Atonement.

The third, personal, or mystical representation of the atonement in Paul's theology proceeds upon the assumption that sin is a principle of corruption in the heart ending in the death of the sinner. Salvation, accordingly, is a deliverance of the sinner from the power of this evil. In Christ's death and victory over death all those who are united to Him by faith die; and in His Resurrection, by force of the same union they overcome death, and are no more liable to its power. Accordingly, salvation consists in being personally ingrafted into Christ, and becoming a sharer in all the experiences of the dominant member of the whole, viz., the Head. On §§ 16–20 see also ATONEMENT.

21. The Johannine Doctrine.

The Johannine notion of salvation and that in the Epistle to the Hebrews are different from Paul's only in leaving out of account the forensic representation, and giving attention to the sacrificial (He exclusively and Jn subordinately) and to the mystical (Jn predominantly and He incidentally or by inference). Jn specifies Jesus as the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. In Rev the figure of the Lamb is in constant use as an emblem of the sacrificial nature of His work, but in all cases the significance of the language and the underlying principles are the same as those in the thought of Paul.

22. Subjective Salvation.

The work of God in man through the Holy Spirit: Subjective salvation—by which name this part of the subject is commonly known—includes a doctrine of the change which brings the sinner from his darkness and ignorance and deadness to the knowledge of, and a new life in, Christ (cf. REGENERATION), a doctrine of his new relation to God (cf. JUSTIFICATION), and a doctrine of his gradual growth in the character which God desires to develop and complete, assimilating them to His own holiness (cf. SANCTIFICATION).

SAMARIA, sa-mê'ri-a (שֹׁמְרוֹן, shōmᵉrōn, perhaps from shāmar, 'to watch,' hence meaning something like 'outlook'; but, according to I K 16 24, derived from the individual [or clan] Shemer, from whom Omri purchased the site; in the N T Σαμάρεια): The capital of the Northern Kingdom, from its building by Omri, c. 880 B.C. (I K 16 24), to its capture by the Assyrians in 722 (II K chs. 17, 18).

During the succeeding centuries Samaria was often captured and demolished, only to be built again; and its mixed population was made still more heterogeneous through the addition of foreign colonies settled there by various conquerors. The city again became a royal residence, however, in the time of Herod the Great, who enlarged its fortifications, embellished it with many beautiful structures, and renamed it Sebaste, after the Emperor Augustus (Gr. Σεβαστός). During the early centuries of our era the city was gradually surpassed in prosperity by Neapolis (see SHECHEM); but it early became an episcopal see, which was reestablished by the Crusaders, and a Greek bishop, resident in Jerusalem, still takes his title from Sebaste.

S. lay 6 m. NW from Shechem, and occupied a commanding position on the summit of a round, isolated hill, 300 ft. high (1,542 ft. above the sea), which is separated from the surrounding heights by rich wheat-fields and olive orchards. Westward a break in the encircling mountains allows a magnificent outlook to the Mediterranean, 23 m. away. Map III, F 3. "It would be hard to find, in all Palestine, a situation of equal strength, fertility, and beauty combined" (Robinson).

Modern Sebaṣṭiyeh, however, is a squalid and fanatical Moslem village, whose paths and fields are cluttered with a multitude of fallen columns. The most important ancient edifice is the half-ruined crusading church of St. John, long since converted into a mosque. A few shafts still standing near the threshing-floor may mark the site of the Temple which Herod erected to Augustus, and several score of columns of the famous colonnade which once encircled the hill are still in place.

SAMARITAN, sa-mar'i-tan (pl. שֹׁמְרֹנִים, shōmrōnīm, only in II K 17 29; Σαμαρείτης, Jn 4 9; Ac 8 25): An inhabitant of Samaria or adjacent territory. The term came into use only after the population of this region developed a unique religious and social character. The origin of this is given in II K 17 24. Sargon, after deporting most of the population of Israel (722 B.C.), sent a colony of non-Israelites to live in the town of Samaria. These intermarried with the few Israelites left, and were joined by another group in the reign of Esarhaddon (675, Ezr 4 2), or Asshurbanipal (Asnapper, Asnappar RV, Ezr 4 10) in 650 B.C. The Israelitic element, however, proved the strongest in influence and was possibly the strongest in number. At all events, the religion of the mixed race was a modified form of J" worship, though many from among the non-Israelites reverted to their idolatry (II K 17 29 f.). Upon the return of the exiles under Zerubbabel, the Samaritans wished to help in the rebuilding of the Temple at Jerusalem (Ezr 4 1 f.). But their offer was rejected, and the breach between them and the Jews thus became permanent. In 446 B.C. they obtained permission to destroy the walls of Jerusalem just constructed by Nehemiah (Ezr 4 7 ff.; Neh 1 1 ff.), but failed to carry out their scheme (cf. Neh chs. 4 and 6).

Samaritanism as a religious system was perfected by the adoption of the Pentateuch as the sole sacred book and the erection of a temple on Mount Gerizim near Shechem (Jos. Ant. XI, 7 2, 8 2), which was sanctioned by Darius Codomannus and finished in 331 B.C. To justify the choice of Mount Gerizim for this purpose the text of Dt 27 4 was changed from "Ebal" to "Gerizim." The sect was later reenforced by the accession of converted Jews under Antiochus Epiphanes, when, by denying their affinity with the Jewish religion, the Samaritans were exempted from persecution. Their temple was destroyed by John Hyrcanus in 128 B.C. At the time of Jesus, hatred between Jews and Samaritans had become so acute that travel between Jerusalem and Galilee took a circuitous route east of the Jordan (Jn 4 9, 8 48; Jos. Ant. XX, 6 1 ff.). The Samaritans survive to the present day as a small community, deriving their name not from Samaria but from shōmᵉrīm, 'keepers [of the true law]' In addition to limiting the canon of the Pentateuch, they teach that the Messiah is not greater than Moses that He will live 110 years, and that He will come 6,000 years from the Creation and lead all men to the true faith. A. C. Z.

SAMGAR-NEBO, sam"gar-nî'bo (סַמְגַּר־נְבוֹ, ṣamgar-nᵉbhū): A chief army officer of Nebuchadrezzar (Jer 39 3), but the text is corrupt and perhaps to be emended from ver. 13. C. S. T.

SAMLAH, sam'lā (שַׂמְלָה, samlāh): A king of Edom, fifth in the list given in Gn 36 31 ff. His home was at Masrekah (Gn 36 36; I Ch 1 47 f.). E. E. N.

SAMOS, sē'mos (Σάμος): An island in the Ægæan Sea, off the Asiatic coast, where Paul touched on his voyage from Assos to Patara (Ac 20 15) on his way to Jerusalem in the spring of 57. Its earliest inhabitants were driven out by Epidaurian Greeks. It was famous in the 7th cent. for its architecture, its sculpture (bronze-casting), and its ship-building. It carried on an extensive maritime commerce under Polycrates (532–522 B.C.), and experienced varying commercial and political fortunes under Persians, Athenians, and the Ptolemies. In 84 B.C. it was annexed to the Roman province of Asia. J. R. S. S.

SAMOTHRACE, sam'o-thrēs (Σαμοθράκη, incorrectly Samothracia AV), possibly 'height of Thrace,' or 'Thracian Samos': An island in the Ægæan Sea, off the coast of Thrace, to which Paul came on the first days of his voyage from Troas to Neapolis in Macedonia (Ac 16 11). Its history is unimportant. It engaged with the Athenians in their campaign against the Persians and assisted in the great victory at Salamis (480 B.C.). Afterward, it became tributary to Athens. It was famous for its pre-Greek worship embodied in the Mysteries of the Cabiri. J. R. S. S.

SAMOTHRACIA, sam"o-thrē'shi-a. See SAMOTHRACE.

SAMSON, sam'sn (שִׁמְשׁוֹן, shimshōn), commonly derived from shemesh, 'sun,' and taken as a diminutive, 'little sun': The name of a Danite hero, represented as one of the "judges" of Israel (Jg chs. 13–16). The name "Samson" may have been given because of the prevalence of sun-worship among the Canaanites in the locality to which S. belonged. The city of Beth-shemesh, 'house of the sun,' for example, was not far from his native town. The equivalent of the name has been found in Assyrian and Arabic, therefore, as it may have been a name commonly used, no special significance need be attached to it.

The Samson stories are unique. Nothing like them is found elsewhere in the O T. While they are formally classed in the Book of Judges with the stories of Deborah, Barak, Gideon, Jephthah, etc., who all accomplished some great result for Israel, Samson appears as a solitary individual, waging his conflict alone, actuated by personal motives rather than by love of country or of God, with little or no sympathy or help from his countrymen, and coming to his end without having achieved any permanent success. He is called a "judge," but nothing in the stories given indicates that he ever assumed to be or was regarded as one in his lifetime.

The stories of S. relate (1) to the remarkable circumstances connected with his birth (ch. 13), (2) to his marriage to the Philistine woman of Timnah (ch. 14), (3) to his troubles with the Philistines growing out of this marriage (ch. 15), and (4) to his experiences with Delilah, which led to the loss of his strength, capture by the Philistines, imprisonment, and later his self-inflicted death (ch. 16).

It is only in the first and last of these stories that the religious element shows itself. In the first, S. is a nazīr (Nazirite, q.v.) from his birth, i.e., 'separated' or 'dedicated' to a work, which is described in 13 5 thus: "He shall begin to save Israel out of the hand of the Philistines." This may well be considered to be the interpretation that was put upon the career of S. in later times, namely, that the beginning of the long struggle in Israel against the Philistine supremacy was to be found in the single-handed heroic deeds of this Danite champion. Likewise, the end of his career would appear to have been of such unusual import as to be easily interpreted religiously.

To attempt to decide the question of how much historical truth the Samson stories contain would be futile. It is perfectly evident that the deeds of such a one as we may reasonably suppose S. to have been would be favorite topics for the local story-tellers, and the temptation to embellish the original forms of the stories with entertaining details would, doubtless, be very strong. The kernel of the stories must belong to the "Judges" period. Whether historical (as regards S. himself) or not, they are first-class historical evidence for much that relates to the social and political conditions on the western border of Israel in the 11th and 10th cents. B.C.

The attempt of some scholars to show that a mythological motive was present (Samson = Hercules, etc.) must be pronounced unsatisfactory. E. E. N.

SAMUEL, sam'yu-el (שְׁמוּאֵל, shᵉmū'ēl), 'name of God' (cf. Driver, Notes on Heb. Text of Samuel, p. 13 f.): The great leader of Israel in the time just preceding the kingdom period. The story of S. in I S is made up from two main threads of narrative (see DAVID, § 2, and SAMUEL, BOOKS OF, § 3 f.). In one of these, S. is set forth as he was thought of by the idealizing admiration of later centuries, which, while making use of old traditions, reread and interpreted them in accordance with the views of a later age. According to this view, S. was from the first a chosen instrument, to whom even as a child God made known His purpose concerning Eli. When he had grown to manhood he assumed the leadership of all Israel, thought of as acting as a unit through tribal representatives at great public assemblies. He brought about a religious reform, then conquered the Philistines and thus freed Israel from her enemies. In the era of peace that followed he was the supreme judge of the land. In his old age he appointed his sons judges, but the people were dissatisfied and demanded a king as a judge. S. was much displeased, but at the command of J″ proceeded to select a king, though still warning the people of the fatal character of such a choice on their part. Saul was chosen, but soon proved that S. was correct in his gloomy forebodings. When Saul failed to execute fully the Divine commission to exterminate the Amalekites, S. in great anger declared that he had forfeited his right to be king. Soon after, S. privately anointed David and once, in the troublous times that followed, protected David from Saul. At his death he was greatly mourned by all Israel and buried in Ramah. The last notice in this narrative concerning S. is that peculiar story in I S 28 3 ff. where S., called from his rest in Sheol, once more pronounces upon the unhappy Saul the message of doom (practically all the passages in I S that refer to S, except the important one mentioned in the paragraph following).

The other narrative (9 1–10 16) is simpler in character, and appears to have been written at a much earlier period when the traditions regarding S. were fresher and more accurate. In this narrative, the beginning of which has apparently been lost (I S 7 15-17 may belong to this beginning), S. appears as a local seer of considerable influence in the territory near his home, Ramah. He felt how unfortunate the condition of Israel was without a leader against the enemy, the Philistines, and was waiting for an intimation from God showing him the right man to select and commission in the name of J″ for this work. One day Saul of Benjamin appeared, searching for his father's asses and anxious to ask the seer where they might be found. S. was just about to preside over a sacrifice (and sacrificial feast to which about thirty influential persons had been invited) at the "high place" of Ramah. S. at once discerned in Saul the Divinely sent man and, after honoring him at the feast, entertained him at his home overnight, and on dismissing him in the morning anointed him with oil to be J″'s prince or 'leader' over His inheritance. Giving Saul knowledge of certain "signs" that would befall him on his way home, he told him to await the "occasion" that would call him forth into public service.

In the light of this older account the later one must be judged. In some respects, especially in its representation of S. as judge of "all Israel from Dan to Beer-sheba" (3 20, 7 3, 10 17 ff.), its view that S. was opposed to the popular demand for a king (8 6 ff.), its idea that S. made a complete conquest of the Philistines (7 13 f.), and that he took the prominent part assigned him in public affairs after Saul became king, this latter account is in conflict with the older account of 9 1–10 16. But there is no reason to discount altogether all that the later account tells us of S., and it is likely that the traditions concerning his childhood, early life at Shiloh, prominence in Ephraim, and general influence for good go back to actual facts. He was doubtless the one man who, more than any other, by his loyalty to J″ and ardent patriotism, stirred the people of central Israel to desire to shake off the Philistine yoke and assert their independence. He thus paved the way for Saul and David. E. E. N.

1. Name.

The two Books of Samuel in the EVV formed in the original Heb. canon but one book, called, according to Origen, "Samuel," being the third of the so-called "Earlier Prophets." In the LXX. this was divided into two books, as was done also with the following Book of Kings, and the four resulting books were called 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th "Book(s) of the Kingdoms." This division was not adopted into Heb. Bibles until the age of printing, the second edition of Bomberg's Heb. Bible being the first to make use of it, though it had long been current in the Latin Bible.

2. General Character and Contents.

Like most of the other historical books in the O T, I and II S should be characterized as compilations of historical material of most varied character rather than as histories in the ordinary sense of that term. Early and late sources have been made use of, in many cases placed side by side, or interwoven, in spite of their different and often conflicting points of view and contents. And to the sources so used have been added glosses and insertions, each in its way representing the view of some later editor who sought thereby either to harmonize differences between the sources or to make some part of the material a more adequate expression of his own conception of the nature of the past history.

The result is that we have a book which, while it seems at first sight to give in an orderly way the history of the period from Samuel to Solomon, proves on close analysis to be one of the most difficult and complicated books in the O T.

The general analysis of I and II S is quite simple. The book is subdivided into three main divisions: (a) chs. 1–15. Samuel and Saul, or the Origin of the Monarchy (in which ch. 15 is of the nature of an appendix to chs. 1–14). (b) I S ch. 16–II S ch. 8. David the successor of Saul as king of all Israel. (c) II S chs. 9–24. The reign of David, king in Jerusalem (in which chs. 21–24 form an appendix of miscellaneous material). It will be noticed that I S ch. 14 and II S chs. 8 and 20 each end in a summary statement, indicating that these passages once formed closing paragraphs of independent narratives.

The first division (I S chs. 1–15) may be analyzed as follows:

3. Analysis and Criticism of I S chs. 1–15.

I. The Career of Samuel as Prophet and Judge, chs. 1–7.
  1. The child Samuel at the sanctuary, 1 1–2 11.
    (1) Parentage and birth of S., 1 1-23.
    (2) S. given to the Lord by his mother, 1 24-28.
    (3) Hannah's psalm of thanksgiving, 2 1-11.
  2. The Divine judgment on Eli's house, 2 12–3 18.
    (1) The wickedness of Eli's sons, 2 12-26.
      a. Their sin in regard to the offerings, 2 12-17
      b. Samuel visited yearly by his mother, 2 18-21.
      c. Eli rebukes his sons in vain, 2 22-26.
    (2) Judgment on Eli's house pronounced by a "man of God," 2 27-36.
    (3) Revelation to S. of the doom on Eli's house, 3 1-18.
  3. S. becomes known to all Israel as a prophet of J" in Shiloh (3 19–4 1a).
  4. Israel defeated by the Philistines, 4 1a–7 2.
    (1) The defeat at Aphek. The Ark captured. Eli's sons slain. Death of Eli and of Phinehas' wife, 4 1a-22.
    (2) The Ark in the hands of the Philistines. It is returned to the Israelites and kept at Kiriath-jearim, 5 1–7 2.
  5. S. the leader of Israel, 7 3-17.
    (1) The religious reform, 7 3 f.
    (2) S. conquers the Philistines, 7 5-14
    (3) S. the judge of Israel, 7 15-17.

II. The Origin of the Monarchy. Saul made king, chs. 8–12.
  1. The people demand a king. S. is displeased and warns them, but J" directs him to proceed, ch. 8.
  2. The meeting between S. and Saul, 9 1–10 16.
    (1) Saul, searching for his father's asses, goes to inquire of S., 9 1-10.
    (2) Saul meets S. and is honored at the feast, 9 11-24.
    (3) S. makes known to Saul that he is to be king, gives him signs, and tells him to abide his opportunity, 9 25–10 8.
    (4) Saul returns home; is silent about the kingdom, 10 9-16.
  3. Saul chosen king by lot at the assembly at Mizpah, 10 17-27.
  4. Saul rescues Jabesh-gilead from the Ammonites, 11 1-13.
  5. The kingdom renewed at Gilgal, 11 14 f.
  6. Samuel's farewell address, ch. 12.

III. Saul's Reign and Rejection by God, chs. 13–15.
  1. The great victory of Saul over the Philistines, 13 1–14 46.
    (1) Saul and Jonathan smite the Philistine garrison at Geha, 13 1-4.
    (2) The Philistines invade Israel in force, 13 5-7
    (3) Saul rebuked for violating his appointment with Samuel, 13 8-15a.
    (4) The Philistines overrun the land, 13 15b-23.
    (5) Jonathan attacks the garrison at Michmash, 14 1-15.
    (6) The great victory over the Philistines, 14 16-23.
    (7) Saul's rash curse regarding tasting food, 14 17-46.
  2. Saul's other wars and victories, 14 47 f.
  3. Saul's family, 14 49-51.
  4. Continuous war with the Philistines, 14 52.
  5. Saul commissioned by S. to exterminate Amalek; he disobeys and is rejected by God, ch. 15.

A careful examination of the foregoing analysis will show that there are at least two parallel threads of narrative running through it, which not only differ from each other, but presuppose altogether different sets of circumstances. In addition, there are numerous minor episodes attached to these or interwoven with them which seriously disturb the orderly progress of the narrative.

In chs. 1–7 the main theme, as the book now stands, is doubtless the career of Samuel. This is given in the following passages: (a) The parentage and dedication to J" (1 1-28). In the present Heb. text, ver. 28 is out of order, the subject of the verb "worshipped" is missing and can not be supplied from the context. It is probably better to restore the true reading from the LXX. in 2 11: "And she left him there before J" and returned to Ramathaim." (b) The yearly visits of Samuel's mother to Shiloh to see S. (2 18–21). (c) The revelation to the child S. of the doom of Eli's house (3 1-18). (d) S. becomes recognized by all Israel as a prophet (3 19–4 1). (e) S. assumes the leadership of Israel, brings about a religious reform, and conquers the Philistines (7 3-14). (f) S. the judge (7 15-17). Attached to this main thread, perhaps as later insertions, are (1) the Song, or Psalm, of Hannah, a late composition (2 1-10) belonging to the kingdom period (cf. ver. 10); (2) the passages dealing with the wickedness of Eli's sons (2 12-17 and 22-26, one of which was probably originally connected directly with 3 1-18); (3) the message of the "man of God" to Eli (2 27-36, a passage that is really concerned with the claims of two rival priestly families to the priesthood, and belongs naturally to the time when the line of Zadok was claiming this exclusive right; see PRIESTHOOD, § 5 f.); (4) the long section regarding the defeat of Israel and the capture of the Ark (4 1b–7 2, in which there is no reference whatever to Samuel). All this material has been so well interwoven with the main thread (dealing specifically with S.) that no serious discrepancy is observed.

In the next main section (chs. 8–12) uniformity is not so well secured. The biographical passages that carry forward the story of those in chs. 1–7 and from the same view-point are: (1) The dissatisfaction of the people at the sons of S. as judges (8 1-3). (2) Their demand for a king "to judge us" (8 4-6). (3) S. protests in vain against this plan and is directed by J″ to install a king in Israel (8 7-22). (4) At an appointed meeting at Mizpah Saul is chosen king (10 17-25). (5) Later, S. delivers a farewell address (ch. 12, which, however, belongs logically with 10 25).

But in the midst of these passages there are two long sections, intimately related, which are of entirely different character: (1) In 9 1–10 16 Saul, the Benjamite, a young man, hunting for his father's asses, comes into the neighborhood of Ramah, the home of S. Saul apparently knows nothing of S., who is called a "seer" (cf. 9 9), but Saul's servant knows of him and advises Saul to ask S. as to the whereabouts of the asses. It is a sacrifice-day in Ramah, and Saul meets S. just as the latter is about to preside at the sacrifice. S. at once discerns in Saul the wished-for "prince" who was to "save my people out of the hand of the Philistines" (9 16; contrast 8 5), greets him heartily, and entertains him overnight. The next morning S. dismisses Saul after intimating to him what is in store for him, and tells him to "do as occasion shall serve thee." Saul returns home and tells no one what has happened. (2) The "occasion" S. referred to comes very soon in the summons from Jabesh-gilead, while the resulting victory at once brings Saul into public notice and leads to his being chosen king. Throughout these sections the kingdom is viewed as a blessing, S. is warmly in favor of it, the function of the king is mainly military, and the great national need is deliverance from the Philistines. The passages 10 25-27 and 11 12-15 are composite in character, but their analysis is not easy.

The next section (chs. 13–15) is also not all of the same character. Ch. 13 f. deals with Saul's wars, especially with his great initial victory over the Philistines, and ch. 15 with his final rejection by S. In the midst of the narrative of Saul's struggle with the Philistines in ch. 13 we find the story of S.'s first rejection of Saul (13 7b-15a, with which possibly parts of vs. 4-6 are to be connected). In this story the scene is at Gilgal, but in the main narrative it is near Geba and Michmash (13 2 f., 16 ff.). Ch. 15, though similar in its point of view to 13 7b-15a, is a piece by itself.

The result of the foregoing analysis can be stated as follows: The compiler of the Books of Samuel used as one of his sources for the story of the origin of the monarchy and the reign of Saul a very old account (cf. 9 9) in which, after telling how the Philistines had gained control of Israel (ch. 4), Saul was set forth as the savior of his country, who broke the power of the enemy and led Israel to victory on all sides. Saul was the Divine choice through S., was mightily endowed by "the spirit of J″" (9 1–10 16), triumphed first over the Ammonites (11 1-11), then broke the power of the Philistines (13 1-6, 16–14 46), then conquered other peoples (14 47 f.), the narrative concluding with a formal notice of Saul's family (14 49-51, which may be a later addition).

Parallel with this is another and probably much later account, which, however, made use of some old material. This account gives much space to S.'s biography; it emphasizes the virtues of S., the perfection of his administration, even falling into serious historical error in 7 13 f., and, viewing the kingdom with disfavor, points out how the kingdom in the person of its first king fulfilled S.'s gloomy forebodings. The point of view here is the 'Deuteronomic,' and the general character of certain long passages such as chs. 12 and 15 is distinctly 'Deuteronomic.'

4. Analysis of I S ch. 16–II S ch. 24.

For the analysis of the remainder of the material in I and II S the reader is referred to the article DAVID, § 2, where it is given in full and where also its historical character is discussed. Here it is necessary only to point out that while with 16 14 a new source begins (called narrative A in art. DAVID), the connection between this source and the preceding story found in ch. 4, in 9 1–10 16, 11 1-11, and in ch. 13 f. (except 13 7b-15a) is very close. Both are written in the same spirit, and the second might even be considered the continuation of the first. Likewise, it will be noted that the narrative called B in art. DAVID is but a continuation of the sections in I S 1 1–16 13 dealing with the biography of S., the mistake of choosing a king, and the conflict between S. and Saul, or the 'Deuteronomic' sections.

5. Authorship, Date, and Historical Value of I and II S.

Since the books are compilations from older documents, little can be said concerning their authorship. The main documents used, viz., the old history of Saul (I S 4 1, 9 1–10 16, 11 1-11, 13 1-7a, 15b–14, end) and of David (narrative A) and the old history of David's reign in Jerusalem (Da[J]) were of quite early date (10th or 9th cent. B.C.), as was also much of the miscellaneous material in II S chs. 20–24 (see DAVID, § 2 (4)). To this material a high historical value must be assigned throughout. On the other hand, the 'Deuteronomic' passages, though embodying some older material, are as a rule of late date (7th cent. or after) and are written with a distinctively didactic or 'pragmatic' purpose. The past history is viewed in the light of the writer's present, and all persons and events judged accordingly. S. and David are idealized, the kingdom was fundamentally a great error (in spite of David; cf. I S 8 10-18), and in Saul are seen the type and fate of the king who chooses his own will against that of J". To these passages only a moderate degree of historical value can be assigned. The kernel of historical truth they contain must be carefully distinguished from the interpretations or additions of the writer himself.

The problem of the date of the books is intimately involved with that of Jg and I and II K (see articles on these books). The first draft of I and II S was made probably before the Exile. But certain passages, e.g., I S 2 27-36, may be post-exilic. At all events, it is probable that the books did not assume their present form until after the Exile.

SANBALLAT, san-bal'ǧt (סַנְבַלַּט, ṣanᵉbhallaṭ, Assyr. sin-uballiṭ, 'the god Sin has given life'): A Horonite, probably a native of Beth-horon. He was a Samaritan of large influence, and unsuccessfully plotted to defeat Nehemiah's plans for rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (4 7 f.). He then invited this Jewish governor to a conference at Ono, that he might treacherously slay him (6 1-4), but urgent business and shrewdness kept Nehemiah at Jerusalem. Neither were threats of any value in his plottings (6 5-14). Sanballat had established domestic relations at Jerusalem, for a grandson of the high priest had become his son-in-law (13 28). Josephus (Ant. XI, 7 2) tells us, though he entirely mistakes the date, that his name was Manasseh, and that he, when given the alternative either of forsaking his wife and remaining in Jerusalem or of accompanying her to Shechem and becoming high priest of a new temple to be built by his father-in-law on Gerizim, chose the latter, and thus established the community of Samaritans, who adopted as their Scriptures the Pentateuch. SANCTIFY, SANCTIFICATION: To make, declare, or regard 'holy.' The Heb. and Gr. terms

1. General Sense.

(qādhēsh, 'to separate,' ἁγιάζειν, 'to hallow') are rendered in the EVV by 'hallow,' 'consecrate,' 'sanctify.' But these represent in general a progressive movement from the outward to the inner and ethical sense.

In the first instance, to sanctify is to regard or declare holy by separating from common usage to the service of God. The Sabbath day was thus separated ("hallowed," Ex 20 11); so also were the vessels of the sanctuary (Ex 40 9). Solomon hallowed the inner court of the Temple (II Ch 7 7). In the N T this sense survives in the first petition of the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6 9). To hallow God's name is neither to make it holy nor to consecrate it, but simply to recognize and declare it such.

2. To 'Hallow.'

With the rise of the ritual the idea of sanctification takes on the sense of consecration. By special symbolical action that which is separated from common use and dedicated to religious purposes is given a new, though conventional character. To turn it into any other use after such consecration is to defraud God and thereby commit a grievous offense. The priesthood acquired this ceremonial holiness by consecration. But the technical term employed to express this conception (Ex 28 41, 29 9) is to "fill their hands," viz., make them competent for service by placing within their hands the gift which as priests they are to bring to the altar of J". A place or house of God was in the same way consecrated, the special technical term used being "dedicate" (ḥānakh, I K 8 63; ἐγκαινίζειν, He 9 18).

3. To 'Consecrate.'

It is only in the N T that the third, and highest, sense of the verb sanctify (sanctification) appears, and here, clearly and plainly, first in the usage of Paul. To sanctify is to make inwardly whole. And the work is the function of the Spirit of God. In the Gospels, no mention is made of inward sanctification. In the utterances of Jesus, to sanctify is to consecrate. It is the Temple which sanctifies the gold, and the altar which sanctifies the gift (Mt 23 17, 19; cf. also usage in Jn 10 36 and 17 17, 19). Paul, however, distinctly passes to the ethical sense. He sets it as the goal of God's wish for the disciples of Christ that they should be completely sanctified (I Th 4 3); and he evidently includes in his thought the control and direction of the body in purity by the spirit, the putting off of sin, and the putting on of holiness.

The agent of sanctification is the Holy Spirit (Ro 15 16). His indwelling, working from within outward, constitutes the essence of sanctification, which is, therefore, not a garment to be put on, but a spiritual principle; so that, even when one portion of the manhood is affected by it, it passes into and suffuses the whole. "If the root be holy, so are the branches" (Ro 11 16). Sanctification is, then, neither a simple act nor a process which must be completed before it can be strictly called by that name. It is complete at the outset, and yet it is a process which admits of growth and increasingly nearer approximation to its ideal completion. How this apparent anomaly of thought arises is explained by the fact that the conception has had its static stage in its earlier form. In the O T it was the act of consecration that made the person or object holy. When the dynamic stage in the development of the conception came, it was understood as conformity to God's character, rather than separation to His service. Whenever, therefore, the thought reverts to the static aspect of the conception, sanctification appears as an already complete thing. Hence believers are holy. They are saints (Ro 12 13; II Co 1 1; Eph 1 1, etc.), but whenever the idea points to the growing or dynamic side of the notion, sanctification is progressive (a work of God's Spirit inwardly, changing the sinner into increasingly perfect conformity to God's whole image). This does not supersede in the N T writings the earlier sense of 'consecration' and 'hallowing' (cf. He 13 12; I P 3 15), but expands and completes the notion.

SANCTUARY: This is the rendering of the two Heb. terms qōdhesh and miqdāsh, both from qādhēsh, 'to be holy,' and thus signifying 'holy place.' In the N T ἅγιον (He 8 2, 9 1 f., 13 11) is so rendered, meaning the Tabernacle or Temple 'holy place,' except in 8 2, where the word is plural and the sense general (see RVmg.). Though the term "sanctuary," as it occurs in the EV, refers almost exclusively to the Tabernacle or Temple, it will be convenient here to discuss briefly certain conceptions expressed by such a term as miqdāsh, 'holy place.'

In primitive times the term 'holy' (see HOLINESS, § 1) was applied in a very general way to many objects as well as persons. A holy character was assigned to springs, trees, heights, etc. (see HIGH PLACE), as these were thought to be especially favorite haunts of deities (see SEMITIC RELIGION, §§ 7–10). Israel, though nominally worshiping J″ alone, easily came to think of Him as likely to be found in or near such 'holy places,' many of which had earlier been seats of the worship of Canaanite deities. Wherever He had specially manifested Himself or "recorded" His name (Ex 20 24) was a 'holy place.'

When to such places were attached an altar, sacred stone pillar, sacred tree or wooden pillar ("grove" RV; see SEMITIC RELIGION, §§ 11, 30), and some symbol of deity, the golden calves, for example, at Bethel and Dan (cf. also Jg 17 5, 31), they took on special significance. If in addition such a sanctuary had a priesthood, it had all the furnishings for a fully equipped 'holy place.' The old narrative in Jg ch. 17 f. is very valuable, as showing how easily such a sanctuary could be established in early days in Israel. A sanctuary was also a place of asylum, the horns of the altar in particular being considered inviolable (cf. I K 2 28 ff.). The sanctuaries of ancient Israel were numerous (cf. Am 7 9). Some places like Shiloh, Bethel, Gilgal, Beer-sheba, etc., were great centers of worship, with numerous priests, and a highly developed cultus. On Bethel cf. Am 7 10 ff. (in ver. 13 for "chapel" AV read "sanctuary" with RV). See also TEMPLE and TABERNACLE.

SARAH, sê'rā, the later form of SARAI (שָׂרָה, sārāh, שָׂרַי, sārāi), 'princess': The wife of Abraham (Gn 11 29), and his father's daughter (20 12). She accompanied A. from Ur of the Chaldees to Haran (11 31) and Canaan (12 5). Because of a famine, they went down to Egypt, where S., as sister of A., was taken into Pharaoh's house. On finding out that she was Abraham's wife, Pharaoh rebuked him and sent them on their way (12 10-20, J). A similar adventure in connection with Abimelech (20 1-18, E) is probably a variation of the same story (cf. also 26 6-11). According to 17 17, S. was sixty-five years old when she went down into Egypt, an age which would seem to tell against the probability of the experience in the court of Pharaoh. The ages evidently belong to another document, P. Being childless (11 30) Sarai gave Hagar, her handmaid, to Abraham as a concubine. Afterward, she dealt hardly with Hagar, so that the latter fled from the house, but later returned (ch. 16). In ch. 17 (P) a son is promised to Abraham of Sarai, whose name hereafter is to be Sarah (17 15 f.). Another account of the promise is given in J (18 9 ff.). The birth of Isaac is related in 21 1-7. Moved by jealousy because of Ishmael's attitude in the house, S. compelled Hagar and Ishmael to leave. S. died in Kiriath-arba (Hebron) when 127 years old (23 1 f., P), and was buried in the cave of the field of Machpelah before Mamre (23 19; cf. 25 10, 49 31, P). In Is 51 2 S. is called the "mother" of the true Israel. In the N T she is mentioned as the mother of "the children of the promise" (Ro 9 9; cf. 4 19), and as an example of a good wife (I P 3 6). Her faith is referred to in He 11 11. Some scholars explain S. as being originally the name of a tribe or clan.

SARDINE. See STONES, PRECIOUS, § 2 (1).

SARDIS, sār'dis (Σάρδεις): One of the seven churches mentioned in Rev (3 1 ff.). It was the capital of the Lydian kingdom down to the fall of Crœsus (546 B.C.), then the residence of the Persian satrap. It was situated in a fertile plain at the northern foot of Tmolus. The history of S. is inseparable from that of Lydia (see ASIA MINOR, § 9). The beginnings of S. lie beyond the limits of known history. The Acropolis, rising on three sides almost perpendicularly to a height of 1,500 ft. above the plain, was said to have been fortified on the remaining (southern) side by the mythical king Uleles. It was taken first by the Cimmerians, then by the Persians under Cyrus from Crœsus, under whom S. had reached the zenith of her prosperity. With ordinary watchfulness the Acropolis was absolutely impregnable, but in overconfidence its weak point was left unguarded and was taken by stealth twice: once by Cyrus, 546 B.C., and once by Antiochus the Great in 214 B.C. (Cf. "Be thou watchful. . I will come as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee," Rev 3 2.) The importance of S. was due to its strategic position commanding the great trade-route from seaboard to the East (the 'Royal Road'), aided by its fertile plains and manufactures (woolen stuffs, rugs, gold ornaments). This combination made Sardis rich, though the ancients ascribed her wealth to the gold washed down by the Pactolus river. This was merely allegory, because S. was the first city to coin money, but trade was what brought the gold to it, and its people were the earliest shopkeepers. Even to a late period Lydian sutlers accompanied, and enriched themselves on, every army (the so-called 'Lydian market'). S. therefore became the first gold-market, to which the Spartans sent for gold wherewith to gild the face, hands, arms, and feet of the Amyclæan Apollo. When the road-system came to radiate from Constantinople, S. began to decline, being overshadowed by Philadelphia and Magnesia.

SARGON, sär'gon (סַרְגֹּן, ṣargōn = Assyr. shargānu, sharu-kenu, 'established king'): The king of Assyria from 722 to 705 B.C. He seems to have seized the throne, and thus to have established the last great Assyrian dynasty. The first recorded event in his annals is the fall of Samaria, 722 B.C., which Shalmaneser had begun to invest in 724 B.C. (II K 17 1-6), though the records in Kings alone (cf. 17 3-6 and 18 9 f.) are not entirely clear. In 720 Sargon settled captive Hamathites in the cities of Samaria, and in 717 captured Carchemish, the great Hittite capital. In 715 he seems to have brought more colonists to Samaria, to have received tribute from the king of Egypt, and to have conquered Judah. About 711 Sargon sent his "tartan"—i.e., general (Is 20 1)—against Ashdod to break up the coalition that had been formed by the embassy of Merodach-baladan (Is ch. 39). In 710 he threw his forces against Babylon, captured it, and proclaimed himself king thereof. He had begun a few years earlier to build his great palace at Khorsabad 10 m. N. of Nineveh, and brought it to completion only to be assassinated by one of his own soldiers in 705 B.C. Sennacherib, his son, became king in his stead. I. M. P.

SARSECHIM, sär-sî'kim (שַׂרְסְכִים, sarṣᵉkhīm): One of the princes of Nebuchadrezzar who assembled in council at the fall of Jerusalem (Jer 39 3). Various attempts have been made to read this otherwise than as in the Hebrew, but each such attempt involved considerable conjecture, as, for instance, Nebushazban, as in ver. 13. SATAN, sê'tan (הַשָּׂטָן, with the art., hassāṭān), 'the adversary': In general, one who places himself in another's way and thus opposes him.

1. Name. In this sense, the Heb. word occurs in Nu 22 22, 32; I K 11 25 (EVV "adversary"); also in Ps 109 6 (RV, "Satan" AV), but with a rather more specialized application as an accuser at law. As the proper name of one superhuman being it first occurs in Zec 3 1, where the article ("the Satan") indicates its application to a definite person. Thus it becomes a proper noun, and is used with increasing frequency (I Ch 21 1; Job 1 6 f., etc.; in the N T Σατάν, Σατανᾶς, Mt 4 10; Jn 13 27; Ac 5 3; I Co 5 5; Rev 2 9, etc.). The form διάβολος (devil) primarily designates Satan as calumniator (see the general use of the word in I Ti 3 6; II Ti 3 26; Tit 2 3), κατήγωρ, simply as an enemy (Rev 12 10). Other names are significant of some special phase of his character and activity, such as 'the tempter' (ὁ πειράζων, Mt 4 3; I Th 3 5), 'the pernicious one' (ὁ πονηρός, 'the wicked one,' Mt 13 19; Eph 6 16; also the 'evil one,' Mt 6 13; but "evil" AV). Names are also given him from the association of his personality with some extra-Biblical conception of the origin and administration of evil, such as Beelzebub, Beliar (q.v.) (II Co 6 15), the "prince (ἄρχων) of the demons" (Mk 3 22 and ||s), of this world (Jn 12 31), of the powers of the air (Eph 2 2), the serpent (II Co 11 3) and "the old serpent" (Rev 12 9).

2. Distinguished from Demons and Heathen Parallels. The full Biblical idea of Satan includes the notion of a superhuman personality, possessed of surpassing wisdom and malice, who accuses men of evil, tempts them to its performance, and becomes the instrument of their punishment for sin. Satan is, therefore, distinguished from demons, not simply by being greater and more powerful than they, even to the extent of ruling over them as a body, but by a special character and functions. In the N T the name "devil" is never given to demons. The doctrine of Satan has its parallels in the mythologies of the heathen nations, such as Loki in Scandinavia, Ahriman in Persia, and Momus (the critic of gods and men) in Greece. But no figure in any mythology is exactly like the Biblical Satan. The others are either too playful and trivial or, as in the case of Ahriman, too independent of God's control to compare with him.

3. Development of the Conception. Historically, the conception of Satan emerges slowly. An intimation of the existence of a demon, or evil genius of the world, was to be found in the pre-exilic narrative of the fall of man (Gn ch. 3), in which the serpent (suggestive of the Babylonian Tiâmat, the destroyer of the works of the gods) appears as the tempter of man to disobey God's will. Evil spirits ("evil spirits from J"") are not unknown in the earlier days. They do men harm by their misleading influence and suggestion (Jg 9 23; I S 16 14; I K 22 22). But all these are subordinate to God and do His bidding. In Zec 3 1 Satan stands in a semi-independent attitude toward God, but is in the end subject to Him, and must have His permission to accomplish his design. Toward God's people he is not sympathetic; he is not satisfied with the misfortunes that have befallen Jerusalem, and for this J" shows His anger against him. In Job he appears submissive to God's power and authority; but underlying this attitude he entertains a lurking desire to do harm to God's righteous servants. The apparent incongruity of a person with such a frame of mind consorting with the other "sons of God" in the courts of heaven, giving an account of himself to, and speaking on familiar terms with, God, disappears when the narrative is seen to be constructed, not as a picture of realities, but as a vehicle of moral teaching, and it does present Satan in the rôle of the accuser. In I Ch 21 1, on the other hand, the principal object of his appearance is to tempt. That here, too, his work is viewed as under the control of God is evident from the pre-exilic account of the same affair (II S 24 1), according to which God Himself puts David to the test.

4. Satan in the Apocrypha.

In the intertestamental period the conception of Satan was modified in the direction of widening the breach between him and God. This was no doubt due to the influence of Persian dualism. The existence of such influence is clearly shown in the figure of Asmodæus (the Æschma-Dæva of the Bundahesh, To 3 8, 17). In Eth. En. a hierarchy of Satans comes into view, different from, and yet confused with, the fallen angels (6 7). But apart from this, no new addition is made to the conception.

5. Satan in the N T.

In the N T there are signs of a process of synthesis, in which the malignant figures of Beelzebub, Apollyon, Beliar, and the old serpent (the great dragon) are fused into one. At the very threshold, Satan exercises his function as a tempter of Jesus (Mt 4 1). Later, the enemies of Jesus accuse Him of performing His miracles by the aid of the arch-enemy (Mk 3 23). Satan aims to nullify every good work (Mk 4 15); his fall is looked forward to as a complete triumph of God (Lk 10 18; Rev 20 2, 7); he is the instigator of falsehood (Ac 5 3; Rev 12 9), and of murder (Jn 13 27); but he is also the instrument of punishment for such as violate righteousness (I Co 5 5; I Ti 1 20). He is consistent and persistent in his efforts to draw men away from God into destruction (I P 5 8; Eph 6 11). He succeeds in securing many in his toils, who are then called his children (Ac 13 10; Jn 8 44), or his synagogue (Rev 2 9), or blended in his personality (Jn 6 70; Mk 8 33). He is recognized as in control over a kingdom of evil spirits, situate in the circumambient atmosphere, and being in direct contact with, and influence over, human lives (Eph 2 2, 6 12). See also DEMONOLOGY, § 4. A. C. Z.

SATRAPS (אֲחַשְׁדַּרְפְּנִים, 'ăḥashdarpᵉnīm, from the Persian khshtrapavan, 'protectors of the realm,' which the Greeks rendered into ἐξατράπης, σατράπης): Governors of provinces under the Persian rule (Ezr 8 36; Est 3 12, 8 9, 9 3, "lieutenants" AV, and, in the Aram. form, Dn 3 2, 3, 27, 6 7, "princes" AV). The office was next to that of the king himself, and the powers attached to it were limited only by the monarch's authority over its incumbent. The division of the empire into provinces governed by satraps was made by Darius Hystaspes (520–486 B.C.) and is frequently referred to by the Greek historians (Xenoph. Cyrop. VII, 4 2; VIII, 6 3; Herod. I, 192). SATYR: The rendering of the Heb. sā'īr, 'hairy,' 'wild goat,' in Is 13 21, 34 14, both AV The RV renders literally "wild goat," but it is probable that the reference is actually to goatlike demons, popularly supposed to inhabit the desert. See also DEMON, DEMONOLOGY, § 1. E. E. N.

SAUL, sôl (שָׁאוּל, shā'ūl), 'asked [of J"]': 1. The son of Kish, a man of Benjamin, and the first king of Israel. The story of S. lies before us in I S in two types of narrative. One of these, much older and probably more reliable than the other, is contained (1) in chs. 9–14 (mainly in 9 1–10 16, 11 1-11, 13 1-7a, 15b–ch. 14) and (2) as a part of the story of David (see DAVID, § 2 (1)). The other type of narrative, quite late and written from the point of view of the religious reformers of the 7th cent., is contained (1) mainly in I S 10 8, 17-24, 11 14 f., 13 7b-15a, 15 1-34, and (2) in the narrative called B in art. DAVID, § 2 (2) (q.v.). See also SAMUEL, BOOKS OF, § 3.

The S. presented to us in the first of these sources is a brave, patriotic man, of fine physical presence, able, energetic, and generally successful in war, and in his better moods a man of some personal magnetism. But the older sources reveal also certain mental traits which can probably be best interpreted as belonging to a man with a strong tendency to melancholia, which at times verged on epilepsy (10 10), at other times on violent insanity, rendering him peculiarly liable to feelings of jealousy. In the later source those actions of S. which were due mainly to these faults of his disposition are singled out and overemphasized (due to the writer's exclusively religious point of view) and thus made the basis of the unfavorable judgment pronounced on him. The writer of this later material lived in an age (after the evil and religiously disastrous reign of Manasseh) when it was natural for one who had Israel's highest welfare at heart to look back over the history of the kingdom and consider that as a whole it had been productive of evil rather than good. S. was used as the example illustrating this theory, and thus served the didactic rather than strictly historical purpose of the writer. In view of these considerations, it is safer to follow the older sources almost exclusively in our estimate of S.'s personality and work.

S. came to the throne probably some time near 1030 B.C. It was a time when central Israel was under the overlordship of the powerful Philistine confederacy. Garrisons of these foreigners were stationed here and there over the land. The work of Samuel had led to a strong desire to throw off the Philistine yoke, but no suitable leader appeared. At last, Samuel discerned in S. the man for the times and privately summoned him to the task (9 1–10 16). S. was at this time a man in the prime of life with several sons, the eldest of whom, Jonathan, was one of the choicest spirits known to Israel's tradition.

The summons of the people of Jabesh-gilead roused S. to action and showed Israel that it possessed in him the needed leader with the requisite courage and ability. Soon after this, the struggle with the Philistines began in earnest. Jonathan attacked and slew the garrison in Geba near S.'s home (13 3). The Philistines retaliated by an invasion in force which at first threatened to overwhelm Israel (13 5 f., 16 ff.). But Jonathan by an act of signal daring threw the garrison of Michmash into panic (14 1-15), and, thus encouraged, the Israelites attacked the Philistines with vigor and succeeded in driving them out of the country with great slaughter (14 16 ff.). From this account the section 13 7b-15a is to be excluded. Its scene is laid in Gilgal, far away from Geba and Michmash. It belongs to the later strand of narrative to which 10 8 is also to be assigned.

Throughout the rest of S.'s reign the highland of central Israel was practically free from Philistine invasion, although there was constant war on the border, the 'Shephelah' region, between the two peoples. S.'s rashness and fickleness and other elements of weakness in his character are revealed in such incidents as we read of in 14 18 f. and especially in 14 24-30, 43 ff.

It was in the latter half of his reign, probably after he had achieved considerable military success (14 47 f.), that his malady, a morose melancholia, developed to such an extent that means were sought to charm it away by music (16 14 ff.). Thus David was brought into contact with S., and the latter made him one of his close companions and gave him high rank in his little band of officers. But David's popularity aroused S.'s jealousy, and at last S. planned to kill him. The period between the more violent outbreak of S.'s malady and his death need not be considered very long. Five years is sufficient to meet the demands of the narrative. In those years the administration of affairs by S. must have become constantly more inefficient, and at last the Philistines saw their opportunity to strike a heavy and, as it proved, effective blow At Gilboa S. lost his life in battle with these foes against whom he had previously been uniformly successful. The best testimony to his military ability is perhaps to be found in David's lament (II S 1 22 f.).

The reign of S. accomplished much for Israel. It awoke the nation to a consciousness of its efficiency under capable leadership. It brought about a closer union between the tribes. In particular, Judah, which had been rather isolated from the rest of Israel from the Conquest, once more began to take part in the affairs common to the nation as a whole. S. was also zealous, in his way, for the national religion (14 19, 31 ff.; cf. II S 21 2). At his death Israel had no desire to return to their former loose confederacy. In these respects, S. paved the way for his abler successor David.

But S. was not an organizer. He was little more than a successful military chieftain. He had no palace, no system of government, no capital city (cf. 22 6). In such matters as these he was far inferior to David, the real founder of the monarchy.

SCARLET. See COLORS, § 2; DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, I or II, § 5.

SCEPTER: This term renders: (1) The Heb. shēbheṭ, 'rod' (Gn 49 10; Nu 24 17; Ps 125 3, "rod" AV). (2) sharbhīṭ, probably either corrupted from the Gr. skēptron or expanded from shēbhet (Est 4 11, 5 2, 8 4). (3) meḥōqēq, 'lawgiver' (Nu 21 18; Ps 60 7, "lawgiver" AV); and (4) the Gr. ῥάβδος (He 1 8). The scepter was used as an emblem of royalty among ancient peoples, e.g., the Egyptians (Zec 10 11) and the Persians (Est 4 11, etc.). It is described by Rawlinson (Anc. Mon.[2] II, 340) as "a plain rod about 5 ft. in length ornamented with a ball or apple at its upper end, and at its lower tapering nearly to a point." It was probably an adaptation either of the shepherd's staff or the warrior's spear, and symbolized the authority vested in him who bore it. A similar use is to be seen in the mace or club of northern peoples. Among the Israelites, its use as royal insignia appears at least as early as pre-exilic days (Gn 49 10; Nu 24 17; Am 1 5, 8); but, more appropriately, it is in connection with the Persian court of Xerxes (Ahasuerus) that references to the scepter and its symbolism of authority occur. A. C. Z.

SCEVA, sē'va (Σκευᾶς): The father of certain Jewish exorcists in Ephesus (Ac 19 14 f.). The text of the passage presents some difficulties, but in view of other instances of the kind found in Ac (Elymas, 13 8 f.; the Pythoness, 16 16; Simon Magus, 8 18 f.), there is no reason to question the authenticity of the passage, although it may have been derived from a source different from that of the other passages (see Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 272). J. M. T.

SCHOOL: The "school" (σχολή) of Tyrannus (Ac 19 9) was probably the lecture-room of a rhetorician, or philosopher, of that name. Some ancient texts add, after Tyrannus, "from the fifth to the tenth hour," i.e., from 11 A.M. to 4 P.M., generally used as a rest period. See TYRANNUS and cf. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller (1896), p. 270 f. See also EDUCATION, §§ 7 ff. E. E. N.

SCHOOLMASTER. See EDUCATION, § 9.

SCIENCE: The rendering of maddā', 'understanding,' 'insight' (Dn 1 4), and of γνῶσις, 'knowledge' (I Ti 6 20 AV). In the latter passage the speculative systems of those who falsely claimed to possess a higher esoteric form of knowledge are intended. S. D.

SCORN: The term represents the Heb. words: (1) la'ag, 'derision'—for barbarous habits of language (stammering) (II K 19 21; Is 37 22); (2) mishḳāq, 'pure laughter' (II Ch 30 10); (3) lūṣ, laṣōn, 'perversion,' 'distortion,' more particularly of the despising of sacred things; hence a "scorner" (Ps 1 1, "scornful" AV, "scoffers" RV) is one who sins by his contemptuous attitude toward J" (Pr 1 22, "scoffers" RV [29 8]; the term is a favorite one in Pr); (4) bāzāh, 'to despise' (Est 3 6); (5) qālaṣ, 'to scoff,' 'to mock' (Ezk 16 31). The central element in the conception is that of contempt which, however, subordinately rouses mirth. The object of scorn is always looked at as on a lower level of intelligence or power.

SCORPION. See PALESTINE, § 26; also CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (b).

SCOURGE, SCOURGING: The Heb. words so rendered are: (1) shōṭ, 'scourge,' 'whip,' for chastising (cf. "whip" I K 12 11, 14 = II Ch 10 11, 14); used in a figure of J" chastising the nations (Is 10 26, 28 15 [K^{e}thib], 18) by pestilence (Job 9 23); a figure of the 'lashing' of the tongue (Job 5 21). (2) shōṭēṭ, figuratively of the Canaanites as a source of trouble to Israel (Jos 23 13). (3) shayiṭ (Is 28 15) should be shoṭ. (4) biqqōreth (Lv 19 20) should be as RVmg., "there shall be inquisition" = judicial trial. (5) μάστιξ (LXX. for shōṭ), 'scourge,' and μαστιγοῦν, μαστίζειν, 'to scourge.' The Jews made use of a doubled strap of cowhide, with which the bared back and breast were beaten (cf. Mt 10 17, 23 34). The Roman scourge (flagellum, Gr. φραγέλλιον) was made of cords or leather thongs, attached to a handle. The cords were often knotted or had metal rings attached to them (cf. Ac 22 24 f.; Jn 19 1, etc.). The first vb. is used (He 12 6) metaphorically of God's training of men by afflictions. (6) φραγέλλιον, φραγελλοῦν, the Roman flagellum; see preceding. Jesus made one of small cords (Jn 2 15). C. S. T.

SCREECH-OWL. See PALESTINE, § 25, and NIGHT-MONSTER.

SCRIBE, SCRIBES: In the O T the term rendered "scribe" has a generic sense as the equivalent of "secretary" (ṣōphēr, 'writer' [sāphēr, Aram., Ezr 4 8, etc.], Est 3 12; Is 36 3; and perhaps 'annalist' in such passages as II S 8 17, etc.), but it is also used as a designation of a man particularly acquainted with the Law (Ezr 7 6; Neh 12 26; I Ch 2 55). In the N T the term γραμματεύς (but almost always in the pl., γραμματεῖς) means a learned person whose special field of study was the Law (Mt 2 4). Scribes in the latter sense figure in the O T uniformly as members of the priesthood. Simon the righteous was the last high priest who, according to the tradition, combined in his person the characters of the learned man and of the head of a school. After his days, side by side with the priesthood, appeared a class of men without hereditary or other connection, but drawn from among all the people, who because of their devotion to and intimate acquaintance with the Law were at once given the title of scribes. Naturally, there was from the beginning a close relationship between these and the Pharisees. In the N T this intimacy appears in the frequent conjunction of the two names (Mk 2 16; Lk 5 30; Ac 23 9). But "scribes of the Pharisees" may also be interpreted as a phrase implying that there were scribes drawn from the ranks of the Sadducees, a conclusion which is further borne out by the fact that the Sadducees as a sect were strenuous defenders of the written Law, and must have busied themselves in the study and exposition of it. Territorially, the scribes were limited to no particular section of Judaism. The synagogues of the Dispersion afforded an opportunity for the use of their learning as well as those of Palestine. Their chief occupation was the explication and casuistic application of the Law by way of oral discussion. The name "lawyer" (νομοδιδάσκαλος), though presenting a shade of difference in meaning, was almost indiscriminately applied to the scribes (Lk 5 17; Ac 5 34; I Ti 1 7), as was also the title of "rabbi" (q.v.). The scribes' familiarity with the Law led to their being given places in the judicial courts of later Judaism. In the Sanhedrin, for instance, besides the "chief priests," scribes also had seats (Mk 14 43, 15 1; Lk 22 66, 23 10; Ac 4 5). For such services, however, they received no remuneration. Consequently, they were obliged to earn their living in other ways in case they were not possessed of private means (Taylor, Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, p. 68). The scribes are rightly held responsible for the interpretations of the Law known under the general name of "tradition" (q.v.).

SCRIP. See WALLET.

SCRIPTURE, SCRIPTURES: The term "Scripture" occurs but once in the O T (Dn 10 21), where it refers to the unerring predetermination of all events in God's purpose (cf. Driver in Camb. Bible, ad loc.). In the N T these terms render γραφή or γραφαί ('writing,' 'writings'), except in II Ti 3 15, where the Gr. is ἱερὰ γράμματα, 'sacred writings,' and always refer to the writings of the O T, which were viewed by the Jews as holy and inspired. See BIBLE and OLD TESTAMENT CANON.

SCYTHIAN, sith'i-an (Σκύθης): The Scythians inhabited the regions N. of the Black Sea and the Caspian and thence E. into inner Asia. They were a people noted for their fierceness, cruelty, and injustice. Josephus says of them (Cont. Ap. II, 37) "that they take pleasure in killing men, and differ little from brute beasts." So proverbial was their character that their name was quite the equivalent of what we mean by the word "barbarian." It is with this sense, and not probably with any definite historical reference, that the term is used in Col 3 11 (cf. Gal 3 28).

J. S. R.

SEA (יָם, yām), (θάλασσα): This term is used in all its common meanings. Hence, (1) a large body of water, or the whole mass of waters in the universe taken collectively (Gn 1 10, 22 17; Ps 8 8). The sea in this sense is the inexhaustible source of all things. Monsters of evil are symbolically represented as issuing from it (Dn ch. 7; Rev chs. 12, 13, 17). (2) special seas, of which the Mediterranean, called the Great Sea, the Sea of Japho, the Sea of the Philistines (Nu 34 6; Ezr 3 7; Ex 23 31), are the most familiar. But other seas are known, such as the Red Sea (also "the Egyptian sea," Is 11 15), the Dead Sea ("the Salt Sea," Nu 34 3; "the east sea," Ezk 47 18;

"the sea of the Arabah," Dt 3 17; "sea of the plain" AV), and the Sea of Galilee ("Gennesaret," Nu 34 11; Jos 12 3; and in the Gospels, Mt 4 15; Mk 1 16; Jn 6 1). (3) Occasionally, rivers are called seas, e.g., the Nile (Is 18 2, 19 5; Nu 3 8). But whenever the term "sea" is used without qualifying clause, adjective, or other determinative, in the context, it designates the Mediterranean (Nu 33 8; Jos 24 6; II Ch 20 2). Figuratively, the sea is a sign of separation, therefore a blemish which is destined to disappear from the perfected world (Rev 21 1).

SEAL: An instrument universally employed in antiquity for purposes of identification (Neh 10 1 f.; Rev 5 8), validation (I K 21 8; Est 3 12; Jer 32 10-12; etc.), and safe-keeping (Dn 6 17; Mt 27 66; Rev 7 3). Manufactured articles were often stamped with the manufacturer's (or proprietor's) seal, e.g., the seals on jar handles found during the past ten years in great numbers in Palestine; see PEFQ. The seal usually consisted of clay or a metal of some sort, or was in the form of a signet-ring (δακτύλιος). Since both the Heb. words for seal (ḥōthām, ṭabba'ath) are borrowed (with ṭabba'ath; cf. timbu'tu of the Tell-el-Amarna letters) from the Egyptian, the practise among the Hebrews was derived probably from Egypt, where, as attested by papyri, seals were in use from very early times. See illustrations of seals under Alphabet, also of manufacturers' or owners' seals stamped on pottery on preceding page. In the N T σφραγίς and the verb σφραγίζειν are used frequently in a figurative sense to denote the Divine approval (II Ti 2 19; Jn 3 33), or promise (II Co 1 22; Eph 1 13, 4 30). Of both these ideas Christian baptism later came to be the outward sign or seal (cf. II Clem. VII, 6), just as circumcision was so viewed in the old dispensation (Ro 4 11). See also Signet. J. M. T.

Seals on Jar Handles Found in Palestine.

SEALSKIN: The word renders the Heb. taḥash (Ex 25 5, etc.; Ezk 16 10, badger AV), whose meaning is uncertain. Of the many suggestions proposed by scholars, the most probable seem to be (1) that it refers to the dugong, an animal something like the dolphin, common in the Red Sea and Indian Ocean, the skin of which is used for leather; or, (2) that the word is really the Egyptn. ṯḥs, 'leather.' This appears to be a suitable explanation. E. E. N.

SEA-MEW. See Palestine, § 25.

SEA-MONSTER: The rendering in some instances of the Heb. tannīn, an Aram. word, which is used in the O T of: (1) Large sea-animals, such as whales, etc. (Gn 1 21; cf. AV and RV); (2) serpents (no specific variety being intended—Ex 7 9 ff.; Dt 32 13; Neh 2 13; Ps 91 13); and (3) the mythological serpent, or dragon (Job 7 12; Ps 74 13, 148 7; Is 51 3; Jer 51 34; La 4 3). In the same sense the word is applied figuratively to Egypt (Is 27 1; Ezk 29 3, 32 2). On all the above-named references cf. RV with AV. See also Dragon. E. E. N.

If genuine, there are no means of attaching any definite sense to the word. A. C. Z.

SECRET, SECRETS: In most cases the occurrences of this word in the Bible demand no explanation. Even where it is used of God the meaning is generally sufficiently evident. In a few cases the original terms present some peculiarities. (1) In Job 15 11 the expression le'aṭ means 'gently' or 'in gentleness' (cf. the same word in II S 18 5, where we should read "is there a word that dealt gently with thee," so Davidson, Camb. Bible, ad loc.). (2) The term ṣōdh at times means 'assembly' or 'council' as well as 'secret' (so Gn 49 6; Job 15 8, etc.). In Am 3 7 the use of this word is very significant as revealing the prophetic consciousness. (3) In Jg 13 18 the Heb. pelī means 'wonderful' (so RV). E. E. N.

SECT. See Heresy.

SECU, SECHU, sî'kiū (שֵׂכוּ, sēkhū): A place where Saul stopped on his way from Gibeah to Ramah (I S 19 22). H. P. Smith, Int. Crit. Com., ad loc. following the LXX. (B) and others, reads "to the cistern of the threshing-floor [for "great"] which is on the height" (she'phī for sēkhū). C. S. T.

SECUNDUS, sę-cun'dus (Σεκοῦνδος): One of the representatives of the contributing churches who accompanied Paul to Jerusalem when he took his collection to the church there (Ac 20 4; cf. II Co 8 23). With Aristarchus he seems to have represented the church in Thessalonica. The name is found in CIGr. II, No. 1927. J. M. T.

SEETHE, sîdh: This term is an accurate rendering of the Heb. bāshal, 'to boil' (see FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 10, and SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 16). But in Job 41 20 and Jer 1 13 ("boiling" RV) the Heb. is nāphaḥ, 'to blow,' and refers primarily to the fire (as 'blown,' i.e., blazing) and then to the caldron as over a hot fire. E. E. N.

SEGUB, sî'gub (שְׁגוּב, sᵉgūbh): 1. The father of Jair (I Ch 2 21 f.). See JAIR. 2. The son of Hiel (I K 16 34). The original meaning of the notice here may have been that S. was sacrificed in connection with the ceremony of setting up the gates of Jericho. See also HIEL. E. E. N.

SEIR, sî'ęr (שֵׂעִיר, sᵉ'īr), 'hairy': I. The traditional ancestor of the Horites (q.v.) in Edom (Gn 36 20 f.; I Ch 1 38), but probably nothing more than the name of their country (Mt. Seir). II. 1. Seir is often used for the whole of Edom (Gn 36 30; Nu 24 18; Is 21 11, etc.), but more definitely for that part known as Mt. Seir, i.e., the mountain region that extends from near the S. end of the Dead Sea almost to the Gulf of 'Aḳabah, E. of the depression known as the Arabah (q.v.). See EDOM. 2. The name of a mountain on the N. border of Judah (Jos 15 10). Map II, E 1. E. E. N.

SEIRAH, sę-ai'rā (שְׂעִירָה, sᵉ'īrāh, Seirath AV): A town, apparently in the hill-country of Ephraim, where Ehud rallied the Israelites to fight against Moab (Jg 3 26). Site unknown. E. E. N.

SELA, SELAH, sî'lą (סֶלַע, ṣela'), 'rock'; more specifically 'crag' or 'cliff'; cf. I S 14 4: I. In only three passages do the EVV regard this term as a proper name (Is 16 1, 42 11; II K 14 7; in the last instance AV, and in Is 16, RV incorrectly add a final 'h' to the name). Other passages, such as Ob ver. 3; Jer 49 16; II Ch 25 12; Jg 1 36, in which it is barely possible to treat ṣela' as a proper name, are all doubtful. Even Is 16 1 and 42 11 are indefinite and indecisive. S. is commonly, and as the writer thinks justly, identified with Petra, the famous rock-capital of the Nabatæans, or early Arabs, since the Heb. and Gr. names both signify 'rock,' and the place is so marvelously fortified by nature as probably to have early attracted the attention of the ancient Edomites. It does not follow, however, that Petra was the capital of the Edomites as early as the time of Moses, for Bozrah more probably then held first place (Wetzstein has even suggested that Sela is another name for Bozrah; cf. Del. Jes. 696 ff.); still less probably is Petra to be identified, as Stanley supposed, with Kadesh-barnea. Petra is situated on Mt. Seir, N. of the watershed and about midway between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of 'Aḳabah. Strabo (xvi) describes it "as a city situated in a valley, decorated with gardens and fountains, but bounded on all sides by rocks." The valley in which it lies is known to the Arabs as Wâdy Mûsa. A large trapezoidal area, over half a mile square, bounded by high and richly colored sandstone rocks, in which are elaborately carved dwellings, temples, and tombs, marks the site of Petra. Its appearance is that of a vast necropolis. Numerous sanctuaries also, or 'high places,' have been found in the near vicinity; in short, no other place in all the region of Mt. Seir so perfectly satisfies what is stated in the history of the Edomites. That the aborigines of Edom were Horites (q.v.), or cave-dwellers (Dt 2 12), harmonizes exactly with the conditions as found in Petra; that David put garrisons throughout all Edom (II S 8 13, 14); that Amaziah took S. by war and called the name thereof Jokteel (II K 14 7); and that toward the end of the 4th cent. B.C. the Nabatæans made Petra their capital and richly embellished it, making it a place of refuge and the center of a rich caravan trade until about 200 A.D., when it succumbed before its rival Palmyra —all this agrees with the conditions as they most probably existed in Petra. Since the rise of Islam, Petra has lain in ruins, a fulfilment of the predictions in the O T (Ezk 35 7; Is 34 5-17; Jer 49 7-22; Ob vs. 1-10). See Libbey and Hoskins, The Jordan Valley and Petra, 1905. II. For "selah" as used in the Psalms, see PSALMS, § 5. G. L. R.

SELA-HAMMAHLEKOTH, sî''lā-ham-mā'lę-koth (סֶלַע הַמַּחְלְקוֹת, ṣela' hammaḥl·qōth), popularly from ḥālaq, 'divide,' 'rock of divisions,' as signifying the place where Saul and David or their forces parted from each other; Gesenius and others 'rock of escapes'; Oxf. Heb. Lex., 'rock of smoothness,' from ḥālaq, 'to be smooth': A rocky mountain or cliff on which Saul pursued David in the wilderness of Maon (I S 23 28). Conder locates it in the Wâdy Malâḳî, between Carmel and Maon in the S. of Judah. C. S. T.

SELEUCIA, sę-liū'shi-ą or sę-liū'si-ą (Σελευκία): The strongly fortified seaport of Antioch (cf. Ac 13 4), situated N. of the mouth of the Orontes. It was founded by Seleucus I in the territory of Pieria. Its harbor was good and in a naturally strong position. S. played a great rôle in the wars between Egypt and Syria. I. GENERAL SURVEY OF SEMITIC RELIGION.

1. Aspects of the Subject.

There are three aspects under which Semitic religion presents itself to Bible students: first, as characteristic of the Semites in general; second, as practised by Israel in common with any other Semites; third, as distinguished from the religion of the Prophets and the New Testament.

2. Official and Private Forms of Religion.

The contemporary religions prohibited in the Bible, whether we speak of them as heathen, or idolatrous, or ethnical, or tribal, may be distinguished into several kinds or classes. First of all, we must recognize the distinction between what may be called the private and the official types of religion. That is to say, there were certain objects of devotion, sometimes more crude superstitions, and sometimes of a less material character, which were not officially recognized by the heads of the community, whether civil or religious. The distinction was from one point of view virtually that between an individual, occasional, and voluntary religious service on the one hand, and a public, regular, and prescribed cult on the other. Of grosser instances in the former class we see little in the Bible, even in the O T But an example, brought before us almost casually, such as the vision of primitive beast-worship in Ezk 8 6, 12 (cf. Is 66 3, 17), is a sudden revelation of habits native to the soil of Canaan and doubtless perpetuated from earliest days alongside of the more formal rites of prescriptive or established religion, such as Baal-worship with its concomitants.

3. Persistence of the Ruder Types.

We shall have no occasion in this brief sketch to discuss these simpler and ruder forms of worship. But it must be assumed that they were practised wherever and whenever the spiritual worship of Jehovah had not eradicated them. Moreover, we must always regard them as historically underlying and conditioning the more elaborate cults which had the patronage of the state. It was in part against such primitive superstitions that the detailed prohibitions of the second commandment were issued.

4. Family Cults.

Another and a less debasing form of non-official worship was the domestic or family type, based mainly upon primitive ancestor-worship (cf. § 10 (d) and Teraphim, below). The principal occasions of collective worship, apart from the gatherings at the public, local, or national shrines, were the family or clan celebrations which, like all feasts, were of a religious character (cf. I S 20 29).

5. Native and Imported Religions.

Another important distinction is to be made between native and imported religions. By "native" is not meant indigenous, but what in any way had come to be a national usage. Thus, while the cult of Baal and Ashtoreth and that of the golden calves can hardly be said to be indigenous in Israel, they were certainly fully naturalized, and were established by usage and official sanction. On the other hand, the worship of the "sun and moon and the planets [signs of the Zodiac] and all the host of heaven" (II K 23 5) was introduced under the influence of Assyria (cf. Sun, Moon, and Stars, § 33, below), since political subjection always involved the formal acknowledgment of the gods of the suzerain, and often brought about their actual installation; so also was it with the later worship of the planet Venus (see Ashtoreth, § 14, below) under the title of the "Queen of Heaven" (Jer 44 17 ff.).

6. The Part Played by Religion.

Of peculiar significance is the part played by religion among the Semites and by the Israelites in particular. (1) To the ancient Semites religion was an essential part of every-day thought, feeling, and experience. It was not separable from any of the duties, or occupations, or sentiments of life, or even from the contemplation of external objects. The fundamental reason of this distinction between them and us moderns was that to them divinity was inherent and active everywhere and in everything. The conception of secondary or intermediary causes was to them unknown. (2) Relations with the deity accordingly comprehended all obligations, and there was no distinction or practical division between religion and morality.

Equally important were the conceptions of the relations between the god, his people, and his land:

(1) The god of the clan (an enlarged family group), who was supposed to be associated with each member by ultimate kinship, became the god of the several social and political communities into which the clan gradually developed — the tribe, the city, the state, or the nation. (2) Only less close than this relation between the tribal or national god and his people was that between the god and his land. Each productive region had its own native lord or Baal (§ 10 (b)). From it he was inseparable and inalienable. Yet he might become defunct even in his native seat. If the land became a desert or was deserted, his function ceased ipso facto. If his people were replaced or overcome, and absorbed by a more powerful people, he himself also collapsed. (3) It was almost inconceivable that a god could change his seat. Memorable were the exceptions in the case of the God of Israel. When the Hebrews occupied Canaan and long afterward, they were divided in their allegiance and devotion between the local Baals and their own Jehovah. Yet He did actually make Canaan His home instead of Mt. Sinai. Again, it was thought impossible that Jehovah could be worshiped by any of His people in exile. To "serve other gods" (I S 26 19) was equivalent to being banished from the land of Israel. Yet the exiles in Babylonia were taught that Jehovah not only could be worshiped far away from Jerusalem, but that the whole universe was His dwelling-place. (4) The deity was specially and preferably active where the prescribed rites of his worship were most duly and assiduously performed. But Jehovah has always been powerful and beneficent wherever He has been worshiped in spirit and truth.

7. The God, the People, and the Land.

What, in brief, were the origin and history of the Semitic religions? All heathen religions seem to be alike in their ultimate beliefs and motives. The immense differences between them are due to the differentiations of environment and historical vicissitude. The primary and germinal conception was that the whole world of earth, water, air, and sky was animated, every part or feature of it being the abode of life in one form or another. Evidences of life, its modes of manifestation, and by consequence its types and varieties, were presented everywhere. Its principal tokens were movement, appearance and disappearance, sound and growth. Every real cause being divine (cf. § 6, above), when the immediate occasion of any notable change in man or outward nature was not obvious, a divinity of some kind was assumed to be actively concerned. The heavenly bodies, day or night, the wind "that bloweth where it listeth," the smiling or raging sea, the ever-flowing river, the leaping mountain-brook, and the gushing fountain were all invested with the attributes of deity. All forms of fresh or sweet water, water having quickening or reviving power, were revered as divine. Trees, which grew and put forth leaves and yielded fruit from the sap within them and the moisture at their roots, were the abodes of a divinity. Rocks, from which echoes and other mysterious sounds were heard, from which living water sprang or within whose recesses it was stored, were equally animated by a deity.

8. Ultimate Origin of the Semitic Religions.

How are we to classify the various deities? They were either beneficent and kindly, or maleficent and unfriendly, or else either the one or the other, according to their uncertain or variable relations with their worshipers. Most of the divinities whose cults were well established were of the last-named order. There were individual gods of the heaven, such as the deities of the sun, the moon, and the seven planets; gods of the air, such as Rammān (Rimmon) or Hadad, the god of storms and thunder, and manifold individual gods and demons of the earth and sea and the regions below. In the highly organized pantheon of Babylonia there was one supreme god of heaven, Anu; one supreme god of the waters, Ea; one supreme god of the earth or mankind, Bel. There were also among the Semites unclassified gods of inhabited or productive lands, and gods (or demons) of the desert, gods of the highlands and gods of the lowlands (I K 28 23, 28). There were, moreover, gods proper, who were akin to men, and demons like the Arabian jinn, who were the kindred of animals, usually hostile to mankind. Demonized animals also, such as serpents and satyrs, were held in superstitious regard. There were deified men, such as the greatest of kings, and family ancestors in the realm of the shades. There were bands or communities of gods larger or smaller, such as the host of heaven of the Hebrews, or the Igigi, the heaven-gods of the Babylonians; the Babylonian Annunaki, the gods of the earth and underworld. There were distinctive gods of tribes or peoples or nations, such as Yāhweh (Jehovah) of Israel (in the popular view), Chemosh of Moab, the Syrian Baal, the Assyrian Asshur; and gods of individual cities, such as Melḳart, the Baal of Tyre, Bel of Nippur, Marduk of Babylon, and Nebo of Borsippa. Each of the highest gods, especially the celestial, had a train of divine satellites or ministers. Thus as Yāhweh had his angels or messengers (also called "sons of God" or 'Divine') against whom may be set the devil and his angels (Mt 25 41), so in the Babylonian pantheon the Igigi and Annunaki (see above) were marshaled under Anu and Ea respectively. Finally, there were goddesses and she-demons as well as gods and demons, and certain of these were assigned as consorts or mates to male divinities.

9. Classification of the Divinities.

How did the several deities and their various kinds and orders come to be instituted? The answer to this question may be stated as follows: (a) General Conditions. The fundamental principles and motives are clear enough. The mysterious life which existed everywhere was thought of as superhuman and as having power over men, and the gods were necessarily devised according to the needs of men as well as after their likeness. Now the basis and condition of human existence is society; that is, concretely the social or political unit. Hence each community, from the family group to the nation, had its own well-defined habitat, and its own god or gods; while men living in hordes had known only the demons of the wilderness.

10. Development of the Several Cults.

Confining ourselves to normal Semitic settled life, we see how natural it was that each community, united in one on the primary basis of blood-relationship, should have had its own tribal or national deity, himself the god as being the father of his people.

(b) Growth of Baal-, Stone-, and Tree-Worship. More special conceptions promoted a various development. The territory of each settlement was as well defined and self-contained as the community itself which was nourished and maintained from the hidden life of the soil. Of that life the god of the land was the guardian and communicator. He was its Baal ('owner and lord'), and of its varied bounty he gave freely to his people (Hos 2 5). The relation was perpetuated under conditions akin to those of political vassalage: for homage and tribute there were worship and sacrifice. In Canaan, where social amalgamation and political federation were difficult and rare, the local Baals retained their separate independence. In Babylonia, where consolidation began very early among the Semitic communities, most of the Baals or Bels were absorbed in the Bel of the central city Nippur. In Babylonia, moreover, and in the daughter-state Assyria, the many social, political, and cultural changes and the frequent annexation of outside states led to the installation of a crowded pantheon. Perhaps older still than the Baal cults in Palestine were stone- and tree-worship. So it came to pass that in the regular shrines on the high places at length there stood beside the altar of the Baal conventional memorials of these immemorial cults (see below, under ASHERAH, PILLAR, and TEREBINTH).

(c) Astral-Worship. The heavenly bodies were naturally much looked up to among a people whose ancestors had so great need of the moon and stars in their wilderness homes. In Palestine and Syria, however, their cult was not very greatly developed after the permanent settlements had been established. But at an even earlier date, the cultivation in Babylonia of astrology and of its daughter-science astronomy developed astral-worship to a degree elsewhere unknown in ancient or modern times. There, as it would seem, it was the chief promoter of a theory of the universe which reigned over the whole civilized world till the Copernican era. The sun was far less an object of adoration among the Semites, taken as a whole, than the moon, the god par excellence of nomads.

(d) Ancestor-Worship. To the worship of ancestors, in the broad sense of the phrase, must be assigned a great influence in the development of Semitic religion in its early stages, though much of its sentiment was transferred to kindred and more imposing objects of reverence. These, for example, were the tribal and national gods who were figured as the fathers of their people, the eponyms of the several races that were held to be more or less superhuman, such as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; renowned early patriarchs, such as Enoch and Noah; and the founders of memorable empires or dynasties, such as Sargon of Akkad or David of Jerusalem. Indications of primitive ancestor-worship are to be found in the sacredness of places hallowed by their residence, such as Bethel, Hebron, and Shechem; in funeral rites, which are largely tributes to departed spirits and are sometimes accompanied with actual offerings, and in the survival of casual expressions such as the term "god" applied to the ghost of the dead Samuel (I S 28 13).

(e) Totemism. Of totemism as a form of very early primitive superstition much less can be said positively, though many animal names borne by men, especially in Palestine and Arabia, attest its earlier prevalence, while such important tribal names as Caleb ('dog'), Simeon ('hyena,' 'wolf'), Rachel ('ewe'), Leah ('cow') suggest a combination of totemism and ancestral idealization. Like ancestor-worship, totemism is not to be reckoned as a potent factor, either in the early religion of Israel as an organized people, or in any of the dominant cults of the historical period as a whole.

II. Specific Semitic Deities and Cultus Practises.

11. Asherah.

The Heb. 'ăshērāh (pl. 'ăshērīm) is translated grove in AV after the LXX. and Vulg. In RV it is given untranslated, under the assumption that it was a proper name. It has usually been supposed to be the name of a Canaanite goddess; and, in fact, a goddess of the same name had been worshiped in Canaan and the West-land generally before the rise of Hebrew literature. Yet it is not certain that the word ever means a goddess in the Bible. In Jg 3 7, we should read 'ashtārōth (see ASHTORETH, below); and I K 18 19; II K 23 4 are perhaps interpolations. What is certain is that the 'ăshērāh was a sacred pole or post which, along with a stone pillar (see PILLAR, below), stood beside the altar of the Baals on the high places or local shrines (see § 10 (b), above, and IDOLATRY, below). That it was of wood and of considerable size we learn from Jg 6 25, 26. The natural explanation of its use is that it was a surviving emblem of the old tree-worship. It is, of course, not impossible that a tree-stem might be used both as a symbol of life (cf. § 8, above) and a representation of a life-giving goddess, and this is all the more plausible because, in fact, the old goddess Asherah was, like Ashtoreth, a type of abounding fertility. Possibly, the two names were remotely of the same origin. In later Jewish times there was frequent confusion of Asherah with Ashtoreth, and this may have been due to a traditional combination of the two divinities and even to their ultimate early Semitic identity.

12. Ashima. Ashima was a deity of the people of Hamath, on the Orontes, who had been deported to the province of Samaria by King Sargon of Assyria (II K 17 30). The name has not been met with elsewhere.

13. Ashtaroth. The word "Ashtaroth" is the plural form of the following Ashtoreth. It was used (as in Babylonian) by synecdoche for goddesses in general (Jg 2 13, 10 6; I S 7 3, 4, 12 10). By a sort of metonymy it was also used in the sense of 'offspring' in the phrase, "the increase of the flock". (Dt 7 13, 28 4, 18, 51). It occurs also as a place-name.

14. Ashtoreth. Ashtoreth. (1) The Name and Its Equivalents. This is the name of the principal Semitic goddess as it is given in the Hebrew text. The correct form is really 'ashtāreth or 'ashtart, as it appears in Phœnician, the vowels in 'ashtōreth having been made by late editors to conform to those of bōsheth ('shameful thing'), their synonym for Baal (see Baal, below).

The Greek equivalent is, accordingly, Astarte. The Babylonian Ishtar, though feminine, is without the feminine ending; it is the stem Ashtar, modified according to a phonetic rule. The S. Arabian equivalent, Athtar, was a god; but the N. Arabian and Aramaic Atar was probably a goddess.

(2) Seats of the Cult in the West-land. The cult of Ashtoreth, or Ishtar, was most widely spread among the Canaanites and the Babylonians, that is, among the most highly civilized of the more ancient Semites. She was, above all, the goddess of fertility; hence among the nomadic Arabs and the seminomadic Aramæans, who had little productive land, her worship was not so zealously promoted. She was noted as the goddess of the Phœnicians ("Sidonians," I K 11 5, 33; II K 23 13), and many inscriptions indicate her influence both in the Mediterranean coast-land and among the Syrian colonies. The Philistines had adopted her worship and maintained her temple at Ascalon. E. of the Jordan the place-names Ashtaroth and Beeshterah (q.v.) were memorials of her worship, and Ashtar-Chemosh was the dual national god of Moab in the time of King Mesha (9th cent. B.C.).

(3) Babylonian Origin of the Cult. But neither the name nor the worship of Ashtoreth-Ishtar originated in the West-land. As we shall see, the worship of the goddess assumed various forms, some of them having only her name in common; and it was in Babylonia that the beginning of the cult must have been made. Only the more popular forms were current in the West. It is vain to look to any definite locality as the place of origin. The name Ishtar (Ashtar) is Semitic, though the primary meaning is uncertain. A non-Semitic goddess (Nanā), with attributes similar to those of Ashtar, was worshiped at Erech (q.v.) in S. Babylonia, and there her cult was absorbed by that of Ishtar after the Semites came into possession.

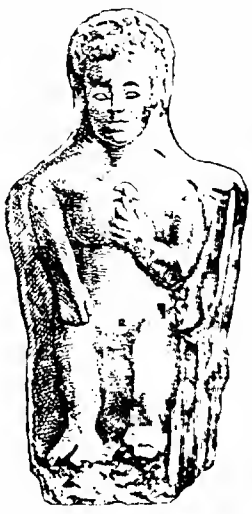
(4) Primary Motive of the Cult. Like the worship of all the favorite divinities, that of Ashtoreth-Ishtar was partly terrestrial and partly celestial in its essential grounds and motives. From the terrestrial side it made a strong appeal to the sympathy, universal in the ancient world, with the mysterious processes of life and reproduction in all forms and types of animal and vegetable life, which could be accounted for only by the assumption of a world-wide formative and impulsive power, that is, an omnipotent divinity. It was equally natural that instead of one productive deity a male and a female should be thought of or devised. In the West-land the Baal of each cultivated region (see Baal) was the native god of fertility everywhere, and through the very early predominant influence of Babylonia in the West, Ashtoreth was adopted as his feminine consort; for in Babylonia the same potent motive had already raised Ishtar to the dignity of the mother or procreatress of mankind and indeed of all living things, just as Venus, her European counterpart ((6) below), is figured in the opening of the great poem of Lucretius.



Clay figure of Astarte with a Dove.

(5) Grossness and Seductiveness of the Worship. Upon this principle rests the whole fabric of the worship of Ashtoreth along with the practical deification of the sexual passion among the ancient Semites. And it is from this point of view that the Biblical attitude toward the cult has to be regarded.

Wherever it prevailed, sexual indulgence was encouraged under the patronage of the great goddess and especially at her shrines, associated as they were with those of the Baals. Since such sentiments and practises were fatal to religion and morality, the prophets and reformers denounced them and encouraged their extirpation (II K 23 13; cf. I K 11 5, 33). An indication of their persistence is given in Ezk 8 14 (see Tammuz, below).

(6) Celestial Side of Ishtar-worship. In Babylonia the celestial side of Ishtar-worship was greatly promoted by the cultivation of astronomy and astrology. Ishtar was the beautiful planet Venus, who, as leader of the starry hosts, was actually deified as a goddess of battle by the warlike Assyrians. But it was as the queen or empress of heaven that she was especially adored; and this aspect of her character gave to the purer forms of her worship in Babylonia a dignity and depth as well as a moral and sentimental value elsewhere unknown in Asia, and paralleled only among the nobler types of Greek and Roman writers. The name of the Hellenic Aphrodite and the essentials of her cult, as well as that of the Roman Venus, were an importation from Babylonia by way of the Phœnicians and Aramæans.

(7) The Queen of Heaven. The Queen of Heaven (Jer 7 18, etc.) was not the moon-god but the Babylonian Ishtar, or Venus, and was unknown under that title in Palestine before the Chaldean era. The moon-god Sin (see Sun, Moon, and Stars, below) was a male deity, and his worship among the Semites was older than even that of Ishtar, who is therefore figured as the daughter of Sin.

15. Baal.

Baal and Baal-worship. (1) Usage of the Word "Baal." The origin and general character of Baal-worship in Palestine and the Semitic world generally have been briefly indicated (§§ 7 and 10 (b), above). Its specific relations to the people of Israel and its treatment by Bible writers remain to be dealt with.

The word ba'al means, in N. Semitic languages, an 'owner' or 'proprietor' with absolute rights. As a common noun it may mean the possessor of anything, e.g., of land, of a house, of a wife. Thus, from the notion of being owned by a ba'al or husband, it gives rise to a denominative verb meaning 'to marry.' Its use is so comprehensive that it may be employed as a mere noun of relation or quality: a 'ba'al of dreams' is a dreamer, a 'ba'al of wings' is a bird, and so forth. But its meaning of ownership is not extended to include control of another's actions. Hence in Hebrew it is not a synonym of 'ādhōn, 'lord,' or melekh, 'king.' In general, a ba'al is a proprietor of things rather than of people or persons. The conception of absolute ownership is well illustrated in the religious use of the word to connote the Divine proprietor of cultivated land, the most stable form of fixed property.

(2) Local and National Baals. It was once commonly held that Baal was the name of a distinct Canaanitic deity, but this view is more than doubtful. The facts of the case are, in brief, as follows: (a) Every organized settlement had its own Baal. (b) With the union of two or more adjacent communities into one, their Baals became also gradually consolidated. As the political union was ratified by a covenant the common object of worship might be called Baal-berith (q.v., 'B. of the Covenant'), as was the Baal of Shechem (Jg 9 4). (c) When a state became large and powerful, its Baal was unique in prestige and influence and was regarded as in a class by himself, so that Baal in this case came to be almost a proper name. Such was the Baal of Tyre, whose ordinary name we know to have been Mel-ḳart (see MOLECH (2), below). Yet even he was not called "Baal," but "the Baal," as an appellative, the primary function of the god as a local divinity being always prominent in Canaan.

(3) Baal in Compound Words. There were also proper names in which Baal was the first member of a compound. We have, e.g., Baal-Peor, who was the Baal of Mount Peor in Moab (Nu 25 1-5, etc.); also several names of places which were noted for temples erected to the local Baals, such as Baal-Hermon (Jg 3 3), called from the Baal worshiped on Mount Hermon; cf. the famous non-Biblical Baalbec. Another sort of compound is made when a local Baal became famed for a special function or attribute. Thus Baal-zebub, the 'fly-dispeller,' and Baal berith above cited. The case might seem to be different when Baal is the second member of a compound, as in Ish-Baal, 'man of Baal,' or Hannibal, 'favor of Baal.' But even here Baal is scarcely a full-fledged proper name, since it does not necessarily stand for anything more than the Baal of a certain region or city who was the patron deity of the person whose name was thus indicated in his infancy.

(4) Israel and Baal-worship. The Baal being essentially an agricultural divinity, his cult was naturally foreign historically as well as sentimentally to the worship of J" When the Israelites came to settle in Palestine they were thrown among immemorial practises and beliefs, which were native to the soil and which seemed practically inseparable from it. The example and seductions of the Canaanites, with whom they consorted and so largely amalgamated, were not the only incitements to Baal-worship. More powerful and persistent was the genius of the worship itself in its hold upon every native or naturalized Canaanite. (a) The Baals were no mere creations of idle speculation. They were in effect living symbols and agents of the reproductive powers of nature, and, therefore, their worship not only legalized but promoted sensual indulgence, especially when the cult of the female symbol Ashtoreth (see above) added its peculiar seductiveness. (b) The Baals were the supposed givers of the fruits of the soil, whereby the continuance of life itself was conditioned. The classical passage Hos 2 5 suggests with wonderful power and pathos the almost uncontrollable force of their appeal to Israel in Canaan.

(5) Baal-worship and the Religion of Jehovah. The moral and religious problems became still harder to solve when, as was inevitable, Jehovah Himself came to be regarded as one of the Baals and naturally their chief (see Hos 2 16, and the proper name, Bealiah, 'J" is Baal'). It was in the Northern Kingdom—a more agricultural country than Judah—that the struggle between Baal-worship and Jehovah-worship was keenest. Its most acute stage was reached under the dynasty of Omri, who made a league with the kingdom of Tyre. Under Ahab and his Tyrian wife Jezebel, the relation to Tyre was practically one of vassalage, and the worship of Melḳart (see below) became the court religion, with hundreds of priests and prophets and imposing ceremonies. It was introduced into Judah by Athaliah, daughter of Jezebel. In both countries it was rooted out by violent revolution (II K chs. 9–11). But the local Baals held their ground in Northern Israel till the fall of the kingdom, and in the nominal worship of J" they apparently had the greater moral influence. The evidence of the prevalence of Baal-worship in Israel is frequently obscured in the Hebrew text by later editors, who substituted bōsheth ('the shameful thing') for Baal, occasionally as a separate word, and nearly always in personal names, such as Ishbosheth and Mephibosheth.

16. Bel. Bel was the name of a great Babylonian deity, originally the same word as Baal and indicating a similar object of worship. For the development of meaning see briefly § 10 (b), above. Bel was historically the Baal of Nippur, perhaps the oldest of the great Semitic cities of Babylonia and at one time the most powerful. When Babylon came to be supreme (2250 B.C.) its bel or 'lord' Marduk (Merodach) was invested with the functions and prerogatives of this great ancient divinity, and with his name also, which was, of course, partly an honorific epithet. Hence Bel in Is ch. 46 stands for Merodach (see § 25, below).

17. Calves, Golden. Calves and Calf-worship. (1) Origin and Meaning of the Cult. Calf-images figured prominently in Israel mainly because of their use as images or symbols of J" by Jeroboam I at Bethel and Dan (I K 12 28 f.), which were denounced later by the prophets (Am 8 14; Hos 8 4 ff.) as well as by historical writers (II K 10 29; II Ch 11 14 f.). This was one of the higher forms of idolatry, well known among the Semites, in which a divinity is objectivized by an expressive symbol or a combination of symbols in an image made in the likeness of an animal (see Idol, § 24, below). It was, therefore, not Israelitic in its general conception, nor was the specific form characteristic of the Hebrews. It was not properly representative of a calf, but of a full-grown bull, and was intended to represent strength (cf. Nu 23 22, 24 8) and endurance as well as service to mankind, and was at the same time a type of the reproductive principle which the Semites regarded as one of the supreme gifts of their chief divinities (cf. Ashtoreth, § 14, above). It was really appropriate to an agricultural people, and was borrowed by the Hebrews from their Canaanitic neighbors in Palestine. While the animal image was merely a symbol of the god, it tended always to become itself the object of adoration to its votaries, and was prohibited, at least implicitly, even in the earliest legislative code (Ex 20 23, 34 17). It was the specific offense of Northern Israel, after the schism. In Judah, which was not so much exposed to purely Canaanitic influence, it seems not to have taken root. The images were normally molten, but since the precious metals were preferred, they were necessarily smaller than life-size, hence the calf instead of the bull. For local or private use they were of carved wood overlaid with gold. Possibly the calf of Samaria was of this order (Hos 8 6, where read "splinters" for "pieces").

The golden calf of Aaron (Ex ch. 32) seems to have no historical antecedents or consequents, and the narrative was probably intended as a sort of parabolic object-lesson for later conditions. There is no foundation for the once popular view that this form of worship had been learned by the Israelites in Egypt. In that country the idol was a living animal. The form of the ox in the cherubic figure (Ezk 1 5 ff., etc.) has in the main a different motive from that of the golden calf, and is more akin to the Assyrian man-bull colossi (see also CHERUBIM).

18. Chemosh. Chemosh was the name of the chief god or Baal of Moab (Nu 21 29; I K 11 7, 33; II K 3 27, 23 13; Jer 48 7, 13, 46). In Jg 11 24 he is erroneously called the god of Ammon (see Milcom, § 26 below). As a consequence of political friendship, he was apparently more than once installed in Jerusalem (I K 11 33; II K 23 13).

19. Chiun. Chiun was a deity which we find mentioned in Am 5 26 AV ("the shrine of" RV). The name should be read Kaiwān, which was the name of the planet Saturn. The Babylonian has the original form Kaimān, of which Kaiwān is a later pronunciation, also current in Arabic. The LXX. here, and also Ac 7 43, have Raiphan (Rephan RV, Remphan AV), which stands for Kaiphan (from Kaiwān).

20. Cuttings in the Flesh. In Dt 14 1 it is said: "Ye shall not cut yourselves for the dead." In Lv 19 27, 28, 21 5 (Holiness Code) the same prohibition is made with the same sanction: "For thou art a holy people to Jehovah thy God," and the same association with the dead, Lv 19 28, includes also tattooing, but does not connect it with the dead. With these passages must be considered I K 18 28, where it is said that the priests of the Tyrian Baal cut themselves while propitiating their god "after their custom." From these texts it is apparent that incisions or punctures of the flesh were made in honor either of heathen deities or of one's dead. Abundant parallels to both of these usages are found in ancient and modern times. It is reasonable to suppose that the mutilations and marks in question were made from similar motives in each class of cases. A careful collation and comparison of relevant cases make it probable that the leading motives were (1) sacrificial communion with the god or with a departed ancestor, (2) propitiation and honoring of one or the other. These two motives were, of course, originally distinct so far as the ceremony was concerned, but after it became a regularly recurring ritual, obligatory on a special occasion, the impulse to its performance was naturally more obscure and complex. Cutting oneself in ceremonies of mourning (Jer 16 6) was probably an expression of grief as well as of the enduring bond of blood-brotherhood; but it must have been encouraged by the custom of making offerings to deceased ancestors. All such practises were put under the ban in Israel by the later legislation as being inconsistent with entire devotion and consecration to J". In the ceremony of tattooing, the name of a deity was perhaps marked on the hand or arm (cf. Is 44 5). See also BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, § 7, and MOURNING AND MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 3 f.

21. Dagon. Dagon was a god worshiped at Gaza and Ashdod (Jg 16 21 ff.; I S 5 1 f.) and probably in all SW. Palestine. His name having resemblance to the words for fish (dāg) and grain (dāgān), he has been regarded by many as essentially a fish-god and by others as the god of agriculture. As his worship was not continued after the age of the Maccabees (I Mac 10 82 ff., 11 4), and no record of the ritual is extant, the question can not be definitely answered. There was a Babylonian and Assyrian deity Dagān, of which not much is known, except that he was very ancient and of a high rank among the gods. Probably, he was identical with our Dagon, and possibly, he was of Amorite (Canaanite) origin and adopted by the Babylonians. Dagān, or Dagon, occurs as one of the elements in very ancient names of persons and places in Babylonia and Palestine; and as these existed in Palestine before the Philistine invasion, Dagon was clearly an old Canaanitic divinity. The hints given in I S 5 4 in connection with the overthrow of Dagon do not favor the notion that his image resembled a fish.

22. Destiny and Fortune. Destiny was a deity to which mixed wine was offered (Is 65 11; Heb. mᵉnī, "destiny" RV, "number" AV), along with Gad, the god of Fortune. (See Gad, below.)

23. Gad. Gad was the name of the god of Fortune from which the tribal name was probably derived (Gn 30 11). In Is 65 11 propitiatory offerings are spoken of as presented to him and to Destiny, instead of to J", on Mt. Zion. Of the special shrines or rites we know nothing; but the name is found as that of a deity in Phœnician, Aramaic, Arabic, and Assyrian.

24. Images and Idolatry. Images and Image-worship. (1) Idolatry without Actual Images. There were two chief kinds of idolatrous worship. The best known, image-worship, is the second main phase, which is sometimes called 'iconic' as opposed to the (normally earlier and ruder) 'aniconic.' Everywhere there was a series of slowly evolving types of idol-worship, in which there was no man-made likeness of the sacred object. This phase had several stages, the principal being the following: 1. The cult of the deities or demons in their resorts or permanent abodes, which thus became sacred. Such, for example, were sacred mountains, streams, and groves. 2. A similar consecration of a single definite object, such as a rock, a fountain, or a tree. 3. An artificial grouping of typical objects in which the deity might reside, as in the various forms of rude stone sanctuaries. 4. The shaping of a single typical object into a conventional adjunct of worship. Such were the "pillar" (see below) and the "Asherah" (see above).

(2) Images and Their Varieties. This last-named stage or type may often have served as a transition link in the evolution of the second main phase, that of image-worship, which, however, in some of its forms doubtless also developed separately. The Hebrew name for "image" (tselem) is not confined to idols, but its application is always clear from the context. The word usually rendered "idol" in EV ('ātsābh) probably means something 'shaped' by art. Special kinds and forms of images were the "graven image" (peṣel), of wood or stone, and the "molten image" (maṣṣēkhāh). There were many other names, some of them contemptuous in their application, though often expressed in EV by the general term "idols." Of this class are "no-gods" ('ĕlīl), "abomination" (shiqqūts), "dung-god" (? gillūl). All such opprobrious epithets were applied to actual images, since material likenesses of forbidden objects were the forms of idolatry most obnoxious to the party of reform.

(3) Images of Living Objects. Such images were naturally made either in a human or in an animal likeness. Perhaps, most of those current in Israel (see, e.g., Is 2 20, 30 22) before the proscription by Josiah (II K ch. 23), and more or less till the Exile, were in human form. These, however, were intended to be not exact, but typical representations like the sculptured deities of Greece and Rome. The human shape, as distinguished from the animal, was natural, and perhaps mostly inevitable, where the motive was to give expression to the conception of the character of invisible deities by visible and tangible features. And yet, so far as we know, J" Himself was never represented in a human likeness; His supposed salient qualities were set forth symbolically in animal form in imitation of heathen cults (cf. Calves, Golden, § 17 above). The prevailing anthropomorphic tendency was possibly helped by ancestor-worship (see Teraphim, § 37 below). On the other hand, the visible, gleaming heavenly bodies were not worshiped by images and were rarely represented by symbols (see SUN, MOON, AND STARS, § 33, below). See also GREEK AND ROMAN IDOLATRY.

25. Merodach (Bab. Marduk).

Marduk was the patron deity of the city of Babylon, named along with Bel in Jer 50 2, but identical with the "Bel" of Is 46 1 (see Bel, § 16 above). He was in many points the analogue of Jupiter, both as god and planet, and played a great rôle in the Babylonian mythology and art as the successful champion of the gods, the powers of night, against the demons, the powers of darkness, and thus practically as the supposed savior of the world.

26. Milcom.

Milcom was the name of the god or Baal of the Ammonites (I K 11 5, 33; II K 23 13). In I K 11 7 read "Milcom" for "Molech," and in Jg 11 24 "Milcom" for "Chemosh." In Jer 49 1, 3, "Malcam" should be similarly corrected. The name is the word for king (malk, milk; cf. MOLECH, below) with an obscure formative ending.

27. Molech, Moloch.

Molech. (1) The God and His Worship. Molech ("Moloch" only in Ac 7 43) is the current Hebrew form of the name of a god of one of the forbidden Israelitic cults. The word should be written Melech (melekh, 'king'), of which Milcom (see § 26, above) gives the stem. The form was changed so as to suggest, by the pronunciation, the word bōsheth, the opprobrious nickname of a Baal (see § 15, above). It is always used with the article = "the king" (in I K 11 7 read "Milcom") and is so actually read in Is 30 33, 57 9. This Melech was the deity to whom children, preferably the first-born, were sometimes offered by fire in the later days of Israel. His name is usually not mentioned in connection with the words "offer by fire" (or simply "offer"), but it is always to be understood. The frequently used phrase pass through the fire should be read: "offer or dedicate by fire," literally, 'make to pass over,' or 'transfer,' that is, from the possession of the offerer to the god. This is shown by Ex 13 12, where the deity referred to is J" Himself, and there is no mention of fire. The translation "make to pass," followed by "through" instead of "by," is a wrong application of the literal meaning of the Heb., and the correct sense of "offer" was not derived from the cult of Melech. The practise is attributed to King Ahaz (II K 16 3), to Manasseh (21 6), and to the Northern Israelites (17 17), but with doubtful correctness (cf. Sun, Moon, and Stars § 33, below), and to kings or people of Judah generally (Jer 19 5, 32 35; cf. Ezk 16 21, 20 31, 23 37). It was prohibited (Dt 18 10; Lv 18 21, 20 2 ff.) and checked for a time by Josiah (II K 23 10) by the dismantling of Topheth, where the rites had been performed (cf. Is 30 33). The exact character of these rites is not known. It is certain, however, that the offering by fire was literal and personal, not symbolical and representative, though it is probable that the victims were previously slain (cf. Ps 106 37 f.).

(2) Origin and Nature of the Cult. The chief questions of importance concern the original source of the cult of the Melech and its relation to the worship of Jehovah. Satisfactory answers are not easily obtained. "King" or "the king" seems to be a common epithet of various Semitic divinities, and Milcom (see § 26, above) is the actual name of the chief god of the Ammonites. Hence "the Melech" has been thought by many to be the designation of a specific deity, either of Babylonian (Assyrian) or Canaanitic origin. This supposition probably follows the right track. But there is no sure evidence that child-sacrifice was Babylonian or Assyrian, and the practises came too late in Israel's history—see (1)—to have been derived directly from Palestine proper. It is significant that they were prominent in Phœnician (notably Carthaginian) religion, and were offered in the city of Tyre to its Baal or chief god Melḳart ("king of the city"), whose name specializes "the Melech," and in Moab as well (II K 3 27). Possibly there was a recrudescence of old Canaanite tendencies in Israel (cf. Dt 12 31) in the desperate times of national disaster, stimulated by the example of neighboring peoples. The cult was, therefore, foreign and heathenish in the eyes of the prophetic party. But the people at large seem to have regarded the Melech as a manifestation of J", somewhat as the golden calves were regarded in Northern Israel. The disclaimer of Jer 7 31, and the pathetic suggestion of Mic 6 7, may justify such an inference.

28. Nebo.

Nebo (Bab. Nabū, the 'declarer' or 'prophet'—Heb. nābhī') is named with Bēl-Marduk in Is 46 1. He was the patron deity of Borsippa, the sister-city of Babylon, and was the god of writing, literature, and science, and, consequently, the most profoundly reverenced of the Babylonian deities. Mt. "Nebo" is a witness to the long predominance of Babylonian culture and religion in the West-land up to the 17th cent. B.C.

Nergal was the patron deity of the Babylonian city of Cutha, whose exiles worshiped him in Samaria (II K 17 30). He was the analogue, in great part, of the god and planet Mars, and presided over war, hunting, pestilence, and the underworld. Nib- haz was a god of the Avvites (q.v.) in Samaria. The name has not been found elsewhere. Nisroch was the god in whose temple in Babylon Sennacherib was murdered (II K 19 37; Is 37 38). The name has not been identified. The most plausible explanation is that it has been miswritten for Marduk (see § 25, above, and cf. *KAT*³, p. 85).

29. Nergal, Nibhaz, Nisroch.

(1) Religious Usage in Hebrew. The word "pillar" is used in EV to describe several objects of a more or less pillarlike form, such as the pillar of a temple (Jg 16 25 ff.), a gravestone (II S 18 18; Gn 35 20), a pillar of cloud and of fire (Ex 13 21 f.), of smoke (Jg 20 40), of salt (Gn 19 26), a boundary-stone (Gn 31 45). As indicating an object of worship or reverence, it translates the Heb. matstsēbhāh, which RVmg. usually renders "obelisk." The same Hebrew word is also used for two of the senses of "pillar" cited above, namely, gravestone and boundary-stone. These, however, had religious associations, the one having relation to a departed spirit, the other being erected under the sanction of the deity (cf. Dt 27 17). "Pillar" in this article is, accordingly, the equivalent of this Hebrew term or its synonyms.

30. Pillar.

(2) Pillars and Beth-els. The pillar is the chief example of Canaanitic stone-worship, whose origin and tendencies have been already indicated in a general way (§§ 8, 10 (b), and 24, above) It means in the original 'a thing set upright,' and was in the first instance nothing more than an oblong, unshaped stone firmly fixed in a vertical position. Before it was erected it had been probably in most cases a beth'el ('abode of divinity'), and already an object of worship or oracular consultation. Such a development of the cult and its motive are indicated in the narrative of Gn 28 11-22. These 'beth-els' were frequent in Phœnicia and elsewhere under the same name, and may sometimes have been aerolites. The fact that the stones in the Ark of the Covenant, inscribed with the "Ten Words," were a part of the holy oracle in the Temple points to an adaptation of the primitive conception to the worship of J", parallel to the later spiritualization of the traditional story of Beth-el.

Pillars (Matstsēbhāh) from Cyprus.

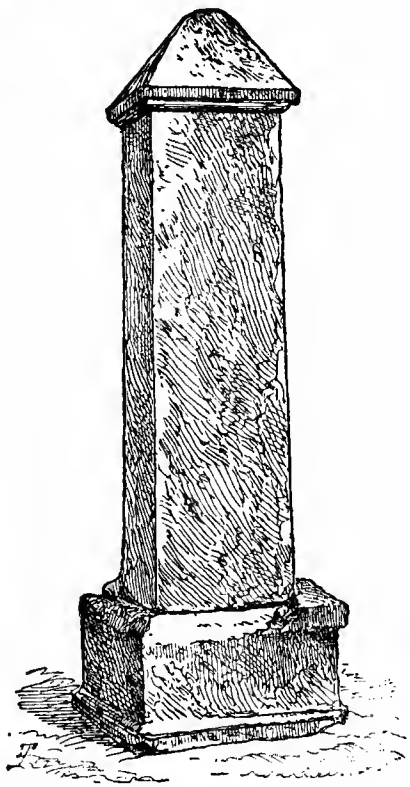
(3) Pillars as an Institution. Such pillars were made parts of permanent shrines, partly as a symbolical form of the old stone-worship, and partly as affording a natural lodging-place for the local numen or Baal. Then the stone was shaped into conventional forms, usually into that of an obelisk, if we may judge from Phœnician examples. In the consecration of such a pillar oil was poured upon the top (Gn 28 18, 31 13), perhaps as the equivalent of sacrificial fat. We thus find them introduced into the religious service of Israel, where they were maintained throughout the preprophetic period (see Ex 24 4; Jos 24 26 f.; Jg 9 6; I S 7 12; Hos 3 4). Essentially the same, though more elaborate, were the two brazen pillars (of Phœnician design) in the Temple of Solomon (I K 7 15 ff.). As assimilating the worship of Israel to heathen religions, and as out of harmony with the spiritual character of Jehovah, the pillars and other adjuncts of the popular cults were proscribed under prophetic influence.

(4) "Sun-Images." The word ḥammānīm (only in the pl.), "images" AV, "sun-images" AVmg. and RV (Lv 26 30; Is 17 8, 27 9; II Ch 14 5, 34 4, 7), were probably a variety of the "pillar" above described; but their exact character and form are uncertain. They also were to be broken up or hewn into pieces.



Rimmon was the name of the chief god of Damascus (II K 5 18). This word is found also in the personal name Tabrimmon (I K 15 18). It is the same word as Rammān, the Babylonian god of the air, of rain, of thunder and lightning. An exact synonym was Hadad (Adad), whose name occurs in several Biblical proper names as Ben-hadad, Bildad, Hadadezer, Hadarezer and Hadad-rimmon. The name and cult of Rimmon were introduced by the Babylonians into the West-land very early and united with that of Hadad, which remained locally the more popular name, though the Bible uses the more widely known designation.

31. Rimmon.

Using the expression 'serpent-worship' in its widest application, we find two main kinds of regard for the serpent, one for actual and the other for mythological animals. (1) The quick, elusive motions of the snake, its fondness for out-of-the-way lurking-places, its ubiquity, and its power to strike and instantly kill, have given it everywhere an uncanny and often a demonic character. In the Bible also it is once viewed as an instrument of J" (Am 9 3). The episode of the brazen serpent is based not upon the belief of the healing power of the serpent, for this belief was rare in Palestine, and was perhaps confined to those living in sacred springs (cf. the "dragon's well" in Neh 2 13), but upon the widespread notion that looking upon the image of a noxious creature was curative. (2) The chief mythological conception of the serpent, which played a great rôle in the whole of the ancient world and was most elaborately developed in Babylonia, is well illustrated in both the O T and N T The principal source of the myth is the personification of the raging, destructive sea, the source of storm-clouds with their thunder and serpentine lightning, and the ultimate, cause (and therefore Divine, see § 6, above) of eclipses and all other celestial obscurations. The resultant figure was the Babylonian Tiâmat (Heb. tehōm, the "deep," Gn 1 2), the original of the dragon and of leviathan or the sea-serpent. Here only the principal relevant O T passages can be cited, which naturally occur in the poetical literature: Ps 74 12-18, 89 10-12, 51 9 f.; Job 26 12 f., 7 12, 9 13; Is 27 1. The essentials of the myth were that Tiâmat, the chief of the demonic powers of disorder and confusion, rose with kindred monsters against the gods (her own offspring), the powers of light and order, and was routed and slain by Marduk (see § 25, above), their champion, who after her destruction established the permanent order of the universe, setting in the heavens the loyal powers of light and order, to regulate the times and seasons, and to guard his supremacy (cf. Gn ch. 1; and see COSMOGONY). A combination of this rôle of the dragon with the traditional conception of the enmity of the serpent toward the human race is the literary though not the religious basis of Gn ch. 3 and of the Biblical career of the personified serpent, the chosen emblem and most fitting symbol of the power of evil.

32. Serpent-Worship.

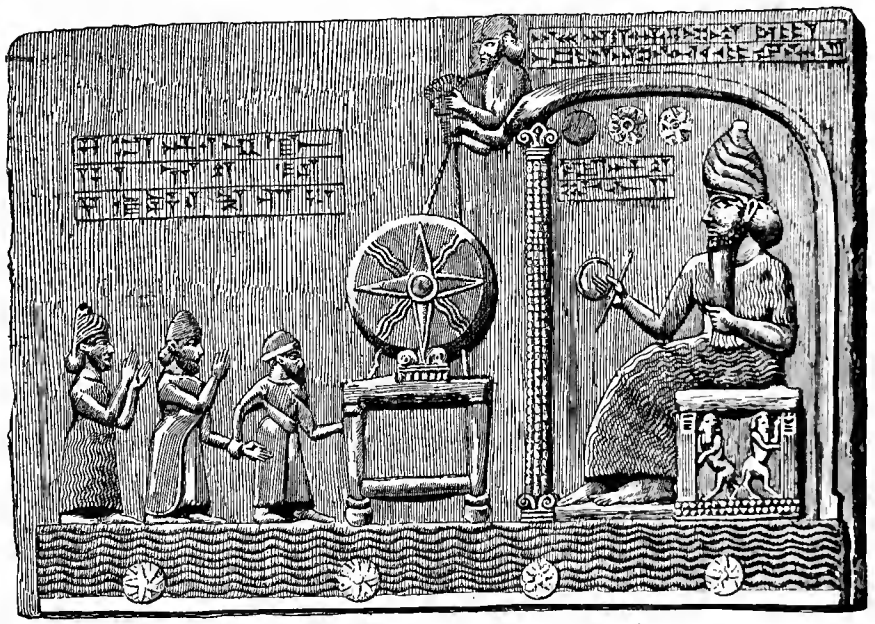
The Sun-God Shamash Entering Through the Eastern Gate of Heaven.

The Worship of the Heavenly Bodies. (1) Sun, Moon, and "Host of Heaven." In distinction from the sun and moon, the stars are often called the host of heaven. The term "host" means a well-ordered army, each soldier having his place, name, or number (Is 40 26, 45 12; Ps 147 4; Neh 9 6), and maintaining his relative position while perpetually in motion. The stars as twinkling and moving were thought, like the sun and moon, to be animated by spirits and were therefore, divine. Their comparative spirituality was promoted by the fact that they had a living radiance of their own and required no image or idol for their worship (see § 24, above), nor were they represented by symbols in Palestine as they were in Assyria and Babylonia. Generally speaking, astral-worship had little vogue in the West as compared with the East (cf. § 10 (c), above), and it was not till the supremacy of Assyria, followed by the Chaldean era, that it had much influence in Israel (cf. § 5, above). The stars there formed as a whole a sort of community or class by themselves, corresponding in the main to the Igigi or 'heaven-gods' of the Babylonians (cf. § 9, above).

33. Sun, Moon, and Stars.



A Representation of the Sun-God Shamash.

(2) Astral Cults in Israel. Northern Israel is vaguely said in 1 K 17 16 to have "worshipped all the host of heaven." This worship must have been sporadic: Am 5 26 is a late addition, and Hosea says nothing of it. The Assyrian régime there was very brief (733–722 B.C.). II K 23 12 suggests in its reference to the altars on the roof of the Temple as fitted up by Ahaz that this king had officially introduced astral-worship, with its combination of observatory and chapel after the old Babylonian fashion. Manasseh further developed the cult, one of the adjuncts being the horses and chariots of the sun (II K 23 11), which were driven in sacred processions to represent the sun's course through the heavens. After the first captivity of Judah there were men in Jerusalem who still prostrated themselves before the rising sun (Ezk 8 16).

(3) Early Sun- and Moon-Worship. Traces of very ancient sun-worship are found in the place-name Beth-shemesh (abode of the sun) and in the epical personal name Samson (Shimshōn), and of moon-worship in the name Jericho ('moon-city'). In remote Hebrew antiquity the moon played a very important part. Sin, the moon-god, the patron of wanderers and emigrants, was the chief god of Ur of the Chaldees, of Haran in N. Mesopotamia, of the Wilderness of Sin, and of Mt. Sinai, to the S. of Palestine. These places marked the limits of the wanderings of Abraham and his earliest descendants.

Representation of a Procession of the Gods in Babylonia.

The Sun, Moon, and Five Planets Carried on the Backs of (Idealized) Animals, cf. Is 46 1.

(4) The Zodiac and Planets. In the great community of the host of heaven the signs of the zodiac were the objects of special adoration and consultation (cf. the Lat. considero and contemplor). In the Babylonian religion and science they held a controlling place. They were worshiped under Manasseh by the name mazzalōth (II K 23 5, "planets" AV, Bab. "stations," i.e., of the sun in his yearly course, the "Mazzarōth" of Job 38 32). See illustrations of ancient Babylonian representations of these with the art. Cosmogony. For the planet-gods named in the O T see above under Ashtoreth, Merodach, Nebo, and Nergal. In Babylonia the images of these divinities were frequently carried about in religious processions (cf. the taunting reference to this in Is 46 1 f., and the accompanying illustration).

(5) How the Bible regards the Heavenly Bodies. All astral-worship was forbidden in the prophetic legislation (Dt 4 19, etc.); and its various adjuncts, along with those of the Baal-worship of the high places, were destroyed by Josiah (II K ch. 23). This does not imply, however, that the popular belief in the animation of the heavenly bodies ceased to be shared. As the heavenly host of J", they were among His messengers or "angels," and as Divine in essence, they were Sons of God (see Job 38 7; I K 22 19; Dn 8 10 ff.; Ps 103 21; cf. Gn 1 14 ff. and (1), above). In Is 24 21, 34 4, however, they appear as objects of heathen worship, though with angelic attributes.

Tamarisk is the correct rendering of the Heb. 'ēshel ("grove" or "tree" AV). It is a large tree-like shrub, its branches covered with fine scales for leaves. It was viewed as a sacred tree, marking a shrine (Gn 21 33), a burial-place (I S 31 13), and also a place of council (I S 22 6).

34. Tamarisk.

Among the heathen rites practised in the Temple at Jerusalem as seen by Ezekiel (ch. 8) was the vision of "women weeping for Tammuz" (ver. 14). Tammuz was a Babylonian god (originally non-Semitic) of vegetation. He was thus closely allied with Ishtar (Ashtoreth; cf. § 13, above), the goddess of fertility (sometimes figured as her husband, sometimes as her son), and is thus practically the god of productiveness. After the passing of the summer solstice, vegetation begins to decay, and Tammuz retires to the underworld. Thither he is followed by Ishtar, who would bring him back to the world which he has left loveless and desolate. This is the theme of a famous Babylonian poem usually known as the "Descent of Ishtar" (to the underworld). The fourth Babylonian month was hence called Tammuz (July), and the sixth (Elul) was known as that of "the mission of Ishtar" (September). The weeping for Tammuz was a lamentation by women throughout the north-Semitic world, and the myth of Tammuz and Ishtar was carried to Greece and Rome under the guise of Adonis (='ādhōnay, 'my lord') and Aphrodite, or Venus.

35. Tammuz.

Tartak was a god of the Avvites in post-exilic Samaria (II K 17 31). He has not yet been identified.

36. Tartak.

The word "teraphim" is so transcribed from the Hebrew in RV regularly, as also sometimes in AV. The word denotes a species of household god or idol, mostly with a plural sense, corresponding to the Heb. form, but in I S 19 13, 16 used of a single image. The teraphim are by many thought to have been images of the family ancestors (cf. § 10 (d) above). This is not impossible, but there is no direct evidence for it. They play a part in the story of Jacob and his Aramæan wives, Rachel having stolen away the teraphim of her father, Laban, before her flight to Canaan (Gn 31 19 ff.), and the Danites took those of Micah with them to their northern settlement (Jg 17 5, 18 17 f.). They would thus seem to have had at least some tribal significance. They are condemned in I S 15 23. But they appear to have been used as a matter of course in the time of David (I S 19 13, 16), and Hos 3 4 speaks of them as inseparable from the offices of religion. They were, perhaps, not entirely proscribed till the time of Josiah (II K 23 24). The fact that, like the ephod (q.v.), they were consulted in divination (II K 23 24; Ezk 21 21; Zec 10 2), and their prevailing domestic or private cultivation (§ 2, above) may account largely for their comparative immunity.

37. Teraphim.

The terebinth was, apparently, the chief sacred tree of the early Hebrews and other Semitic peoples. According to prevailing recent opinion, it answers to the Heb. 'ēl, 'ēlā, and 'ēlōn, while "oak," by which these Heb. words are always rendered by AV and RV, except in Is 6 13 ("teil-tree" AV) and Hos 4 13 ("elm" AV), would correspond to 'allōn. It has been plausibly maintained, however, that these distinctions do not exist, and that the O T uses them all in the sense of "sacred tree." In any case it is clear that most of the sacred trees were terebinths and not oaks. The two trees are quite distinct botanically, but the former is less common and lives to a greater age. It has a thick trunk, long branches, and abundant foliage (II S 18 9), and is deciduous (cf. Is 1 30). There is no reason why the oak should not have been (like the tamarisk; cf. § 34, above) sacred in certain cases. Either tree gives ample shade and shelter, and would make a good gathering-place, but the terebinth being rarer, and perhaps more striking in appearance, would be a better landmark; cf. "the valley of Elah," possibly named from some imposing specimen.

38. Terebinth.

Sacred trees were in vogue up to the days of the kingdom. The living spirit within them (cf. § 8, above) communicated the will of the deity, as did the 'terebinth of Moreh' (=“teacher" or "director," Gn 12 6; Dt 11 30); the 'terebinth of soothsayers' (Jg 9 37; cf. RVmg.), especially when the wind whispered in the branches (II S 5 24). For other suggestive instances see Gn 35 4; Jos 24 26; I K 13 14. The later prophetic movement aimed to abolish all forms and customs of tree-worship, especially on account of the licentious practises which it promoted. See Is 1 29, 57 5; Hos 4 13; Ezk 6 13 (cf. also Asherah, § 11, above).

In I Ch 5 23 it is mentioned as one of the boundaries of Manasseh, E. of the Jordan, and was noted for its fir-trees (Ezk 27 5). C. S. T.

SENNACHERIB, sen-nak'ę-rib or sên''na-kê'rib (סַנְחֵרִיב, sanḥērībh); Assyrian, Sin-aḥe-erba, 'the god Sin has increased brothers'): The king of Assyria, 705–681 B.C. His accession dates from the death of his father, Sargon II, on the 12th of the month Ab, 705. This change of rulers was a conventional signal for rebellion among the subjects of the empire. The first campaign of S. was made against the recalcitrant Chaldean Merodach-baladan (q.v.), who had once more, on the death of Sargon, seized the throne of Babylon. He fled for his life on the approach of the Assyrian army, and Sennacherib put on the throne Bel-ibni. After chastising the Kossæans and the people of Ellipi, he turned his attention to his rebellious subjects in the western provinces. Hezekiah, King of Judah, the cities of Ashkelon and Ekron of Philistia, together with most of the cities on the E. coast of the Mediterranean, likewise had seceded from their master, the king of Assyria. S. in 701 directed his first blows against the cities of the Phœnician coast. All were plundered except Tyre, whose king, Elulæus, fled to the island of Cyprus, and Ethbaal was made king of local Phœnicia. On southward along the coast the apparently invincible hosts poured. Neighboring peoples hastened to assure S. of their submission by sending tribute. Among these names we find Ammon, Moab, Edom, and the Philistine city Ashdod. The first coast and Philistine cities to feel the effect of his campaign were Joppa, Beth-dagon, and Ashkelon, which soon fell. When S. reached Lachish, Hezekiah (according to II K 18 14-16) acknowledged his rebellion and attempted to buy him off. The price of submission was set at 300 talents of silver and 30 talents of gold. This was paid, it appears, at once. Instead of satisfying the Assyrian king, it seems to have aroused his cupidity, and he sent an embassy to demand the surrender of the Judæan capital, doubtless in his mind the depository of great wealth. Probably, during the same time, though the chronological order of events is uncertain, an army raided the country and fortresses of Judæa, capturing forty-six of its strongholds and 200,150 of its population. The city of Lachish fell before the battering-rams of the Assyrian army prior to the return of the embassy from Jerusalem. Libnah was now the object of their attacks (according to II K 19 8). While Ekron was being besieged, S. heard of the advance of Hezekiah's Egyptian ally, Tirhakah the Ethiopian, with a great army. Simultaneously, apparently, he despatched another embassy to demand the surrender of Jerusalem, and raised the siege of Ekron. He seems to have gathered all his troops to crush the oncoming Egyptians. The two armies met at Eltekeh (Assyrian, Al-ta-ku-u), a city located, according to the Pal. Expl. Fund, on the SW edge of Judah. S. claims to have been victorious, though he did not follow up any advantage, which a decided victory would have given him, by invading Egypt. The city of Ekron was again besieged, and its king, Padi, who had been imprisoned in Jerusalem, was restored to his throne. The close of the campaign of S. is veiled in obscurity. What he did after the capture of Ekron, the punishment of its rebels, and the restoration of its dethroned king no one can certainly tell. In his annals, S. locates at this point his punishment of Hezekiah, his raiding of the country of Judah, and his disposition of the territory and cities of Judah. This arrangement seems to be a screen to cover up something which he does not wish to mention; for the payment of tribute by Hezekiah, which the Book of II Kings (18 14) places at the very beginning of the campaign, S.'s own annals claim to have been made at Nineveh. The annals of S. read as follows regarding Hezekiah: "As for Hezekiah himself, like a bird in a cage, in Jerusalem, his royal city, I shut him up. I threw up forts against him, and whoever would come out of the gate of the city I turned back." Following this, we find a long list of tribute that he claims was delivered at Nineveh, accompanied by a special ambassador, whose function was to render homage to his majesty. It is at least significant that we have no specific information that S. ever made another campaign to the West, though he ruled over Assyria for twenty years.

During those last years, S.'s attention was confined to Babylonia, Elam, and Nineveh. His administration of Babylonia carried with it a partial chastisement of the Elamites, a defeat of the Chaldeans, and a revengeful destruction of the city of Babylon (in 689). During the last eight years of peace he built for himself at Nineveh, on the site of the modern mound Kuyunjik, a great palace, 1,500 ft. long by 700 ft. wide, amply supplied with gorgeous halls, courts, and rooms of state. At the modern mound Nebi-Yunus he restored another palace. Nineveh itself he rebeautified, made its aqueducts more serviceable, its walls more impregnable, and its position as capital of the empire more glorious (see NINEVEH). But his long reign was not marked by the exercise of large generosity, or humane treatment of subjects. His inhumanity on numerous occasions yielded its full fruition in his own murder while worshiping at the shrine of his god Nisroch (Nusku), by his two sons Adrammelech and Sharezer (II K 19 37). The Babylonian Chronicle mentions only one assassin. Neither of these two sons succeeded him on the throne. The conclusion of this revolution, for such it seems to have been, was that these murderers fled to Armenia, and within five months Esarhaddon was seated on the throne as his father's successor. I. SENSUAL: The rendering of ψυχικός, 'belonging to the animal life' (ψυχή), possessed alike by man and brute. It signifies the condition of being under the influence of the passions and appetites, and not of the Spirit of God (Ja 3 15; Jude ver. 19). S. D.

SENUAH, sę-niū'ā. See HASSENUAH.

SEORIM, sę-ō'rim (שְׂעֹרִים, śe'ōrīm): The ancestral head of the fourth course of priests (I Ch 24 8). E. E. N.

SEPARATE, SEPARATION: Where these terms are used in a technical significance they have reference to religious ideas, either of ceremonial purity, which required the "separation" of the ceremonially unclean, or of complete dedication, or "separation," to the service of Jehovah. Such ideas found expression mainly in the laws concerning purification (q.v.), the Nazirites (q.v.), and in the regulations concerning the priesthood (q.v.). E. E. N.

SEPHAR, sī'fār (סְפָר, ṣephār): A place given (Gn 10 30) as a boundary of the territory of the Joktanites. It is usually identified with Ẓafār, either the capital of the Himyarites in SW Arabia or a port-city in the eastern part of Ḥaḍramaut. C. S. T.

SEPHARAD, sef'a-rad (סְפָרַד, ṣephāradh, or סְפָרֵד, ṣephārēdh): The residence of exiles from Jerusalem (Ob 20, if the text is not corrupt, as Wellhausen, Nowack, and others claim). Formerly identified with Saparda in SW. Media; now by many with Sparda (=Sardis?) in Asia Minor; the Cparda of the Persian cuneiform (cf. Winckler, *KAT*³, 301). C. S. T.

SEPHARVAIM, sef"ār-vê'im (סְפַרְוַיִם, ṣepharwayim): A city from which colonists were deported to Samaria by the king of Assyria (II K 17 24, 31). It was probably the Babylonian Sippara, between the Tigris and the Euphrates, as two other Babylonian cities, Babylon and Cuthah, are mentioned. Avva and Hamath, two Syrian cities, are probably insertions from II K 19 13. A city of the same name, which was conquered by the Assyrians (II K 18 34 = Is 36 19; II K 19 13 = Is 37 13), would be too near Samaria. This latter is probably a Syrian city, Shabarain, between Hamath and Damascus, as it is mentioned with other cities of N. Syria. C. S. T.

SEPHARVITE, sĭf'ar-vait: An inhabitant of Sepharvaim (q.v.) in Babylonia (II K 17 31). C. S. T.

SEPTUAGINT, sep'tiu-a-jint. See VERSIONS OF THE O T.

SEPULCHER. See BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, § 5.

SEPULCHER OF DAVID. See JERUSALEM, § 24.

SERAH, sĭ'rā (שֶׂרַח, serah): A "daughter" (probably a clan) of Asher (Gn 46 17; Nu 26 46, Sarah AV; I Ch 7 30). E. E. N.

SERAIAH, sẹ-rê'yā (שְׂרָיָה, serāyāh[ū] [Jer 36 26]), 'J" persisteth': 1. A scribe ("secretary" RVmg.) of David (II S 8 17; cf. 20 25, "Sheva"; I K 4 3, "Shisha"; I Ch 18 16, "Shavsha"). 2. A chief priest in the time of Zedekiah. He was taken before the king of Babylon at Riblah and put to death (II K 25 18 = Jer 52 24; I Ch 6 14 [5 40]; probably an ancestor, but not the father of Ezra [Ezr 7 1]). 3. A son of Tanhumeth the Netophathite, and captain of one of the bands which had not been taken by Nebuchadrezzar (Jer 40 8). He came with other captains and their men to Gedaliah, who had been appointed governor of Judæa, and was advised to submit (II K 25 23 = Jer 40 8). 4. A brother of Baruch and an officer of Zedekiah. He accompained the king to Babylon in the fourth year of his reign and carried Jeremiah's prophecy against Babylon (Jer 51 59, 61); possibly the same as the preceding. 5. A son of Kenaz (I Ch 4 13, 14). 6. A Simeonite (I Ch 4 35). 7. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem (Ezr 2 2, 12 1, 12). 8. One who sealed the covenant (Neh 10 2 [3]). 9. A priest (Neh 11 11), perhaps the same as 6. 10. An officer of King Jehoiakim, ordered by him to take Baruch and Jeremiah (Jer 36 26). C. S. T.

SERAPHIM, ser'a-fim (שְׂרָפִים, serāphīm, only in pl.): Angelic, six-winged forms, represented (Is 6 2) as ministering with worship (Is 6 3) and other service (ver. 5) in the presence of J" Their figure has been connected with the serpent-like beings of Oriental mythology (Assyr. Sarrapu [the god Nergal, according to Del. Wörterb.], and Egyptian Serref [guardian griffins]). It has also been derived from the serpentine movement of lightning ("flying serpents," Is 14 29; burning or fiery serpents, Is 30 6). But in Isaiah's inaugural vision they can be nothing else than symbolical human figures expressing the idea of ardent devotion to God. In Eth. En. 61 10 they appear with the cherubim and ophanim as guardians of the throne of God. A. C. Z.

SERED, sĭ'red (סֶרֶד, ṣeredh): The ancestral head of a clan of Asher (Gn 46 14), the Seredites (Nu 26 26, Sardite AV). E. E. N.

SERGIUS PAULUS, sẹr'ji-us pō'lus. See PAULUS, SERGIUS.

SERJEANT (ῥαβδοῦχος, the Gr. equivalent of the Roman lictor): Two lictors attended each pretor (στρατηγός, "magistrate," Ac 16 22, 35). After the time of Alexander the Great the στρατηγός was the chief civil magistrate, while the leader of the troops was the ἡγεμών. In times of peace the lictors cleared the street before the pretor and enabled him to execute his sentences. As to the pretor, Luke hesitates between the Greek and Latin appellations, using the common Gr. term ἄρχοντες in Ac 16 19, ("rulers" EVV), and στρατηγοί, the Gr. equivalent of the Lat. prætores, in Ac 16 20, 22, 35, 38 ("prætors" RVmg., "magistrates" EVV). In both cases the pretors are meant. J. R. S. S.

The name "Sermon on the Mount" has been given to Mt 5 1–7 29, at least since the date of the commentary by St. Augustine (394), entitled De sermone domini in monte (Eng. Transl. in Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers). The name presupposes that the chapters are a report of a single discourse spoken at a definite place which since the 13th cent. has been commonly identified with the double-peaked "horns of Hattin" (Karn Ḥaṭṭin), a hill 60 ft. high, two hours west of Tiberias. In fact, however, "the mountain" (Mt 5 1) denotes the high plateau-country of Galilee, in distinction from the lowland on the shore of the lake (Mk 3 13, 6 46; Mt 14 23, 15 29, Lk 6 12; Jn 6 3, 15; cf. Gn 19 17, 19, 30, 31 23, 25). To the Sermon on the 'Mount' in Mt corresponds the discourse reported in Lk 6 20–7 1, which is represented as spoken "on a level place" (6 17) in the hill-country (6 12). The erroneous rendering of the AV "in the plain" (6 17) has caused the discourse in Lk to be often termed "the Sermon on the Plain."

1. Introductory.

Modern study of the contents of the two discourses in the light of current views of the Synoptic problem leads to the conclusion that the sermon in Mt is, at any rate in large measure, a compilation of sayings of Jesus, originally remembered out of connection, and gradually collected and massed in the present elaborate composition. As evidence for this should be studied: (1) The many parallels in Lk scattered in wholly different connections; (2) the internal analysis of the discourse itself (e.g., cf. Mt 5 21-26, 6 5-15, 7 1-12); (3) the analogy of such a collection as Mt 10 5-42 (cf. Lk 9 2-6 = Mk 6 8-13; Lk 10 3-12; and other parallels in Lk) or Mt 23 1-39 (cf. Lk 11 37-52, 13 34-35, 20 45-47 = Mk 12 38-40). Similar considerations with regard to the sermon in Lk are probably sufficient to justify the same conclusion there.

A satisfactory answer to the many questions of literary and historical criticism raised in trying to understand the meaning, structure, and probable origin of the Sermon on the Mount would go far to solve the great and complicated problem of the history of the Synoptic tradition of our Lord's sayings before its codification in our Gospels. See GOSPEL, GOSPELS. The view underlying the present article will be found stated below (§ 6).

2. Position in Mt.

In Mt the sayings of Jesus which were not remembered as part of a conversation are chiefly presented in a series of long discourses relating to well-defined topics. Thus:

Chs. 5–7. (Sermon on the Mount.) The life of a disciple.
Ch. 10 5-42. Precepts to disciples for mission work.
Ch. 11 2-19. Sayings about John the Baptist.
Ch. 13 1-52. Seven parables on growth and the Kingdom.
Ch. 18. Principles and precepts for community life.
Ch. 23. Polemic against scribes and Pharisees.
Chs. 24–25. Apocalyptic discourse and parables.

Note how Mt has expressly called attention to this arrangement by his uniform concluding formula, 7 28 (cf. Lk 7 1), 11 1, 13 53, 19 1, 26 1. See MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF.

The place of each of these discourses in the order of Mt's Gospel is partly determined by Mt's own plan for treating successive topics, partly by the occurrence of something in Mk (on whose sequence Mt was largely dependent) to which the additional material of Mt could be attached (thus cf. in contents and position Mt 13 1-53 and Mk 4 1-34; Mt 18 1-35 and Mk 9 33-50; Mt 23 1-39 and Mk 12 38-40; Mt 24 1-51, 25 1-46 and Mk 13 1-37).

The Sermon on the Mount probably owes its position as the first of these long discourses to the fundamental significance of its topic.

3. Position in Lk.

In Lk, unlike Mt, the sayings of Jesus are not systematically arranged in large masses. Only the beginnings of the working of this tendency can be traced (e.g., Lk 12 13-34, 54-59, 14 1-24, 15 1-32); so far as possible (i.e., nearly everywhere excepting in 6 20–8 3 and 9 51–18 14) Lk follows the sequence in which Mk had arranged his material.

In the present case the author of Lk for some reason, probably because he found it so in his source, associated the sermon with the choice of the Apostles and with the mention of throngs attendant upon the Galilean preaching. Accordingly, he introduces it (6 20-49) at the point where in following Mk he found both of these mentioned (Mk 3 7-19).

4. Contents of the Sermon in Mt.

The general theme is "The Life of a Disciple." It is treated with reference to various aspects, both moral and religious, so that the titles often given, such as "The New Torah," "The Righteousness of the Kingdom," "The Relation of Jesus' Teaching to the Teaching and Practise of the Pharisees," are too specific and narrow.

I. The Beatitudes, 5 3-12, all in the same form (cf. Ps 1 1, 41 1, 65 4—formula of congratulation, not of blessing) fall into three groups of essentially different character:

(a) i–iv (vs. 3-6), paradoxical beatitudes, explaining who are most likely to respond to Jesus' call to discipleship, viz., the people of the humble ranks of life, the lower classes, "the poor in spirit" (i.e., those whose spirit is that of the 'poor'), "the sad," "the lowly" (EV "meek"), "they that hunger and thirst after righteousness" (i.e., those who, being in a famine of righteousness, have none to boast of). The phrases all describe the same class of persons in various ways (cf. Lk 18 9-14, the Pharisee and the publican).

(b) v–vii (vs. 7-9), emphasizing three traits of character which the disciple must foster—mercifulness, purity of heart (i.e., freedom from evil purposes), peaceableness.

(c) viii, ix (vs. 10-12), comfort for the disciple's hardships.

II. Salt and Light, 5 13-16; the duties of the disciples to the world, viz., to season and to illuminate.

III. The Righteousness of the True Disciple, 5 17–6 18.

A. The rigor of Jesus' requirements (5 17-20).

Mt 5 17-19 is held by many to be a Jewish-Christian addition, not a genuine utterance of Jesus. But cf. Mt 23 2-3. In fact, the excision even of 5 18 is required neither by Mk 7 18-19 nor by any other utterance of Jesus. He taught that the non-moral is not morally significant either in a positive or negative way, but did not in consequence of that find it necessary to break with the Law of his people. The contrasts of Mt 5 21-48 are not criticisms of the Law of Moses, but intensified applications of its underlying principles; cf. Mk 10 5.

B. (5 21-48) Jesus' ideals of moral conduct in their contrast with the necessarily lax requirements of public law and legal administration.

1. Anger, vs. 21-26.

(a) Not merely murder but anger wrong, vs. 21-22.

(b) Reconciliation to brother man more important than formal worship of God, vs. 23, 24.

(c) Prudence dictates concessions, vs. 25, 26.

2. Licentious passion, vs. 27-30.

(a) Not merely adultery but lustful desire wrong, vs. 27, 28.

(b) Any deprivation whatever is better than to commit sin, vs. 29, 30.

3. Divorce, vs. 31, 32.

All divorce, except for fornication, is wrong.

4. Oaths and truthfulness, vs. 33-37.

(a) Not merely false swearing wrong, but the disciple must be so truthful as to need no oath, vs. 33, 34a, 37.

(b) All oaths equally binding, vs. 34b-36.

5. Revenge, vs. 38-42.

(a) Not merely the excessive revenge which the Law forbade, but any indulgence of revengeful impulse wrong; illustrated by cases of (1) personal violence, (2) oppression by legal process, (3) impressment to service, vs. 38-41.

(b) Kindred precept on generous giving, ver. 42.

6. Universal range of good-will, vs. 43-48.

The disciple must not merely love his friends, as the heathen do, but his enemies, with the perfect inclusiveness of God.

C. Jesus' ideals of religious practise, in their contrast with prevalent abuses, 6 1-18.

"Righteousness," used in 5 20 in the sense of right conduct generally, has in 6 1 the narrower sense of pious exercises. Almsgiving, prayer, and fasting were the three chief pious habits of the Pharisees.

1. General principle; pious exercise must be free from ostentation, ver. 1. This is illustrated by

2. Almsgiving, vs. 2-4. No almsgiving for show before men.

3. Prayer, vs. 5-15.

(a) No prayer for show before men, vs. 5, 6.

(b) Prayers to be made with rational intelligence and with brevity, vs. 7, 8.

(c) A model prayer, vs. 9-13.

(d) God's forgiveness conditioned by ours.

4. Fasting, vs. 16-18.

No fasting for show before men.

IV The True Disciple's Complete Devotion to God, 6 19-34.

A. Single-hearted devotion to God's service the true aim of life, vs. 19-24.

(a) Heavenly treasure alone permanent, vs. 19-21.

(b) Parable of the inner light, vs. 22, 23.

As in the case of the eye, which is the lamp of the body through which light enters, so the center of illumination of the soul (viz., the 'heart,' with its thoughts and purposes) must be a clear medium for God's light, or else the soul is in darkness.

(c) Only one master possible, ver. 24.

B. Single-hearted trust in God's fatherly care a duty; to be concerned about food and raiment is to fail in devotion to God and God's Kingdom, vs. 25-34.

V. The Disciple's Attitude Toward Men and Toward God, 7 1-12.

A. Toward men; precepts against self-righteous arrogance, vs. 1-6.

(a) Against arrogant censoriousness, vs. 1, 2.

(b) Against looking at others' faults, ver. 3.

(c) Against officiously attempting to improve others, vs. 4, 5.

(d) Ironical warning against officiousness, ver. 6.

This is often understood seriously as a direct precept against wasteful effort.

B. Toward God; prayer, vs. 7-11.

C. The Golden Rule as containing the sum total of right conduct, ver. 12.

VI. The Necessity of Moral Effort, Good Conduct, Obedience to Jesus' Words, vs. 13-27.

A. The two ways, vs. 13, 14.

B. Fruits the only test, vs. 15-20.

C. Not profession but practise will secure entrance into the Kingdom, vs. 21-23.

D. Concluding parable; not hearing Jesus' words but doing them brings security, vs. 24-27.

The shorter sermon of Lk may be analyzed as follows:

I. The Beatitudes and Woes, 6 20-26.

5. Contents of the Sermon in Lk.

A. Comfort for the poor, the hungry, the sad, the persecuted, in their (temporary) wretchedness, vs. 20-23.

B. Warning to the prosperous, since their prosperity is only temporary (cf. Lk 12 15-21).

II. The Characteristics of the Disciple's Attitude, 6 27-38.

A. Universal range of the disciple's love, vs. 27, 28.

B. The disciple's character manifested in submission to personal violence and robbery, and in generous giving, vs. 29, 30.

C. The Golden Rule, ver. 31.

D. Universal range of love and beneficence, vs. 32-35.

E. The disciple must be merciful, avoid censoriousness, show a forgiving spirit, and act generously, vs. 36-38.

III. Good Character and Conduct Requisite, 6 39-49.

A. For the disciple who would guide and improve others, vs. 39-42.

B. Because source and product correspond, vs. 43-45.

C. Concluding parable; not hearing Jesus' words but doing them brings security, vs. 46-49.

A comparison of the contents of the two forms of the Sermon on the Mount shows the same general theme, and many of the same precepts arranged in the same general order. The resemblances between Mt 5 11, 12 and Lk 6 22, 23 point clearly to a common source, probably written. Of the material in Lk only 6 24-26, 27b, 28a, 38a, 39-40, 45 are not found, exactly or for substance, in the sermon in Mt.

6. Comparison of the Two Forms.

There are, however, marked differences. Mt is much more systematic than Lk, and follows a more definite unifying idea in the several paragraphs and in the whole. The setting of some of the precepts gives them a very different bearing in the two sermons (cf. Mt 5 6 with Lk 6 21a; Mt 5 39 with Lk 6 29). Mt is mainly occupied with the manifold contrast of Jesus and the Pharisees, and is full of local Palestinian allusions and color; while with Lk the kernel of the whole is the general principle of universal love, the precepts are put in such form as to be generally applicable, and the conditions presupposed are rather those of the Christian world at large than of Palestine. In both Mt and Lk the traces of editorial work can be detected; each form corresponds closely with the general character of the Gospel in which it stands. Especially noteworthy is the fact that much of the material of the elaborate composition in Mt is found scattered in disconnected sections of Lk, chiefly in chs. 11 and 12. For these facts in detail reference must be had to a harmony of the Gospels.

On the whole, the facts seem best accounted for by supposing a written source containing a sermon shorter than that in Mt, but longer than that in Lk. The form in Mt then gives a better idea than that in Lk of the source, but has been much elaborated and expanded by the addition of cognate material. The original collection, which would seem to have been already represented in the source as a sermon spoken in "the mountain district," "to the disciples" on a definite occasion, must have contained at least the following parts:

Four beatitudes, Mt 5 3, 4, 6, 11, 12; Lk 6 20-23.

Prohibition of revenge, Mt 5 38-42; Lk 6 29, 30.

Universal love, Mt 5 43-48; Lk 6 27, 28, 32-36.

Against self-righteous arrogance, Mt 7 1-5; Lk 6 37-42.

Golden Rule, Mt 7 12; Lk 6 31.

Requirement of moral effort, fruits, obedience, Mt 7 16-27; Lk 6 43-49.

It probably also contained other parts of what is now Mt 5 21-48, and perhaps much more besides.

The characteristics of the sermon in Mt, as already briefly indicated, give good grounds for believing it to represent, in the main, more accurately than does that in Lk, the original forms of the sayings which it contains. The greater "spirituality" sometimes claimed for the form in Lk, from which greater originality is inferred, is in reality only the more general and less pungent quality of the sayings in Lk due to the interest of the evangelist in making them intelligible and readily applicable to his Gentile readers.

Whether this original sermon was a real connected discourse spoken by our Savior and remembered by the disciples, or whether it was itself only a primitive collection of sayings preserved without the circumstances of their original utterance, is an unsettled question. Various considerations, such as the analogy of the later tendencies to compilation seen in Mt and Lk, the occasional and conversational character of Jesus' mode of teaching as portrayed in Mk, the relation of the main topics by which the sayings are grouped to the problems of life and apologetics in the second Christian generation, the singularity of this discourse in the Gospels—would lead the present writer to suppose that the earliest and briefest form of the sermon that we can recover was itself a compilation.

7. Outside Parallels.

Many parallels to the precepts of the Sermon on the Mount have been found in Jewish writings (mostly later, but not necessarily dependent on the utterances of Jesus), and in Greek and Roman moralists, especially Epictetus and Seneca. Many of these will be found quoted in the Commentaries, esp. Broadus on Mt. See also Lightfoot, "St. Paul and Seneca" in Com. on Philippians. This would be expected in these highly developed systems of morals, and does not detract from the true and unique significance of the moral teaching of Jesus Christ, which lay not in its novelty, but in its singular purity and inwardness, in its solid basis of spiritual theism, and in its consequent power.

SERPENT. See PALESTINE, § 26; SATAN, § 1; also DRAGON, and SEMITIC RELIGION, § 32.

SERPENT: In addition to the Biblical references to serpents which must be taken in their literal sense, there are others which must be understood differently. (1) The serpent in the Paradise story (Gn 3 1 ff.). This story is now generally interpreted as a symbolic rather than literal representation of the fall of man. The serpent serves in the story as the representative of that which opposes God and good. There was probably some basis in current legendary or mythical ideas for such symbolism. In the ancient Babylonian epic of Creation (see COSMOGONY, § 4) the negative aspect of the cosmos—i.e., chaos, the watery abyss, darkness, evil, etc.—is symbolized as a great dragon or serpent. As yet, however, no exact parallel to the serpent of the Paradise story has been found in Babylonian literature, although parallels to other elements of the story are numerous. In the N T Satan is spoken of as "that old serpent," probably with some reference to the story of Eden (Rev 12 9 ff., 20 2). (2) In a few passages (Job 26 13; Is 27 1) there seems to be a direct reference to the mythological serpent or dragon, in order to show the supremacy of J″ over all things (see LEVIATHAN). It is possible also that in Am 9 3, a similar reference is made. On the brazen serpent of Nu 21 9, see NEHUSHTAN, and on serpents in general see PALESTINE, § 26 (cf. Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos, pp. 29 ff.).

SERUG, sī'rŭg (שְׂרוּג, serūg): The 'son' of Reu (Gn 11 20 ff., called Saruch in AV of Lk 3 35). Probably connected with the district Sarug, mentioned in the Assyrian records.

SERVANT. See SLAVERY.

SERVANT OF JEHOVAH (Servant of the Lord AV): In the second part of the Book of Isaiah (chs. 40–66) the prophet in setting forth his great theme of consolation (cf. 40 1 ff.) makes frequent use of the expression "servant of J″" The passages are 41 8-10, 42 1-4, 6 f., 19 f., 43 10, 44 1-4, 21-23, 45 4, 49 1-6, 50 4-9, 52 13-53 12, those in heavy-faced type being considered the four most important ones. Closely connected with some of these passages are their contexts, e.g., 49 7-10 is in the nature of a reply to 49 1-6, but in this reply the word "servant" is not used.

In 41 8-10 Israel is addressed as the "Servant of J″," as "chosen" by Him, and not rejected, and is encouraged by the recommendation not to fear, for J″ will uphold him by His righteousness. In the next passage (42 1-4) the Servant is described (1) as the one in whom J″ delights, (2) as endued with the spirit of J″, and (3) as appointed to a great work, involving not only Israel itself, but the nations, a work of judgment, of instruction and enlightenment. The work is to be done in a quiet, gentle spirit. In this the Servant is not exactly identical with Israel, for he has a work to do for Israel. In 42 19 ff. and 43 8-10, it is Israel as a whole, rather than idealized, that seems to be mainly in the prophet's mind, yet even in 43 10 there is some idealization. The same is true of 44 1-4, 21-23 and 45 4. But in 49 1-6 the idealization is again prominent. Here the Servant is the speaker, confessing the failure of his past work, at the same time conscious of his high mission as a prophet, to restore Jacob to J″ and to be a light to the nations. In 50 4-9, the Servant is again the speaker, representing himself as taught by J″, especially in connection with the severe discipline of suffering, in order that he might teach others. In these sufferings the Servant is sustained by his faith in J″, and is confident that J″ will vindicate him. In 52 13–53 13 the idealization reaches its climax. The passage may be analyzed as follows: (1) The Servant's astonishing exaltation (52 13-15). Though he had been considered marred, disfigured, and despised, now even kings were startled at his exaltation. (2) Then the Servant's historic past is set forth as involving something wonderful. His early growth was unobserved and lowly, he was despised, rejected, subjected to sufferings, which nevertheless were vicarious—for "us," and these sufferings were crowned with death and burial with the wicked, though he was innocent (53 1-9). (3) But in all this a great Divine purpose was being fulfilled, and after all the Servant is "to see his seed," "prolong his days," and "shall be satisfied." Many through him will be made righteous, and victory will crown his career (53 10-12).

The true interpretation of these remarkable passages is to be found in the view that while the prophet derived elements of his delineation from the experience of Israel, there is an idealization here which neither Israel as a whole nor any part or individual of Israel known to the prophet ever completely realized. The prophet is setting forth principles—principles of the Divine method in realizing the supreme Divine purpose among men. Israel was, in part, an illustration of these principles. But there was more to them than Israel had been able to grasp or express. One figure alone in all history has fully met the ideal sketched by the prophet here. Yet it is neither necessary nor possible to hold that the prophet foresaw His actual career, His life, His cross, and His resurrection. The prophet grasped certain of those great essential elements which, just because they are necessarily true, must have been realized in Him who came to fulfil all righteousness. Chief among these is the principle of vicarious suffering as the only means whereby transgression may be atoned for, but there are others of almost equal importance. For theories and discussions the reader may consult Skinner in Camb. Bible, ad loc.; G. A. Smith in Expos. Bible, ad loc. and Davidson in his O T Prophecy, chs. xxi–xxiv. E. E. N.

SERVICE (עֲבוֹדָה, 'ăbhōdhāh): Commonly designates all manner of work done for another (Gn 30 26; Ex 1 14). But in the O T the word developed a specific meaning in connection with the ritual; so that the term signifies work done in the course of offering worship in the sanctuary of J" (Ex 30 16; Nu 4 4, etc.; cf. also He 9 1, 6, 9). Naturally, it was first applied to the labors of the Levites employed to take care of the vessels and furniture of the sanctuary; afterward, to the higher work of the priesthood in the performance of official duties at the altar. From this to the more spiritual sense of worship without ritual the transition was easy. This last sense is represented in Paul's exhortation to present the body as a living sacrifice, "a reasonable service" (Ro 12 1, "spiritual service" RV and RVmg. Gr.). In the more general sense of plain ministration to a need, the word occurs but rarely (Ps 104 14, "labor" RVmg.), which is illustrated by Paul's use of it to designate help in the form of money (Ro 15 1, 31 AV; II Co 9 12, 11 8 AV) A. C. Z.

SET BATTLE IN ARRAY. See WARFARE, § 4.

SETH, SHETH (שֵׁת, shēth, Σήθ): 1. A son of Adam. In Gn 4 25 f. (J) he is the third son and the name is derived from shāth in sense 'he hath appointed [me another seed].' In Gn 5 3 ff. (P; cf. Lk 3 38) he is the first son of Adam, and ancestor of the so-called Sethite line. 2. A name for the Moabites (Nu 24 17 AV), but probably not a proper name. Gray, Int. Crit. Com., ad loc., with others, suggests sᵉ'ēth, 'pride,' RV and others, shē'th, "tumult." C. S. T.

SETHUR, sĭ'thûr (סְתוּר, sᵉthūr): One of the spies (Nu 13 13). E. E. N.

SETTLE. See TEMPLE, § 24.

SEVEN, THE. See CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, § 3.

SEVEN, SEVENTY. See NUMBERS, SIGNIFICANT AND SYMBOLIC, § 7.

SEVEN CHURCHES. See REVELATION, BOOK OF, § 2.

SEVEN STARS: The AV rendering of the term kīmāh, Pleiades RV (Am 5 8). See ASTRONOMY, § 5.

SEVENEH, sē-vē'nē (סְוֵנֵה, sᵉwēnēh, Syene AV and RVmg.): A town on the E. bank of the Nile, just above the first cataract and opposite the island of Elephantine. Its position at a point where the river is difficult to navigate, on account of rocks and swift currents, made S. an admirable site for a fortress and at the same time a boundary landmark. But for the earlier part of the history of Egypt, Elephantine, on account of its still stronger situation, occupied this place of frontier fortress. In Ezk (29 10, 30 6) the reading is doubtful, but the marginal rendering "from Migdol to Syene" of AV and RV is the most satisfactory. If we are to read tower (Heb. migdōl), the fortified castle of the town is probably intended. The modern town is called Assuan (Aṣwān). Recently (1900 and later) a number of Aramaic papyri belonging to the Persian period have been discovered at Elephantine, showing that there was at that time (470–400 B.C.), a flourishing colony of Jews at this place, having their own temple to J" and in correspondence with their brethren in Palestine. A. C Z.

SHAALABBIN, shē"a-lab'in (שַׁעַלַבִּין, sha'ălabbīn), and SHAALBIM, sha-al'bim (שַׁעַלְבִים, sha'ălbhīm): A town assigned to Dan (Jos 19 42), long retained by the Canaanites (Jg 1 35), but held by Israel in Solomon's day (I K 4 9). It was on the southern slope of the hills of Ephraim. Conder identifies it with Selbît (Jerome's Selebi), 2 m. N. of Emmaus ('Amwās), map III, D 5. Eusebius and Jerome identify it with Salaba, near Samaria. Possibly the Shaalbonite (II S 23 32; I Ch 11 33) was from this town. C. S. T.

SHAALBONITE, sha-al'bo-nait (שַׁעַלְבֹנִי, sha'ălbhōnī): Probably a native of Shaalabbin (II S 23 32; I Ch 11 33). E. E. N.

SHAALIM, shē'a-lim, THE LAND OF (אַרְצֵי שַׁעֲלִים, 'erets sha'ălīm): A district which Saul passed through when seeking his father's asses (I S 9 4). It was evidently not far from the N. boundary of Benjamin. Some find here a textual error for "Shaalbim"; others connect it with "the land of Shual" (I S 13 17), which lay N. of Michmash. C. S. T.

SHAAPH, shē'af or -af (שַׁעַף, sha'aph): 1. A descendant of the Jerahmeelite Caleb (I Ch 2 47). 2. Another of the same family (I Ch 2 49). E. E. N.

SHAARAIM, shē"a-rē'im (שַׁעֲרַיִם, sha'ărayim): 1. A town in the lowland of Judah (Jos 15 36), near the Philistine territory in the Wâdy es-Ṣanṭ (I S 17 52, where Wellhausen reads "in the gateways" of Ekron; cf. RVmg.). Conder identifies it with Khirbet Sa'îreh, W. of Beit 'Atâb. 2. A town in Simeon (I Ch 4 31 =Shilhim, Jos 15 32; and Sharuhen, 19 6). Map II, C 3. C. S. T.

SHAASHGAZ, shê-ash'gaz (שַׁעַשְׁגַּז, sha'ashgaz): The chamberlain to whom Esther was entrusted (Est 2 14). E. E. N.

SHABBETHAI, shab'bę-thai, -thê, or shab-beth'-a-ai (שַׁבְּתַי, shabbᵉthay), 'born on the Sabbath': A Levite, prominent in the days of Ezra (Ezr 10 15; Neh 8 7, 11 16). E. E. N.

SHACHIA, sha-cai'a or shak'i-a (שָׁכְיָה, shākhᵉyāh): A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 10). E. E. N.

SHADOW OF DEATH: This term is the literal rendering of the Heb. tsalmāwēth. RVmg. and most moderns render "deep darkness," from a different pointing of Heb. (tsalmūth or -mōth). It means 'darkness' (Am 5 8; Job 3 5, etc.), is descriptive of Sheol (Job 10 21 f., 38 17), and a figure of danger and distress (Jer 2 6, 13 16; Is 9 2 [1]; Ps 44 19 [20], 107 10, 14, 23 4; Briggs, continuing the figure of vs. 1-3, here suggests "gloomy [dark] ravine [valley]"). C. S. T.

SHADRACH, shê'drac (שַׁדְרַךְ, shadhrakh, perhaps the Babyl. Šudur-Aku, 'command of Aku'): The Babylonian name given to Hananiah, one of Daniel's Jewish companions (Dn 1 7,2 49, etc.). With Meshach and Abednego he was cast into the fiery furnace because he would not worship the golden image set up by Nebuchadrezzar. C. S. T.

SHAFT. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 1.

SHAGEE, shê'gî (שָׁגֵא, shāgē', Shage AV): The father of Jonathan, one of David's heroes (I Ch 11 34). See also HARARITE. E. E. N.

SHAHARAIM, shê"ha-rê'im (שַׁחֲרַיִם, shaḥărayyim), 'double dawn' (?): Apparently the reputed ancestor of several Benjamite families of mixed descent (I Ch 8 8). E. E. N.

SHAHAZUMAH, shê"ha-zū'mā (שַׁחֲצוּמָה, shaḥătsūmāh), and SHAHAZIMAH, sha-haz'i-mā: A town of Issachar (Jos 19 22). Site unknown. E. E. N.

SHALEM, shê'lem (שָׁלֵם, shālēm): A city near Shechem (Gn 33 18 AV), but perhaps the original reading was "Jacob came in peace [bᵉshālōm] to the city of Shechem" (so RV); yet see Map III, F 3. E. E. N.

SHALIM, shê'lim. See SHAALIM.

SHALISHA, sha-lai'sha or shal'i-sha (שָׁלִשָׁה, shālīshāh): The "land of Shalisha" appears to have been N. or NW. of the "hill-country of Ephraim" (I S 9 4), perhaps near Baal-Shalisha (q.v.). E. E. N.

SHALLECHETH, shal'ę-keth, GATE OF. See TEMPLE, § 8.

SHALLUM, shal'um (שַׁלּוּם, shallūm), 'recompensed' (?): 1. The ancestral head of a clan (a) of Simeon (I Ch 4 25), (b) of Naphtali (I Ch 7 13, called Shillem, Gn 46 24), the Shillemites (Nu 26 49), and (c) of a Jerahmeelite family (I Ch 2 40, 41). 2. The murderer of Zechariah, King of Judah, slain by Menahem (q.v.), after a reign of one month (II K 15 10 ff.). 3. The father of Jehizkiah (II Ch 28 12). 4. The uncle of Jeremiah (Jer 32 7). 5. The father of Hilkiah the priest (I Ch 6 12 f.; Ezr 7 2). 6. The husband of Huldah (II K 22 14). 7. A son of King Josiah (I Ch 3 15; Jer 22 11), also called Jehoahaz (q.v.) (II K 23 30-34). 8. The father of Maaseiah (Jer 35 4). 9. The ancestral head of a family of porters (Ezr 2 42 =Neh 7 45; cf. I Ch 9 17, 19, 31), probably the same as Shelemiah (I Ch 26 14), Meshelemiah (I Ch 9 21, 26 1), and Meshullam (Neh 12 25). 10. A porter (Ezr 10 24). 11. One of the "sons of Bani" (Ezr 10 42). 12. The son of Hallohesh, and one of those who helped on the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 12). 13. The son of Colhozeh, and ruler of the district of Mizpah, who repaired the fountain-gate of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 15). E. E. N.

SHALMAI, shal'mai, -mê, or shal'ma-ai. See SALMAI.

SHALMAN, shal'man (שַׁלְמָן, shalmān): The name of the destroyer of Beth-arbel (Hos 10 14), which is commonly held to be a shorter form of "Shalmaneser," the name of several kings of Assyria. Wellhausen, ad loc., identifies him with Shalmaneser II, and considers the passage a later insertion. Schrader (COT, II, 138 ff.) identifies him with a Moabite king, Salamanu, mentioned in the great triumphal inscription of Tiglath-pileser III, in which case he would have been a contemporary of Hosea. C. S. T.

SHALMANESER, shal"man-î'zęr (שַׁלְמַנְאֶסֶר, shalman'eṣer; Assyrian, Shulmanu-asharidu, 'Shulman is chief'): Of the four Assyrian kings of this name, the second and fourth are mentioned in the O T. Shalmaneser II ruled 860–825 B.C. He came directly into contact with Ahab and his allies at the battle of Karkar in 854 B.C., and collected tribute of Jehu in 842 B.C. The latter event was commemorated by extensive bas-reliefs on the so-called Black Obelisk discovered by Layard at Nimroud in 1845. Shalmaneser IV (727–722 B.C.) succeeded the great Tiglath-pileser III (II K 17 3, 18 9). This king, of whom we have no known inscriptions, showed great activity, according to Josephus (Ant. IX, 14, 2), in campaigning against Phœnician and Palestinian cities. Hoshea, the last ruler of the Northern Kingdom, at first paid him tribute under his oath to Tiglath-pileser III, but ultimately formed an alliance with So, the King of Egypt, and refused payment. This defiance brought on war, Hoshea was taken captive, and Samaria besieged three years (II K 17 3-5). Some time during this siege Shalmaneser died (under what circumstances is unknown), and Sargon II assumed the throne and gathered the fruits of the long siege in the capture of the city. I. M. P.

SHAMARIAH, sham"a-rai'ā. See SHEMARIAH, 2.

SHAMBLES: The Eng. word "shambles" (from the Lat. scamellum, a 'stool,' or 'bench') meant originally the butchers' stalls, or benches, on which meat was laid for sale. The Gr. μάκελλον used in I Co 10 25 is really the Lat. word macellum, a 'meat or provision market.' E. E. N.

SHAME: This term renders (1) bōsh, 'put to shame,' and derivatives. (2) ḥāraph, 'reproach,' 'shame,' and derivatives. (3) khālam, 'humiliate,' and derivatives. (4) qālōn, 'ignominy.' (5) 'erwāh, 'nakedness,' 'pudenda' (rendered "shame" only in Is 20 4). (6) ḥāṣadh, 'be reproached' (Pr 25 10). (7) hāphēr, 'to be abashed,' 'ashamed' (Pr 13 5; Ps 71 24, 83 17; Is 54 4). (8) shimtsāh, 'whispering' (Ex 32 25, "derision" RV). (9) αἰσχρός, 'dishonorable' (I Co 11 6, 14 35; Eph 5 12); αἰσχύνη, the 'sense of shame' (Lk 14 9), 'ignominy,' visited on one (He 12 2) which should arise from guilt (Ph 3 19), 'a thing to be ashamed of' (Rev 3 18; Jude ver. 13); καταισχύνειν, 'to dishonor,' 'put to shame' (ICo 11 22). (10) ἀτιμία, 'dishonor' (I Co 11 14). (11) ἐντρέπειν, 'to arouse sense of shame' (I Co 4 14), ἐντροπή, 'shame' (I Co 6 5, 15 34). (12) παραδειγματίζειν, 'to expose to public disgrace' (Heb 6 6).

The term "shame" is used for the subjective feeling, either for oneself or for another, expressed by 'ashamed,' 'put to shame,' etc.; and also for the objective cause. The feeling of shame may be awakened by sins of various kinds and degrees (Ezk 16 27, 54; Pr 10 5, 29 15, 13 5; Jer 2 26; Pr 11 2; I Co 4 14; II Co 4 2, etc.); by unconventionalities (I Co 11 6, 14 35; Eph 5 12); by exposure of the body (II S 6 20; Is 20 4; Mic 1 11; fig. Rev 3 18, 16 15; also, where 'shame' stands for the parts uncovered, II S 13 13; Is 47 3; Ezk 39 26; Jer 13 26; Nah 3 5); by reproach, insult, contumely, or actual maltreatment of the person at the hands of another (Jg 18 7; Is 50 6; He 12 2; I S 20 34; Ps 69 7 [8]; II S 13 13; Mk 12 4; I Th 2 2; He 6 6, etc.); by the disgrace or act of another closely related to the individual (Pr 12 4, 10 5, 29 15); by betrayal, disaster, disappointment (Jer 2 36; Is 20 5; Ps 83 16 [17], "confusion" RV; Jl 1 11, "confounded" RV; Ps 119 116). It is especially as a punishment of individuals or nations by God for sin that shame comes, and the righteous desire to be avenged by having the ungodly be made ashamed (Ezk 16 52; Is 22 18; Ps 132 18, etc.). In Hos 9 10; Jer 3 24, 11 13, bōsheth, "shameful thing" RV, has evidently been substituted for the Divine name ba'al. Cf. the similar substitution in proper names (Jerubbesheth, II S 11 21 = Jerubbaal, Jg 6 32; Ishbosheth, II S 2 8, 10 = Eshbaal, I Ch 8 33, 9 39); see BAAL, and these names. C. S. T.

SHAMED, shē'med. See SHEMED.

SHAMER, shē'mẹr. See SHEMER.

SHAMGAR, sham'gär (שַׁמְגַּר, shamgar): The son of Anath, and the first of the six minor judges (Jg 3 31) who smote 600 Philistines and delivered Israel. In Jg 5 6 no mention is made of such a deliverance, and here the foes are the Canaanites. The name S. is foreign, perhaps Hittite, and Anath is the name of a Canaanite goddess. His deed is analogous to that of Samson (Jg 15 15) and Shammah (II S 23 11 f.). Jg 3 31 seems to be a late insertion, as 4 1 follows 3 30, and many think that Shamgar was put in, in order not to have Abimelech counted among the twelve judges. C. S. T.

SHAMHUTH, sham'huth (שַׁמְהוּת, shamhūth): An Izrahite, one of David's captains (I Ch 27 8); probably the same as Shammah (II S 23 25) and Shammoth (I Ch 11 27). E. E. N.

SHAMIR, shē'mẹr (שָׁמִיר, shāmīr): I. A Levite of the sons of Micah (I Ch 24 24; shāmūr K•thibh). II. 1. A town in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15 48). It is identified with Khirbet Sômara, SW of Hebron, a ruin with walls, caves, graves, and cisterns. 2. A town of Issachar in the hill-country of Ephraim and the home of Tola (Jg 10 1 f.); probably in the NE. near the Plain of Jezreel. C. S. T.

SHAMMA, sham'mą (שַׁמָּא, shammā'): A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 37). E. E. N.

SHAMMAH, sham'mā (שַׁמָּה, shammāh): 1. A son of Reuel, the son of Esau, and an Edomite chief (Gn 36 13, 17; I Ch 1 37). 2. The third son of Jesse (I S 16 9), and father of Jonadab, the friend of Amnon (II S 13 3, 32, Shimeah, shimᵉah) and of Jonathan, who slew a giant (II S 21 21, Shimei, shimᵉī, Q•ri shimᵉa'; I Ch 20 7; cf. 2 13, Shimea, Shimma AV, shimᵉa'). He followed Saul to battle (I S 17 13). 3. The son of Agee the Hararite, one of David's three chief heroes (II S 23 11), and father of Jonathan, one of David's thirty (II S 23 32 f., read Jonathan, son of Shammah; cf. I Ch 11 34, "J., son of Shagee"). 4. A Harodite, one of David's thirty (II S 23 25; the same as "Shammoth the Harorite," I Ch 11 27, and "Shamhuth the Izrahite," I Ch 27 8, the captain of the fifth monthly course under Solomon). C. S. T.

SHAMMAI, sham'ą-ąi or sham'mê (שַׁמַּי, shammay, contracted form of "Shemaiah"): 1. The ancestor of a Jerahmeelite family (I Ch 2 28, 32). 2. The ancestor of a Calebite family near Maon (I Ch 2 44 f.). 3. A descendant of Caleb, son of Jephunneh (I Ch 4 17). E. E. N.

SHAMMOTH, sham'mọth. See SHAMHUTH.

SHAMMUA, sham-miū'ą, SHAMMUAH, sham-miū'ā (שַׁמּוּעַ, shammūa'), 'heard': 1. One of the spies (Nu 13 4). 2. A son of David (II S 5 14; I Ch 14 4; called Shimei in 3 5). 3. The head of a course of priests (Neh 12 18). 4. A priest (Neh 11 17); see also SHEMAIAH. E. E. N.

SHAMSHERAI, sham-shẹ-rąi, -rê, or sham''shẹ-rê'ąi (שַׁמְשְׁרַי, shamsh•ray): A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 26). E. E. N.

SHAPHAM, shē'fam (שָׁפָם, shāphām): A Gadite clan (I Ch 5 12). E. E. N.

SHAPHAN, shē'fan (שָׁפָן, shāphān): 1. A son of Azaliah, a scribe of Josiah's time. It was Shaphan who received the Book of the Law from the hands of the high priest Hilkiah (II K 22 8 f.) and conveyed it to the king. Afterward, he was sent to Huldah the prophetess, to consult her regarding some of the contents of the book. 2. The father of Ahikam (Jer 26 24, 29 34) possibly, but not probably, the same as 1. 3. The father of Gemariah (Jer 36 10) and Jaazaniah (Ezk 8 11), probably the same as 1. 4. The father of Elasah (Jer 29 2), probably the same as 2. A. C. Z.

SHAPHAT, shê'fat (שָׁפָט, shāphāṭ), 'He has judged': 1. One of the spies (Nu 13 5). 2. A Gadite clan (I Ch 5 12). 3. One of David's herdsmen (I Ch 27 29). 4. The father of Elisha the prophet (I K 19 16, etc.). 5. A late descendant of David (I Ch 3 22). E. E. N.

SHAPHER, shê'fẹr. See SHEFER.

SHAPHIR, shê'fẹr or shaf'ẹr (שָׁפִיר, shāphīr, Saphir AV): A town of Judah (Mic 1 11). Map II, C 1. E. E. N.

SHARAI, sha-rê'ai, shê'rê, or shar'a-ai: (שָׁרַי, shāray): One of the "sons of Nebo" (Ezr 10 40). E. E. N.

SHARAIM, sha-rê'im or shar'a-im. See SHAARAIM.

SHARAR, shê'rār (שָׁרָר, shārār): The father of Ahiam, one of David's heroes (II S 23 33), called Sacar in I Ch 11 35. E. E. N.

SHARE. See PLOW.

SHAREZER, sha-rî'zẹr (שַׂרְאֶצֶר, shar'etser): 1. One of the sons of Sennacherib (II K 19 37 = Is 37 38). The Assyrian form of the name is probably shar-uzur, 'protect the prince.' With Adrammelech, his brother, he slew his father while he was worshiping in the house of his god Nisroch (Assyr. Nusku). The Babylonian Chronicle and the records of Nabonidus agree that Sennacherib was slain by one of his sons, but the name is not given. 2. A contemporary of Zechariah the prophet (Zec 7 2, Sherezer AV) who was sent from Bethel to Jerusalem to inquire of the priests whether the returned exiles should still persist in observing the fasts which were instituted in commemoration of the dates of the disasters that had befallen Jerusalem and the Jewish people about 588–586 B.C. I. M. P.

SHARON, shār'ọn (שָׁרוֹן, shārōn), probably from a root meaning 'plain' or 'level country': 1. The undulating plain extending from Joppa and Ramleh northward along the Mediterranean coast to Mt. Carmel; about 50 m. long and varying from 6 to 12 m. in breadth. Map III, C 4, D 1, 2, 3. It is unusually fertile (Is 65 10; Song 2 1). The oak still flourishes in the northern portion as probably in the days of Isaiah (35 2); the southern portion is richly cultivated. In early spring the luxuriant grass and richly colored flowers render this plain the garden of Palestine. Unfortunately, the sand-dunes along the sea are persistently encroaching upon it. Shitrai the Sharonite (I Ch 27 29) was over David's herds that fed in Sharon. See also PALESTINE, § 11. 2. A region E. of the Jordan (I Ch 5 16), which, however, is better identified with the elevated plateau or table-land in Gilead between the Arnon and Heshbon (cf. Dt 3-10). G. L. R.

SHARONITE, shār'ọn-ait. See SHARON.

SHARUHEN, sha-rū'hen (שָׁרוּחֶן, shārūḥen): A city of Simeon (Jos 19 6), perhaps the same as Shilhim (15 32) and Shaaraim (I Ch 4 31). See SHAARAIM. E. E. N.

SHASHAI, shê'shai, -shê' or shash'a-ai (שֲׁשַׁי, shāshay): One of the "sons of Bani" (Ezr 10 40). E. E. N.

SHASHAK, shê'shak (שֲׁשַׁק, shāshaq): A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 14, 25). E. E. N.

SHAUL, shê'ul or shōl (שָׁאוּל, shā'ūl), 'asked for'; cf. Saul: 1. The ancestral head of a Simeonite clan of mixed blood (Gn 46 10; Ex 6 15, etc.), the Shaulites (Nu 26 13). 2. A king of Edom, from "Rehoboth by the River" (Gn 36 37, "Saul" AV; I Ch 1 48 f.), perhaps of Aramæan origin. 3. A descendant of Levi (I Ch 6 24). See also SAUL. E. E. N.

SHAVE, SHAVING: This is the translation of (1) gāzaz (only Job 1 20), usually 'shear.' (2) gālaḥ, 'shave,' for which ξυρᾶν is used in LXX. and N T. (3) The AV rendering of a phrase (Nu 8 7) which is given more literally in RV, "cause a razor to pass over." Shaving was a means of purification from plague (Lv 13 33), leprosy (Lv 14 8 f.), defilement (Nu 6 9, 8 7). A captive female slave was to shave her head before her marriage, as a sign that her forlorn condition was at an end (Dt 21 12). An Arabian widow terminates her period of mourning by a similar act. The shaving of the head and beard as a sign of mourning (Dt 14 1; Jer 41 5) was forbidden the priests (Lv 21 5; Ezk 44 20). When the vow of a Nazirite was fulfilled, he shaved his head (Nu 6 18; Ac 21 24). In II S 10 4 = I Ch 19 4 the shaving of the beard was to put the men to shame. Cf. HAIR; RAZOR. C. S. T.

SHAVEH, shê've (שָׁוֵה, shāwēh), 'level': A 'vale' (i.e., a broad open valley) where the king of Sodom met Abram returning from the rescue of Lot (Gn 14 17). It was probably the place near Jerusalem called "the King's Vale" (q.v. and cf. II S 18 18). E. E. N.

SHAVEH-KIRIATHAIM, -kir''i-a-thê'im (שָׁוֵה קִרְיָתַיִם, shāwēh qiryāthayim), 'the level [place] of Kiriathaim': The locality where Chedorlaomer smote the Emim (Gn 14 5). Probably the same as Kiriathaim. Map II, I 2. E. E. N.

SHAVSHA, shav'sha (שַׁוְשָׁא, shawshā'): A person mentioned in the list of David's chief officials (I Ch 18 16) as scribe, or secretary. He was the officer entrusted with all the state papers. The name is Aramaic, and it is quite probable that foreign correspondence necessitated the employment of an alien. In I K 4 3 Solomon's scribes, Elihoreph and Ahijah, are called sons of Shishai, who is to be identified with Shavsha (the Old Latin version reads "Shavsha"). In the two lists of David's officials in II S Seraiah is the scribe in 8 17, and Sheva in 20 25. These are scribal errors for "Shavsha." J. A. K.

SHAWL. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 6.

SHEAF. See AGRICULTURE, § 5.

SHEAL, shî'al (שְׁאַל, she'āl): One of "the sons of Bani" (Ezr 10 29). E. E. N.

SHEALTIEL, shē-al'ti-el (שְׁאַלְתִּיאֵל, she'altī'ēl), 'I have asked God': A son of the captive King Jeconiah, and the father of Zerubbabel, according to Ezr 3 2, 8, 5 2; Neh 12 1; Hag 1 1, 12, 14, 2 2. But I Ch 3 18 says that Zerubbabel was the son of Pedaiah, brother of S., and good grounds have been urged for the correctness of the text of Ch (see Kittel, Hand-Kommentar z. A T, ad loc.). In the LXX. and the N T (AV) S. takes the form Salathiel (Mt 1 12; Lk 3 27). E. E. N.

SHEAR. See NOMADIC AND PASTORAL LIFE, § 7.

SHEARIAH, shî''a-rai'ā (שְׁעַרְיָה, she'aryāh): A descendant of Saul (I Ch 8 38, 9 44). E. E. N.

SHEARING-HOUSE. See NOMADIC AND PASTORAL LIFE, § 7.

SHEAR-JASHUB, shî''ar-jash'ŭb or -jê'shŭb (שְׁאָר יָשׁוּב, she'ār yāshūbh), 'a remnant shall return': A son of Isaiah (Is 7 3; cf. 8 18, 10 20 f.). E. E. N.

SHEATH. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 2.

SHEBA, shî'ba (שְׁבַע, shebha'): I. 1. The ancestral head of a Gadite family (I Ch 5 13). 2. A Benjamite who led a revolt against David soon after Absalom's death. The motive was, doubtless, jealousy on the part of the Benjamites (Saul's tribe) of David's success in quelling Absalom's rebellion, which they had hoped would end in dethroning David's dynasty. S. was unsuccessful and, besieged at Abel in N. Israel, he met his fate at the hands of the inhabitants (II S 20 1-22). II. 1. A region in Arabia; see ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11, and SABEAN. 2. A town in Simeon, according to Jos 19 2, but this is probably a textual error for Shema (Jos 15 26; the same as Jeshua, Neh 11 26). E. E. N.

SHEBAH, shî'bā. See SHIBAH.

SHEBAM, shî'bam. See SEBAM.

SHEBANIAH, sheb''a-nai'ā (שְׁבַנְיָהוּ, shebhanyāhū, and שְׁבַנְיָה, shebhanyāh), 'J" has brought me back': 1. A Temple musician (I Ch 15 24). 2. A Levite who assisted Ezra (Neh 9 4 f.; possibly also 10 12). 3. Another Levite (Neh 10 10; but many MSS. read here "Shechaniah"). 4. A priest (Neh 10 4, 12 14, called "Shechaniah" in ver. 3). E. E. N.

SHEBARIM, sheb'a-rim (שְׁבָרִים, shebhārīm), 'broken [pieces]': Apparently a place-name (Jos 7 5), though possibly meaning 'quarries.' The site is unknown, but was not far from Ai. E. E. N.

SHEBAT, shî'bat (שְׁבָט, shebhāṭ, Sebat AV): The eleventh month of the Jewish year. See TIME, § 3. E. E. N.

SHEBER, shî'bĕr (שֶׁבֶר, shebher): A son of the Jerahmeelite Caleb (I Ch 2 48). E. E. N.

SHEBNA, sheb'na (שֶׁבְנָא, shebhnā'), SHEBNAH, sheb'nā (שֶׁבְנָה, shebhnāh) (II K 18 18, 26): The steward of King Hezekiah's house, and, apparently, a foreigner and man of wealth (Is 22 15-18). He looked upon himself, however, as permanently identified with Judah, since he had a magnificent mausoleum built for himself. The prophet Isaiah rebuked him, and predicted that he should not rest in this sepulcher. His retirement from office took place in 701, when Eliakim was given his place. But, in a passage of subsequent date (Is 36 3, 11, 22, 37 2), he is spoken of as "secretary," which may mean either that the office of scribe was a degradation from that of steward, or that the dating of the passage is based upon an error. A. C. Z.

SHEBUEL, shĕ-bū'el or sheb'yu-el (שֶׁבוּאֵל, shebhū'ēl): 1. The ancestor of a family of Gershonite Levites (I Ch 23 16, 26 24, Shubael in 24 20). 2. The ancestor of a family of singers (I Ch 25 4; Shubael in ver. 20). L. L. N.

SHECANIAH, SHECHANIAH, shec''a nai'ā ([הוּ]שְׁכַנְיָה, shekhanyāh[ū]), 'J" hath taken up his abode': 1. The head of a family descended from David (I Ch 3 21 f.; Ezr 8 3, 5). 2. A priest to whom the tenth lot fell (I Ch 24 11 = shebaniah, Neh 10 4, 12 14), the representative of a priestly family which returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12 3). 3. The son of Jehiel. He confessed the sin of having a foreign wife (Ezr 10 2). 4. The keeper of the east gate and father of a wallbuilder (Neh 3 29). 5. The father-in-law of Tobiah (Neh 6 18). 6. A priest in charge of apportioning the free-will offerings for the priests (II Ch 31 15). C. S. T.

SHECHEM, shî'kem (שֶׁכֶם, shekhem), 'the neck and shoulders,' or 'the back': I. An important city in the hill-country of Ephraim, situated in the narrow valley (100 yds. wide) between Mounts Ebal and Gerizim, on the great highway between Judæa and Galilee (Jos. Ant. IV, 8 44). Map III, F 3. According to Eusebius (Onom.), the city owed its name to Shechem, "the son of Hamor the Hivite, the prince of the land" (Gn 34 2, 33 18, 19). More probably the name, which means 'shoulder' or 'back,' was assigned to this place because it lay on the watershed between the Mediterranean and the Jordan Valley. Jerome (Ep. Pan. xvi) identified it with the modern Nâblus, the same as the Flavia Neapolis of Vespasian. Josephus (BJ, IV, 8 1) knew it by the ancient name Mabortha or Mabartha, signifying 'pass' or 'crossing.' S. is frequently mentioned in the O T. Abram, on entering Canaan, built an altar there (Gn 12 6, 7). When Jacob returned from Paddan-aram "he bought the parcel of ground, where he had spread his tent," and erected an altar (33 18-20). Jacob gave to Joseph "one portion," literally, 'one shekhem' (Gn 48 21, 22). From the heights of Ebal and Gerizim the laws of Dt were promulgated (Dt 27 12-14; Jos 8 33-35). By the inhabitants of S., Abimelech, the son of Gideon, was made king; and when they rebelled against him he captured their city and sowed its site with salt (Jg ch. 9). At S. the northern tribes revolted against Rehoboam (I K ch. 12), and Jeroboam I chose the place for his royal residence. When Samaria was made the capital of N. Israel in Omri's time, S naturally declined in political importance. Two centuries later it became the chief city of the Samaritans (Sir 50 26; Jos. Ant. XI, 8 6). In Nehemiah s time these built a temple on Mt. Gerizim which was destroyed by John Hyrcanus (129 B.C.). To-day the remnant of the Samaritans—"the smallest religious sect in the world," numbering not more than 170 souls—resides in S. and continues to worship on Mt. Gerizim.

S. is the center of hallowed associations. About 1½ m. E. from the city on the main road to Jerusalem is Jacob's well (Bîr Yaḳûb), at which Jesus met the woman of Samaria (Jn 4 5 ff.). Less than ½ m. N. of Jacob's well is the traditional tomb of Joseph (Ḳabr Yûsuf). About midway between these and the city is the village of Ballâta, the name of which seems to preserve the Aramaic word for oak (ballût) and perhaps also gives a hint as to the location of the "oak of Moreh," under which Jacob buried the idols of his household (Gn 12 6, 35 4; Jos 24 26; Jg 9 6). On the basis of Ac 7 16, a tradition grew up in the early Church that Jacob's twelve sons were buried at S., but Josephus says they were buried at Hebron (Ant. II, 8 2). The present population of Nâblus is approximately 25,000. Its altitude above sea-level is 1,870 ft. Copious fountains supply it with good water. G. L. R.

II. 1. The son of Hamor, a Canaanite "prince," who became enamored of Dinah, the daughter of Jacob. His treatment of her greatly angered her brothers Simeon and Levi, who artfully demanded that Shechem and the Shechemites be circumcised as the condition on which he would be permitted to marry Dinah. When the men of Shechem were thus physically incapacitated for defending their city, Simeon and Levi attacked them and put them to death (Gn 33 18–34 31). This story is now generally interpreted as referring to conflicts between Israelite tribes and the Canaanite city, rather than as between individuals. 2. The eponymous name of a clan or family of Manasseh, the Shechemites (Nu 26 31; Jos 17 2). 3. A son of Shemidah (I Ch 7 19). E. E. N.

SHECHEMITE, shî'kem-ait. See SHECHEM, II, 2.

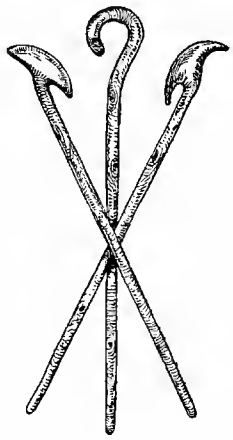
SHEERAH, shî'ę-rā (שְׁאֵרָה, sheĕrāh, Sherah AV): An Ephraimite clan inhabiting Beth-horon (both Upper and Lower) and Uzzen-sheerah (I Ch 7 24). The location of Uzzen-sheerah is unknown. E. E. N.



Types of Shepherds' Crooks.

SHEET: (1) The translation of the Heb. miṭpaḥath (Ru 3 15 AV), which is correctly rendered in RV by 'mantle.' (2) The rendering of the Gr. ὀθόνη, 'linen,' or, more specifically, 'fine linen' (Ac 10 11). In post-classical Gr. ὀθόνη was used of sails and sailcloth, and this may be its signification here. J. M. T.

SHEKINAH, shę-kai'na, shî-, shek'e-nā, or shekai'nā: A late Jewish term denoting the idea of God's abiding presence among His people through His glory. It is derived from a root, shkn, meaning 'to dwell,' and may be translated 'that which abides.' From this comes the word mishkān, the term used for the Tabernacle. The Biblical antecedents of the conception begin with God's revealing His presence through the symbol of light (as in the burning bush, q.v.). In the account of the approach of Moses to Him on Mount Sinai a thick cloud is pictured as resting on the top of the mountain, and within it the glory of J" in the form of a devouring flame (Ex 24 16-18). And in the finished Tabernacle the presence of God was signified by day through a cloud, which by night was either seen to go up or was supplanted by fire (Ex 40 34, 38). But in the intertestamental period, first, the name "Shekinah" is fixed, and, secondly, its meaning is changed from that of a symbol of the Divine presence to that of an aspect of divinity embodied and made visible to the physical eye. A distinction, moreover, is drawn between the Shekinah and the glory. The glory is the visible form of the Shekinah; and, conversely, the Shekinah is the substance of the glory. Thus in the Targums, all the instances where J" is reported as moving from one place to another are rendered by the substitution of the word "Shekinah" for the Divine name. Likewise, where God is said to dwell at any place, in the Heb. text the Targums render "cause His Shekinah to dwell" (cf. Gn 28 16; Ex 25 8; I K 8 12; Zec 8 3). The motive for resorting to the creation of such an intermediate being between the Godhead and His glory was undoubtedly the growth of the idea of transcendence, which tended to exalt God as far as possible by removing Him from the possibility of immediate touch with coarse matter and sinful man. This tendency was brought to its fullest development by Philo, who attributed to God an absolutely abstract being and an eternal, unchangeable substance (cf. Drummond, Philo, II, 23–30).

In the N T, neither the doctrine of nor a name for the Shekinah appears. But the influence of the Jewish view may be seen in the different concepts given to the term "glory." The glory is, for instance, enumerated by Paul along with the covenant, the Law, the ritual, and the promises as constituting the privileges of the Jews, which scarcely leaves room for doubting that by the term "glory" the Shekinah is meant (cf. also He 1 3, 9 5). Traces of the same conception are to be found in Ro 6 4; I P 4 14 and Ja 2 1. See also GLORY. A. C. Z.

SHELAH, shî'lā: 1 (שֶׁלָה, shēlāh). A son of Judah (Gn 38 5 ff., etc.), the ancestor of the Shelanites (Nu 26 20). 2 (שֶׁלַח, shelaḥ). A son of Arpachshad (Gn 10 24, 11 12-15, Salah AV; I Ch 1 18). E. E. N.

SHELEMIAH, shel"ę-mai'ā (שֶׁלַמְיָהוּ, shelemyāh[ū]): 1. A Levite doorkeeper of the Tabernacle (I Ch 26 14). 2, 3. Two of the "sons of Bani" who had foreign wives (Ezr 10 39, 41). 4. The father of Hananiah, a repairer of the wall (Neh 3 30). 5. A priest, appointed a treasurer by Nehemiah (Neh 13 13) = 3 or 4(?). 6. A son of Cushi (Jer 36 14), probably of Egyptian origin. 7. A son of Abdeel, commanded by Jehoiakim to take Baruch and Jeremiah (Jer 36 26). 8. The father of Jehucal (Jer 37 3, 38 1). 9. The father of Irijah (Jer 37 13). C. S. T.

SHELEPH, shî'lef. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

SHELESH, shî'lesh (שֶׁלֶשׁ, shēlesh): A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 35). E. E. N.

SHELOMI, shę-lō'mai or shel'o-mai (שְׁלֹמִי, shelōmī): The father of Ahihud, prince of Asher (Nu 34 27). E. E. N.

SHELOMITH, shę-lō'mith or shel'o-mith (שְׁלֹמִית, shelōmīth), 'peacefulness' (?): 1. The mother of the Israelite who blasphemed the name of J" (Lv 24 11). 2. A Levite (I Ch 23 9, Shelomoth RV). 3. The head of a Levite family (I Ch 23 18, Shelomoth in 24 22). 4. A descendant of 3 (I Ch 26 25-28, Shelomoth RV). 5. A son of Rehoboam (II Ch 11 20). 6. The ancestor of a post-exilic family (Ezr 8 10). 7. A daughter of Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 19). E. E. N.

SHELOMOTH, shę-lō'moth or shel'o-moth. See SHELOMITH, 2, 3, 4.

SHELUMIEL, shę-liū'mi-el (שְׁלֻמִיאֵל, shelūmī'ēl), 'God is conciliated' (?): A chief of Simeon (Nu 1 6, 2 12, etc.). E. E. N.

SHEM, shem (שֵׁם, shēm, in the N T Sem AV): The eldest son of Noah (Gn 5 32, etc.). He is considered in the O T as the ancestor of the whole Semitic race. On the entire subject see, in general, ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY. E. E. N.

SHEMA, shî'ma (שָׁמַע, shāma'), 'he has heard' (abbreviated from Shemaiah): I. 1. A Jerahmeelite clan (I Ch 2 43 f.). 2. A Reubenite (I Ch 5 8). 3. A Benjamite clan (I Ch 8 13). 4. One of Ezra's assistants (Neh 8 4). II. A city of Judah (Jos 15 26), or Simeon, perhaps the Sheba of 19 2. See SHEBA, II, 2. E. E. N.

SHEMAAH, shę-mê'ā or shem'a-ā (שְׁמָעָה, shemā'āh): The father of Ahiezer and Joash, two of David's warriors (I Ch 12 3). E. E. N.

SHEMAIAH, shę-mê'yā (שְׁמַעְיָהוּ, shema'yāh[ū]), 'J" hath heard': 1. A prophet who counseled Rehoboam not to war against Israel (I K 12 22 = II Ch 11 2). He also brought Rehoboam and his people to repentance, when Shishak attacked Jerusalem (II Ch 12 5, 7). He is said to have written histories of his time (II Ch 12 15). 2. The father of Uriah the prophet (Jer 26 20). 3. The Nehelamite, a false prophet, deported to Babylon, who answered Jeremiah's letter to the Babylonian exiles with a complaint concerning him to the priest Zephaniah. Jeremiah prophesied that for this he would die in exile (Jer 29 24-32). 4. The father of Delaiah (Jer 36 12). 5. A son of Shecaniah and the father of Hattush (I Ch 3 22). 6. The head of a Simeonite family (I Ch 4 37). 7. The head of a Reubenite family (I Ch 5 4). 8. A Levite (I Ch 9 14; Neh 11 15). 9. A Levite (I Ch 9 16 = Shammua, Neh 11 17). 10. A Kohathite chief (I Ch 15 8, 11). 11. A Levite, the son of Nathaneel, who recorded the allotment of priestly offices in the time of David (I Ch 24 6). 12. A son of Obed-edom (I Ch 26 4, 6, 7). 13. A Levite sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the Law in the cities of Judah (II Ch 17 8). 14. A son of Jeduthun, who helped to cleanse the Temple in the days of Hezekiah (II Ch 29 14). 15. A Levite in charge of the distribution of the free-will offerings in the cities of the priests (II Ch 31 15). 16. A chief Levite under Josiah (II Ch 35 9). 17. A son of Adonikam who returned with Ezra (Ezr 8 13). 18. One sent by Ezra to Iddo to ask for ministers for the house of God (Ezr 8 16). 19. A man with a foreign wife (Ezr 10 31). 20. A builder of the wall (Neh 3 29). 21. One who tried to intimidate Nehemiah (Neh 6 10 ff.). 22. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12 6, 18, 35) and sealed the covenant (Neh 10 8). 23. A prince of Judah who took part in the dedication of the wall (Neh 12 34). 24. A priest who also assisted in the service of dedication (Neh 12 36). 25. A priest who gave thanks at the dedication of the wall (Neh 12 42). 26. A priest with a foreign wife (Ezr 10 21).

SHEMARIAH, shem″a-rai′ā (שְׁמַרְיָהוּ, shemaryāhū), 'J" guards': 1. One of David's warriors (I Ch 12 5). 2. A son of Rehoboam (II Ch 11 19, Shameriah AV). 3. One of "the sons of Harim" (Ezr 10 32). 4. One of "the sons of Bani" (Ezr 10 41).
E. E. N.

SHEMEBER, shem-ī′bẹr or shem′ẹ-bẹr (שֶׁמְאֶבֶר, shem'ēbher): The king of Zeboim (Gn 14 2), conquered by Chedorlaomer (vs. 9 ff.).
E. E. N.

SHEMED, shī′med (שֶׁמֶד, shemedh, Shamed AV; many Heb. MSS. read "Shemer"): A Benjamite clan inhabiting Ono and Lod (I Ch 8 12).
E. E. N.

SHEMER, shī′mẹr (שֶׁמֶר, shemer): 1. The ancestral head of an Asherite clan (I Ch 7 34, in ver. 32 called Shomer). 2. The owner of the hill which Omri purchased for his capital, Samaria (I K 16 24). 3. A Levite (I Ch 6 46). 1 and 3 are given as Shamer in AV. See also SHEMED.
E. E. N.

SHEMIDA, shẹ-mai′da (שְׁמִידָע, shemīdhā'): The ancestral head of a Gileadite clan, the Shemidaites, counted as of Manassite descent (Nu 26 32; Jos 17 2; I Ch 7 19, Shemidah AV).
E. E. N.

SHEMINITH, shem′i-nith. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 3 (4), and PSALMS, § 3.

SHEMIRAMOTH, shẹ-mir′a-mọth (שְׁמִירָמוֹת, shemīrāmōth): 1. A Levite musician (I Ch 15 18, 20, 16 5). 2. A Levite teacher (II Ch 17 8).
E. E. N.

SHEMUEL, shẹ-miū′el or shem′yū-el (שְׁמוּאֵל, shemū'ēl), 'name of God' (see SAMUEL): 1. The "prince" of Simeon (Nu 34 20). 2. The ancestral head of a clan of Issachar (I Ch 7 2). On I Ch 6 33 see SAMUEL (the prophet).
E. E. N.

SHEN, shen (שֵׁן, shēn), 'tooth': Samuel is said to have set up a stone between Mizpah and 'the Shen' (I S 7 12). The LXX. indicates that the original reading was "Jeshanah," a place mentioned in II Ch 13 19. See also EBENEZER.
E. E. N.

SHENAZZAR, shẹn-az′zār (שְׁנַאצַּר, shen'atsar): A son of Jeconiah, the captive king of Judah (I Ch 3 18). The name is probably of Babylonian origin (perhaps Sin-uṣur or Sin-shar-uṣur). The identification with Sheshbazzar (Ezr 1 8, 11) is possible, but not certain.

SHERAH, shī′rā. See SHEERAH.

SHERD. See POTSHERD.

SHEREBIAH, sher″ẹ-bai′ā (שֶׁרֵבְיָה, shērēbhyāh): A prominent Levite in the days of Ezra (Ezr 8 18, 24, where "priests" should be corrected to "Levites"; Neh 8 7, 9 4 f., 10 12, 12 8, 24).
E. E. N.

SHERESH, shī′resh (שֶׁרֶשׁ, sheresh): The ancestral head of a Manassite clan (I Ch 7 16).
E. E. N.

SHEREZER, shẹ-rī′zẹr. See SHAREZER.

SHERIFF: The rendering of the obscure term תִּפְתָּיֵא, tiphtāyē' (Dn 3 2, 3), the meaning of which is unknown.
E. E. N.

SHESHACH, shī′shac (שֵׁשַׁךְ, shēshakh): A name for Babylon (Jer 25 26, 51 4, where it is parallel to Babylon), a form of Babel obtained by means of the so-called Athbash, whereby the last letter of the alphabet is used for the first, the next last for the second, etc.
C. S. T.

SHESHAI, shī′shai or -shê (שֵׁשַׁי, shēshay): One of several Canaanite clans or families, reputed to have been descended from "Anak," and of gigantic stature, who occupied Hebron. They were conquered by the Calebites (Nu 13 22; Jos 15 14; Jg 1 10).
E. E. N.

SHESHAN, shī′shan (שֵׁשָׁן, shēshān): A Jerahmeelite who, having no sons, gave his daughter in marriage to an Egyptian, Jarha (I Ch 2 31 ff.). It is likely that clan-relations are reflected in these statements.
E. E. N.

SHESHBAZZAR, shesh-baz′ar (שֵׁשְׁבַּצַּר, sheshbatstsar): The personage with whom Cyrus at Babylon entrusted the sacred vessels of the former Temple in Jerusalem, when the Jews first returned from the Exile in 537–536 B.C. (Ezr 1 8, 11). He is also credited with having laid the foundations of the house of God in Jerusalem (Ezr 5 14, 16). The significance of his name and the identity of his person are much disputed. By some his name is thought to have been compounded of Babylonian elements, and, as the original of the name found in the LXX., Sanabassar, to have consisted of sin-bal-uzur, 'O [god] Sin, protect the son.' He is also identified with Shenazzar of I Ch 3 18, which would make him an uncle of Zerubbabel. Still another theory would wholly identify him with Zerubbabel, making the word "Sheshbazzar" a cryptogram, such as "Lebkamai" for "Babylon" (Jer 51 1), and other instances in later times. I. M. P.

SHETH, sheth (שֵׁת, shēth): A term rendered as a proper noun in Nu 24 17 AV In RV, on the basis of a comparison with Jer 48 45, it is rendered "tumult." Some would read שְׁאֵת, 'pride.' E. E. N.

SHETHAR, shî'thar (שֵׁתָר, shēthār): One of the seven princes mentioned in Est 1 14. See PRINCES, THE SEVEN. E. E. N.

SHETHAR-BOZENAI, -boz'ę-nai (שֵׁתַר בֹּזְנַי, shethar bōznay): One of the opponents of the returned exiles who tried to prevent the rebuilding of the Temple (Ezr 5 3, 6, 6 6, 13). The name may be a Persian proper noun, or it may be an official title. E. E. N.

SHEVA, shî'va (שְׁוָא, shᵉwā'): 1. A Calebite clan (or individual?), inhabiting Machbena and Gibea (I Ch 2 49). 2. David's scribe (II S 20 25). See SHAVSHA. E. E. N.

SHEWBREAD. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 13.

SHIBAH, shai'bā (שִׁבְעָה, shibh'āh [for שֶׁבַע], Shebah AV), 'swearing': The name of the well near Beer-sheba (Gn 26 33). See BEER-SHEBA. E. E. N.

SHIBBOLETH, shib'o-leth (שִׁבֹּלֶת, shibboleth): The test word of the Gileadites for the defeated Ephraimites at the Jordan (Jg 12 6), since the latter could only say ṣibbōleth, wherein ṣ (ס) represents a different order of sibilants from sh (שׁ). The meaning of the term is uncertain. Parallels are found in the Sicilian Vespers, March, 1282, and the Flemish revolt, May, 1302, when the inability of Frenchmen to pronounce foreign phrases was the signal for their slaughter. A. S. C.

SHIHOR, shai'hōr. See NILE.

SHIHOR-LIBNATH, shai"hōr-lib'nath (שִׁיחוֹר לִבְנָת, shīḥōr libhnāth): A river on the border of Asher, possibly the Nahr ez-Zerḳâ S. of Mt. Carmel and just N. of Cæsarea (Jos 19 26). C. S. T.

SHIKKERON, shik'kę-rən (שִׁכְּרוֹן, shikkārōn, Shicron AV), 'drunkenness': A town on the NW. border of Judah (Jos 15 11). Site unknown. E. E. N.

SHILHI, shil'hai (שִׁלְחִי, shilḥī): The father of Azubah, the mother of Jehoshaphat (I K 22 42). E. E. N.

SHILHIM, shil'him (שִׁלְחִים, shilḥīm): A city in the SW. of Judah (Jos 15 32), called Sharuhen (19 6) and Shaaraim (I Ch 4 31). Site unknown. E. E. N.

SHILLEM, shil'em, SHILLEMITE, shil'em-ait. See SHALLUM.

SHILOAH, shi-lō'ā. See JERUSALEM, § 13.

SHILOH, shai'lō (שִׁילֹה, shīlōh): I. 1. A place of considerable importance in Israelitic history Its location is explicitly given (Jg 21 19) as being "on the north of Bethel, on the east side of the highway that goeth up from Bethel to Shechem," and it has been identified with the modern Seilūn. Map III, F 4. With Tabernacle and Ark, Joshua moved his headquarters from Gilgal to Shiloh (Jos 18 1 ff.); it was here that the Benjamites secured wives by carrying off the virgins at a vintage festival (Jg 21 16 ff.). Under Eli and Samuel it figures prominently as a sanctuary, but the old Tabernacle seems to have given place to a permanent structure, called a temple (hēkhāl) in I S 1 9. It was probably destroyed by the Philistines at the time of the capture of the Ark (I S ch. 4; cf. Jer 26 6-9). Jeremiah predicts that the Temple at Jerusalem will meet a similar fate (Jer 26 6, 9). The city was rebuilt at a later period (Jer 41 5). In the 4th cent. Jerome refers to it as lying in ruins. Shilonite is applied to Ahijah the prophet as a dweller of Shiloh (I K 14 2) and to a Judahite family (Neh 11 5; Shiloni AV is an error).

II. "Shiloh" occurs in the phrase "until Shiloh come," an enigmatical clause in Gn 49 10, which has taxed the ingenuity of interpreters in all ages. The context runs: "The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor the ruler's staff from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the obedience of the peoples be." This passage clearly assigns a position of preeminence to the tribe of Judah, and attributes to it a sovereignty over the nations, but the phrase "until Shiloh come" does not convey an explicit idea to the reader. The following are the chief explanations suggested: (a) "Shiloh" is taken as a personal name of the Messiah—"the Peaceful or the Peace-bringer." Etymologically, these renderings are indefensible; historically, this interpretation is late, first occurring in a Talmudic tractate (Sanh. 98b), and the first version to incorporate it is that of Sebastian Münster, 1534. Further, the history of Messianic prophecy runs counter to this view, for the figure of a personal Messiah for the first time flashes across the mind of Isaiah. This exegesis has been universally discarded by modern scholars. (b) The readings of the ancient versions which point the Hebrew word shellōh (short for 'ăsher lō, 'that which is to or for him') may be considered next. The LXX. reads "until there come that which [or he who] is his"; the Syriac and some MSS. of the LXX. "till he come whose it [i.e., scepter] is" (cf. RVmg.). Consequently, we have a prophecy of the Davidic dynasty as sovereign in Israel and conqueror of the nations. These renderings are not strictly grammatical as the text now stands. (c) Till he—i.e., Judah—come to Shiloh (cf. RVmg.). This is an exact translation of the original, and has been adopted by the greatest modern exegetes. The meaning is that after the Conquest Judah will come to Shiloh, the capital of the tribes, and abdicate his position of leader which he has held during the wanderings and the Conquest. It is taken to refer to an assembly of Israel (Jos 18 1-10). The objection to this view is that Judah is not known to have occupied such a position in that period. It is possible to determine only the general significance of the phrase; it is a Messianic prophecy in the broad sense, promising preeminence to Judah in Israel and the obedience of the nations.

SHIMEAM, shim'ę-am. See SHIMEA, 1.

SHIMEATH, shim'ę-ath (שִׁמְעָת, shim'āth): An Ammonitess, the mother of Jozachar (or of Zabad, according to II Ch 24 26), one of the conspirators against Joash, King of Judah (II K 12 21). E. E. N.

SHIMEI, shim'ę-ai (שִׁמְעִי, shīm'ī, also Shimi, Ex 6 17 AV): 1. The second son of Gershon (Ex 6 17; Nu 3 18, etc.). The Shimeites (Zec 12 13; also Shimites, Nu 3 21 AV) are named after him; but they were neither a large nor a very coherent body. 2. A son of Gera, of the house of Saul (II S 16 5 ff.), a typical malcontent of the tribe of Benjamin during the reign of David. 3. A son of Ela and officer under Solomon (I K 4 18). During the last days of David, when Adonijah rebelled, he remained faithful to David (I K 1 8). 4. A Ramathite (I Ch 27 27). 5. A brother of David (also called Shimeah, II S 21 21). 6. A brother of Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 19). 7. A grandson of Simeon (I Ch 4 26). 8. A son of Joel, a Reubenite (I Ch 5 4). 9. The ancestral head of one of the main subdivisions of the Merarite Levites (I Ch 6 29). 10. A son of Jahath, also a Levite, ancestor of Asaph (I Ch 6 42, 25 17). 11. A Benjamite chief (I Ch 8 21, Shimhi AV, and Shema RVmg.). 12. An assistant superintendent of the treasury under Hezekiah (II Ch 31 12). 13. A Levite of the sons of Heman (II Ch 29 14). 14. A Levite who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 23). 15. One of the "sons of Hashum" (Ezr 10 33). 16. One of the "sons of Bani" (Ezr 10 38). 17. A Benjamite, ancestor of Mordecai (Est 2 5). SHIMRATH, shim'rath (שִׁמְרָת, shimrāth): A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 21). E. E. N.

SHIMRI, shim'rai (שִׁמְרִי, shimrī): 1. A Simeonite (I Ch 4 37). 2. The father of Jediael, one of David's heroes (I Ch 11 45). 3. A chief of the Merarites and head of a family of doorkeepers (I Ch 26 10). 4. A Levite who helped cleanse the Temple in the reign of Hezekiah (II Ch 29 13). C. S. T.

SHIMRITH, shim'rith (שִׁמְרִית, shimrīth): A Moabitess (II Ch 24 26); but see SHOMER. E. E. N.

SHIMRON, shim'rǫn (שִׁמְרוֹן, shimrōn): I. The fourth son of Issachar (Gn 46 13; Nu 26 24; I Ch 7 1), and ancestor of the Shimronites (Nu 26 24). II. A royal city of the Canaanites (Jos 11 1). It joined the confederacy formed by Jabin, King of Hazor, to withstand the advance of the Israelites into the region later called Galilee. Its site is a matter of conjecture. All that is certain is that it lay in the territory later assigned to the tribe of Zebulun, and probably in the northern portion of the same (19 15). Neubauer, following the Talmud, identifies it with the modern Semûnieh, 5 m. W. of Nazareth. It has an artificial hill with remains of a fortified city. It is also identified with es-Semeiriyeh, near Acre. Cf. the following article. C. S. T.

SHIMRON-MERON, -mi'rǫn (שִׁמְרוֹן מְרוֹן, shimrōn-merōn, K^{e}thibh; sh-mer'ōn, Q^{e}ri): A Canaanite town W of the Jordan, conquered by Joshua (Jos 12 20). It is possible that the names of two towns are intended, but it may be the fuller name for "Shimron" (q.v.). C. S. T.

SHIMSHAI, shim'shai, -shê, or -sha-ai (שִׁמְשַׁי, shimshay): A Persian official W of the Euphrates who with others made complaint to Artaxerxes I regarding the rebuilding of the walls (not the Temple) of Jerusalem by the Jews, probably after Ezra's arrival and, therefore, c. 450 B.C. (Ezr 4 8 ff.). E. E. N.

SHINAB, shai'nab (שִׁנְאָב, shin'ābh): King of Admah (Gn 14 2). E. E. N.

SHINAR, shai'nār (שִׁנְאָר, shin'ār): This term was probably the equivalent of the Babylonian shumer and seems originally to have stood for central Babylonia (Gn 11 2, 14 1, 9). Later, it was extended to include the whole of Babylonia (Gn 10 10; Is 11 11; Zec 5 11; Dt 1 2). See BABYLONIA, §§ 8, 10, 13. J. F. McC.

SHION, shai'ən (שִׁיאֹן, shī'ōn, Shihon AV): A city of Issachar (Jos 19 19). Map IV, D 7

SHIPMASTER. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, §2.

SHIPS AND NAVIGATION: As long as the Israelite tribes were limited to the highland of Palestine, they concerned themselves little with ships and navigation. The oldest notices (Jg 5 17; Gn 49 13) speak only of the smaller tribes Asher and Zebulun as having their abode on the coast of the sea, and indicate nothing as to their participation in navigation. On the other hand, the charge brought against Dan in Jg 5 17 is to be understood in the sense that the people of this tribe were engaged in the service of the Phœnician shipowners instead of partaking in the holy war in the name of J" It was only when David and Solomon needed the help of the Phœnicians in their building operations that navigation came to have some importance for Israel. For the messengers who passed back and forth between Tyre and Jerusalem, for the carpenters and stone-masons who were sent by Hiram to Jerusalem, for the workmen who were sent by Solomon to Lebanon, as well as for his contributions of wheat and oil to Hiram (II S 5 11; I K 5 15-32, 9 11, 14), during the favorable season of the year, the journey by sea was more convenient than by land. The Chronicler (II Ch 2 2-15; Ezr 3 7) supposed that the timbers procured from Hiram were brought in rafts to Joppa and thence overland to Jerusalem, but since the older source (I K 5 22 f.) leaves the choice of the port to Solomon, and since this monarch, according to Jg 1 27 f., Jos 17 11, had something to do with the well-known harbor Dor, S. of Carmel, it is very probable that the trade between him and the Phœnicians made use of this harbor. The second port which was in possession of Solomon and his successors (until 845, and, later, until 735) was Elath (Eloth, q.v.), on the Red Sea. From this place Solomon not only made claim to his share of the commerce with Arabia, but from here also he once undertook to send an expedition to the gold coast of Ophir. The harbor of Dor served him for the undertakings which he carried on in common with the Phœnicians on the Mediterranean. The destination of the latter voyages was Tarshish (Lat. Tartessus), that is, the Andalusian plain on both banks of the Guadalquivir in southern Spain. In both cases the voyage consumed three years (I K 10 22; II Ch 9 21). In later times the harbor of Dor belonged to the Northern Kingdom, two of whose tribes, Zebulun and Issachar, were famed (Dt 33 18 f.) in that they enjoyed the treasures of the sea. Consequently, navigation was not altogether unknown to both parts of Israel before the Exile, and that the case was not otherwise with the Jews after the Exile is evidenced in many places in the later literature (Jon 1 3 ff., where the prophet is mentioned as paying a regular fare; Ps 107 23-32; Pr 31 14; Ec 11 1; Is 33 21-23). About 145 B.C. Simon the Hasmonean made Joppa a harbor for Judæa (I Mac 14 5). The Roman edicts (Jos. Ant. XIV, 10) contain many references to the over-sea connections of the Jews, and Hyrcanus accused his brother Aristobulus before Pompey of being guilty of piracy (Ant. XIV, 3 2). In the times of Jesus there were many fishing-boats (πλοιάρια) on the Sea of Gennesaret, Josephus making mention of 330 small boats which he had assembled at Taricheæ (BJ, II, 21 8).

1. Historical.

2. Terminology.

The most common word for ship in the O T is 'ŏnī (nomen collectivum), rendered navy in I K 9 26 f., etc., and galley in Is 33 21. For a single ship the term is 'ŏniyyāh (nomen unitatis). These terms are used as well for the little reed or papyrus boats common on the Nile, made of bundles of reeds woven together, similar to mere floats (Job 9 26; cf. Is 18 2; Pliny, HN, 13 21 ff.; Erman, Aegypten. p. 635 f.), as for the large merchant-ships which sailed the open sea (Pr 31 14; Ezk 27 9; Ps 107 23). The expression ships of Tarshish meant originally such ships as made voyages to the land of Tarshish (q.v.) (I K 10 22; II Ch 9 21, 20 35 ff.). Then it was used in a wider sense for large seagoing ships in general (Is 2 16; I K 22 49; Ps 48 8). The word tsī, according to Spiegelberg (ZDMG, 53, 638), came over into the Canaanite speech from the Egyptian about the time of the New Empire. In Nu 24 24, Dn 11 30, Is 33 21 it means war-ships. In Ezk 30 9 it is used of the swift-sailing Nile boats. The word ṣ'phīnāh is found only in Jon 1 5.

Of the different parts of a ship the following find mention in Ezk 27 1-9a, 25-36: the 'double planks' (luḥōthayim), i.e., the outer and inner planks (or boards AV), made of cypress from Mt. Senir (Hermon); the mast (tōren), made of the cedar of Lebanon; the oars (mishshōṭ, ver. 6; māshōṭ, ver. 29), of the oaks of Bashan; the deck (qeresh, benches EV, possibly only the covering of the rear deck), of pine (the'ashshūr) from the coasts (isles) of the Kittæans; and the sail (miphrās), of costly Egyptian material (shēsh, byssus) adorned with "broidered work," as was fitting for the wealth of Tyre. This decorated sail served also as an ensign (nēṣ) for the ship, as, e.g., in the battle of Actium the ship of Antony and that of Cleopatra each carried a purple sail, indicative of its rank as the admiral's ship. Of flags or pennants there is no evidence on the representations of Phœnician ships found on the monuments (cf. Layard, Monuments of Nineveh, 1853, Plate 71). For protection against the rays of the sun, over the after-deck an awning of blue or purple material was stretched (ver. 7, mikhṣekh). The shipmen (I K 9 27) or mariners were called in general mallāḥ (cf. the Babylonian malakhu); the steersmen, shāṭīm (rowers EV), ver. 8; cf. ver. 29; while the term ḥōbhlīm (pilots EV) originally designated the sailors who had to do with the tackling (ḥebhel, σκευή). The shipmaster (Jon 1 6) was both the owner and sailing-master.

In the time to which the account of Paul's voyage to Rome belongs (Ac ch. 27 f.) there were sailing-ships of considerable size, which carried, in addition to the large mainmast, also a foremast at the bow. We find no mention of a third mast, that is, mizzen-mast. Ships were distinguished as carrying a single sail, two sails, or three sails, that is, according as the ship had only the original large sail or also a sail on the foremast (ἀρτέμων, foresail Ac 27 40, main-sail AV), or, along with these, also the three-cornered supparum of the Romans above the mainsail. The sails with their accompanying yards, etc., are all comprehended under the term gear (σκεῦος, Ac 27 17). On the stern (πρύμνη), alongside of the flag-staff which carried the pennant, probably stood images of deity (Wis 14 1). The bowhead was shaped so as to represent the sign of the ship (παράσημον, Ac 28 11), which, in the case of the ship used by Paul, consisted in the image of the Dioscuri (twin brothers) Castor and Pollux. The rudders (τὰ πηδάλια) hung by straps or ropes from the after-part of the ship. There the steersman (κυβερνήτης, master, Ac 27 11; εὐθύνων, governor AV, Ja 3 4) sat and held the rudder or helm with his right hand, consequently the distinction was made between the starboard (the steering-board) and the larboard (the 'empty' board). When the steering-oar was not used, as, for example, when the ship was in harbor or at times in a storm, it was made fast either on the side of the ship or on deck (Ac 27 40). For holding the ship at anchor originally large stones were used, but in Roman times small anchors, of which usually several were carried on board (Ac 27 29 f.). The seams of the ship were calked, if the rendering calkers (Ezk 27 9, 27) is correct. But the term probably means only "ship's carpenter." It was customary, when necessary, to sound the depth of the water by means of a lead or other weight attached to a line (Ac 27 27).

The Hunter is Accompanied by His Wife in a Skiff Made of Papyrus.

On the basis of records of observations, navigators' coast- and sailing-charts (periplus, stadiasmus) were constructed. Through long experience sailors learned to estimate correctly distances and the speed of a ship, but when on the open sea they were able to ascertain their direction and the place where they were only by means of the stars, consequently only with a clear sky (Ac 27 20). As a result, navigation was carried on, as a rule, only from spring to fall (cf. the mention of the 'fast' in Ac 27 9, by which is meant the fasts connected with the great Day of Atonement in the fall, Lv 16 29, 23 26 f.). Sailors were acquainted with and made use of the currents, e.g., Paul's ship which worked northward from Sidon with a contrary W wind, in order to be carried westward by the coast stream which flows through the sea near Cilicia and Pamphylia N. of Cyprus (Ac 27 4 f.). As in Ezk 27 26 the E. wind is mentioned as destructive of the large ships upon the open sea, so in Ac 27 14 it is the εὐρακύλων ("Euraquilo"), the ENE. wind, that proved dangerous to the ship of Paul. By the expression "they used helps undergirding the ship" (Ac 27 17), we are to understand either, with Breusing, that strong cables were placed around the ship lengthwise from stem to stern above the water-line; or, with Balmer, that the cables were placed under the keel amidships and thus encircled the vessel.

SHISHA, shai'sha. See Shavsha.

SHISHAK, shai'shak (שִׁישַׁק, shīshaq): The Massoretic spelling for "Sheshonk" I, the founder of the 22d Egyptian dynasty, who, after having befriended Jeroboam (I K 11 40), invaded Palestine, c. 926 B.C. He not only sacked Jerusalem (I K 14 25; II Ch 12 2-9), but ravaged both the Northern and Southern Kingdoms. Sheshonk later built the great court of the Karnak temple (at Thebes), upon whose walls 156 Palestinian towns are represented as paying him tribute. See Breasted, Hist. Egypt (1905), pp. 527–531. See also Egypt, § 10; Pharaoh (6).

SHITRAI, shit-rê'ai -rê, shit'rai, or -ra-ai (שִׁטְרַי, shiṭray, but שִׁרְטַי, shirṭay, should probably be read): One of David's overseers (I Ch 27 29). E. E. N.

SHITTAH, shit'ā, SHITTAH-TREE and -WOOD. See PALESTINE, § 21.

SHITTIM, shit'im, VALE OF (נַחַל הַשִּׁטִּים, naḥal ha-shiṭṭīm), 'torrent-valley [or ravine] of the acacias' (Jl 3 18): Some dry, thirsty valley where acacias (a desert plant) were known to flourish is meant, possibly the Kidron (cf. Ezk 47 8 ff.), and not, probably, the old camping-ground of Israel E. of the Jordan (Nu 25 1, etc.). E. E. N.

SHITTIM-WOOD. See PALESTINE, § 21.

SHIZA, shai'za (שִׁזָא, shīzā'): The father of Adina, a Reubenite chieftain (I Ch 11 42). E. E. N.

SHOA, shō'a (שׁוֹעַ, shōa'): The name of a people, probably the Sutū of the Assyrian inscriptions (Ezk 23 23), E. of the Tigris. E. E. N.

SHOBAB, shō'bab (שׁוֹבָב, shōbhābh), 'rebellious': 1. A son of David (II S 5 14; I Ch 3 5, 14 4). 2. A Calebite family or clan (I Ch 2 18). E. E. N.

SHOBACH, shō'bac (שׁוֹבַךְ, shōbhakh): A captain of Hadadezer, King of Zobah. He led the Syrian forces against David, and was slain with many others at Helam, E. of the Jordan (II S 10 16, 18; cf. I Ch 19 16, 18, where he is called Shōphach). C. S. T.

SHOBAI, sho-bê'ai, shō'bê, or shō'ba-ai (שֹׁבַי, shōbhay): The ancestor of a family of porters (Ezr 2 42; Neh 7 45). E. E. N.

SHOBAL, shō'bal (שׁוֹבָל, shōbhāl): 1. The ancestral head of a clan of Horites (Gn 36 20-23), spoken of also as a clan-chief (ver. 29). 2. A Calebite clan inhabiting Kiriath-jearim (I Ch 2 50, 52). 3. The ancestral head of a clan of Judah (I Ch 4 1 f.). E. E. N.

SHOBEK, shō'bek (שׁוֹבֵק, shōbhēq): The name of a prominent family or clan in later Judaism, and of representatives of this family (Neh 10 24). E. E. N.

SHOBI, shō'bai (שׁוֹבִי, shōbhī): A son of Nahash, an Ammonite king of Rabbah. With Machir and Barzillai he brought furnishings and food to David, who had fled from Absalom to Mehanaim (II S 17 27 f.). Rabbah had been taken by David (II S 12 29 f.), and it is possible that he had made Shobi viceroy of Ammon (so H. P. Smith, ad loc.). S. A. Cook (AJSL, xvi, p. 164 f.) reads "Nahash brought," omitting "Shobi, the son of," and places II S 17 27 before chs. 10–12. C. S. T.

SHOE. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 7.

SHOHAM, shō'ham (שֹׁהַם, shōham), 'beryl' (?); cf. Gn 2 12, Heb.: The ancestral head of a family of Merarite Levites (I Ch 24 27). E. E. N.

SHOMER, shō'mer (שֹׁמֵר and שֹׁמֶר, shōmēr), 'keeper' (?): 1. The head of an Asherite family or clan (I Ch 7 32, called Shemer [Shamer AV] in ver. 34). 2. The mother of one of the conspirators against King Joash (II K 12 21); she was a Moabitess according to II Ch 24 26 (where the name is Shimrith). E. E. N.

SHOWBREAD. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 13.

SHRINES: The rendering of the Gr. naoí, 'temples' in Ac 19 24. What is meant were miniature reproductions of the façade of the Artemisium or Temple of Diana, usually of terra-cotta but also for rich purchasers of silver, representing Artemis seated in the pronaos holding her symbols (tympanum, phiale) in her hands and with a lion (lions) beside her. The more artistic 'temples' omitted the symbols, and depicted the goddess caressing a lion which climbs to her knee or lies in her lap. Such 'temples' (see Athenische Mittheilungen, II, Plate III) were dedicated by pilgrims in the temple, or taken home and placed on the graves of beloved dead. J. R. S. S

SHROUD: The word ḥōresh, rendered "shroud" (Ezk 31 3 AV), may mean 'forest' (cf. RV), but the text is uncertain. E. E. N.

SHUA, shū'a, SHUAH, shū'ā, SHUHITE, shū'hait: 1 (שׁוּעַ, shūa'). A Canaanite whose daughter Judah took for a wife (Gn 38 2, 12; I Ch 2 3). 2 (שׁוּעָא, shū'ā'). An Asherite clan (I Ch 7 32). 3 (שׁוּחַ, shūaḥ). A "son" of Keturah, i.e., an Arabian tribe (Gn 25 2; see also Job 2 11, 8 1, etc.). 4. See SHUHAH; also ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11. E. E. N.

SHUAL, shū'al (שׁוּעָל, shū'al), 'fox': I. A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 36). II. The "land of Shual" (I S 13 17) was a district N. of Michmash in the direction of Ophrah. See Map III. F 4. E. E. N.

SHUBAEL, shū'ba-el. See SHEBUEL.

SHUHAH, shū'hā (שׁוּחָה, shūḥāh, Shuah AV): A name in the genealogy of Judah (I Ch 4 11). E. E. N.

SHUHAM, shū'ham, SHUHAMITE, shū'ham-ait. See HUSHIM.

SHUHITE, shū'hait. See SHUAH and BILDAD.

SHULAMITE, shū'lam-ait (שׁוּלַמִּית, shūlammīth, 'native of Shulem,' by which, probably, Shunem (q.v.) is meant: Perhaps the Shunammite women (Song 6 13) were noted for their beauty (cf. I K 1 3). E. E. N.

SHUMATHITES, shū'math-aits (שִׁמְעָתִי, shumāthī): One of the leading families of Kiriath-jearim (I Ch 2 53). E. E. N.

SHUNAMMITE, shū'nam-ait (שׁוּנַמִּית, shūnammīth), 'a woman of Shunem': 1. Abishag, David's nurse (I K 1 3, etc.). 2. A woman of wealth, who showed great kindness to Elisha. The narrative (II K 4 8-37) throws light on many details of social life in ancient Israel. Some time after the events there narrated the woman left Israel during a famine, and in her absence her property was seized by others. Upon her return, the king ordered it all restored to her, being influenced mainly by her kindly relations with Elisha (II K 8 1-6). E. E. N.

SHUNEM, shū'nem (שׁוּנֵם, shūnēm): A town assigned to Issachar (Jos 19 18), and the place where the Philistines encamped before their victory over Saul in Mount Gilboa (I S 28 4). The modern name of the place is Sûlem (the interchange of n and l being not uncommon), which is situated on the SW slope of Jebel Daḥî (Little Hermon), about 5 m. S. of Tabor and 3 N. of Jezreel. Map IV, C 8. The view from the gardens above the village is extensive. The Shulamite, the heroine of the Song of Songs (6 13), probably came from Shunem; indeed, she may have been identical with Abishag mentioned in I K 1 3 ff. Probably, at this same Shunem also Elisha found his kindly hostess the "great woman" of II K 4 8, though her home has been located by Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. 295, 86; 153, 18) "within the border of Sebaste in the region of Acrabattine"—i.e., in Samaria. G. L. R.

SHUNI, shū'nai, SHUNITE, shū'nait (שׁוּנִי, shūnī): The ancestral head of the Shunites (Nu 26 15), a clan of Gad (Gn 46 16). E. E. N.

SHUPHAM, shū'fam, SHUPHAMITE, shū'fam-ait. See SHEPHUPHAM.

SHUPPIM, shup'pim. See MUPPIM.

SHUR, shūr or shōr (שׁוּר, shūr), 'wall': A desert district on the NE. border of Egypt (I S 15 7, 27 8), where the angel found Hagar (Gn 16 7). Abraham dwelt between S. and Kadesh (Gn 20 1), and contiguous to S. was the territory occupied by the Ishmaelites (25 18), into which the Israelites entered after crossing the Red Sea (Ex 15 22). It received its name very probably from the wall across the isthmus, which in very early times was constructed by the Egyptians as a defense against their Asiatic foes. G. L. R.

SHUSHAN, shū'shan (שׁוּשָׁן, shūshan): The ancient capital of Elam (later Susiana), the Susa of the Greek historians (cf. Add. to Est. 11 3). Its convenient and central location gave it an advantage in the race for the first place among the cities E. of Babylonia. As early as the 23d cent. B.C. it is referred to as already in existence ("the old city"). Though enduring many sieges and captures (cf. Rawlinson, Anc. Mon.[2] II, p. 105), notably that by Asshurbanipal (647 B.C.), it continued to hold its place as the capital of an independent state until taken by Cyrus and made one of the three royal residences of the Persian monarchs (Xenoph. Cyrop. VIII, 6 22; Herod. III, 30, 65, 70). Darius Hystaspes chose it as the site of the famous palace referred to in Dn 8 2. The story of Esther, placed as it is in the days of Xerxes ("Ahasuerus," 486–465), is also enacted in this palace (Est 1 2-7). Alexander the Great made a triumphal entry into S. (Arrian, Exp. Alex. III, 16), but under his successors the city dwindled away and fell into ruin. The site was excavated by Loftus (Chaldea and Susiana, 1857). Cf. also Dieulafoy, La Perse, la Chaldée et la Susiane (1887); L'Acropole de Suse (1890); Billerbeck, Susa (1893). The Shushanchites (Ezr 4 9, Susanchites AV) were colonists from Shushan, transported by Asshurbanipal ("Osnappar") to Samaria.

A. C. Z.

SHUSHANCHITE, shu-shan'cait (שׁוּשַׁנְכָיֵא, shūshankhāyē' [Aram.], Susanchite AV): Colonists in Syria whose original home was Shushan (q.v.) (Ezr 4 9). E. E. N.

SHUSHAN-EDUTH, shū"shan-î'duth. See MUSIC, § 6.

SHUTHELAH, shu-thî'lā or shū'thę-lā (שׁוּתֶלַח, shūthelaḥ): 1. Ancestral head of the Shuthelaites (Shuthalhites AV), a clan of Ephraim (Nu 26 35 f.; I Ch 7 20). 2. An Ephraimite family (I Ch 7 21). E. E. N.

SHUTTLE. See ARTISAN LIFE, § 12.

SIA, sai'a, SIAHA, sai'a-ha (סִיעָא, ṣī'ăhā' [Ezr], סִיעָא, ṣī'ā' [Neh]): The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 44; Neh 7 47). E. E. N.

SIBBECAI, SIBBECHAI, sib"ę-kê'ai or -kê (סִבְּכַי, ṣibbᵉkhay): One of David's heroes, a Hushathite, who slew a giant (II S 21 18; I Ch 11 29, 20 4) and an officer in his army (I Ch 27 11). He is wrongly called Mebunnai (corrupt text for 'of the sons of') in II S 23 27. See HUSHAH. E. E. N.

SIBBOLETH, sib'o-leth. See SHIBBOLETH.

SIBMAH, sib'mā (שִׂבְמָה, sibhmāh): A city of Moab, assigned to Reuben (Nu 32 3 [here called Shebam], 38 [Shibmah AV]; Jos 13 19); it was famous for its vintage (Is 16 8, 9; Jer 48 32). The site on Map II, J1 may be too far north. E. E. N.

SIBRAIM, sib-rê'im or sib'ra-im (סִבְרַיִם, ṣibhrayim): A city on the (ideal) N. border of Israel (Ezk 47 16). Site unknown. E. E. N.

SICHEM, sai'kem. See SHECHEM.

SICK, SICKNESS. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5.

SICKLE. See AGRICULTURE, § 5.

SIDDIM, sid'dim (שִׂדִּים, siddīm), VALE OF: A place mentioned only in Gn 14 3-10, where it is said to have been full of bitumen pits (ver. 10) and apparently is identified with the Dead Sea (ver. 3). The reference, however, may be only to the southern part of the sea, below the peninsula el-Lisân, where the water is very shallow (less than 11 ft. deep, as against 1,310 ft. in the northern basin). It is possible that this end of the Dead Sea may have been dry land in the time of Abraham, or at least a salt marsh, like the present es-Sebkha just to the south. See DEAD SEA and PALESTINE, § 12(b), and cf. the illuminating excursus in Driver's Genesis, pp. 168–173. L. G. L.

SIDES: The rendering of the Heb. yarkᵉthē (Jon 1 5 AV). The RV rendering "innermost parts" is much more accurate. E. E. N.

SIDON, sai'dən. See ZIDON.

SIEGE, SIEGE-WORKS. See BESIEGE.

SIGN. See WONDER and SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

SIGNET: In antiquity. when the art of writing was confined to professional scribes, the signet performed the important function of authenticating all documents whether public or private. Archeologists have recovered numerous specimens of those used in Babylonia and Egypt; some of these signets have been referred to as early a date as 4500 B.C. The Egyptian signet was in the form of a scarab, while the Babylonians preferred the cylindrical shape. The first mention in the O T is in the story of Judah and Tamar, where it serves as a pledge (Gn 38 18, 25 [J]). The Hebrew signet was either oval or conical in shape; sometimes the stone was set in a ring, at other times worn around the neck on a cord, as is the case with the modern Arab. Some had a simple inscription of the owner's name, others were ornately decorated. In the excavations at Gezer many specimens of scarabs have been recovered, and some rude Canaanitish seals, as well as jar handles stamped with Hebrew seals. The materials were various—amethyst, crystal, steatite, glass, paste, etc. See also SEAL, and for illustration, DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II, § 1. J. A. K.

SIHON, sai'hən (סִיחֹן, sīḥōn): A king of the Amorite kingdom between the Arnon and the Jabbok (Nu 21 21; Dt 1 4, 2 26 f., etc.); also called king of Heshbon, his capital city (Dt 2 30; Nu 21 26, etc.). "Sihon" is used as parallel to "Heshbon" (Nu 21 28; Jer 48 45). He refused to let the Israelites pass through his kingdom, and as a result was slain at Jahaz, and Israel took possession of his territory (Nu 21 21 ff.). In Nu 21 26 it is said that S. conquered his kingdom from Moab, and Nu 21 27-30 is intended to commemorate this conquest. This passage, however, probably refers to a conquest of Moab by Israel at a later date. C. S. T.

SIHOR, sai'hōr. See NILE.

SILAS, sai'ləs, SILVANUS, sil-vê'nʊs (Σίλας, Σιλουανός): A companion and friend of Paul. The original name was probably Silas, a word of Semitic, not Greek, origin (cf. CISem. II, No. 101, shīlī; also, in Palmyrene inscriptions, sh'īlā). Only this form of the name is found in Ac (15 22 ff., 16 19 f., 17 4 f., 18 5). But there is little doubt as to the identity of Silas with the Silvanus of Paul's Epistles, since the two play almost exactly the same rôle in the second missionary journey (cf. Ac 17 4 f., 18 5 with I Th 1 1 and II Co 1 19). If, as seems to be the case, Silas is included in the "we" (us) of Ac 16 37 f. he was a Roman citizen, and Silvanus, like Paulus, may have been an adopted name. He seems to have been one of the leading men (ἡγούμενος, Ac 15 22) in the Jerusalem church, which accounts for his having been sent with Judas Barsabbas as a messenger to the churches in Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia (Ac 15 23-28). It may have been Silas' familiarity with the details of the history of the Palestinian church that led Paul to take Silas with him on the second missionary journey (Ac 15 40). Silas possessed prophetic gifts (cf. Ac 15 34 [according to D], 32, 17 15 [according to D]). Whether the Silvanus "through whom" the author of I P wrote (I P 5 12) is to be identified with the companion of Paul depends upon conclusions as to the date and authorship of this Epistle (see PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF). J. M. T.

SILK: (1) The Heb. meshī (Ezk 16 10, 13) means 'silk' according to rabbinic tradition, otherwise its exact meaning is unknown. In any case, it must have been cloth of fine texture. (2) On Pr 31 22, see LINEN. (3) In the N T σηρικόν (Rev 18 12) is the classic word for silk (from Σήρ, the people of India who first supplied the West with silk). See also DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 5. E. E. N.

SILLA, sil'ə (סִלָּא, ṣillā'): A place near Jerusalem (II K 12 20). Site unknown. E. E. N.

SILOAH, si-lō'ā or sil'o-ā, SILOAM, SILOAM, POOL OF. See JERUSALEM, § 13.

SILOAM, si-lō'am or sil'o-am, INSCRIPTION: An inscription in the old Heb. script (discovered in 1880) recording the completion of the underground conduit from Gihon to the Pool of Siloam. It is incised into the E. wall of the tunnel about 25 ft. from its exit at the Pool of Siloam. It is generally held that it dates from the reign of Hezekiah (cf. II Ch 32 4, 30). For a transcription of this inscription see ALPHABET and for the translation see JERUSALEM, § 34. E. E. N.

SIMEON, sim'ē-ən; in the O T שִׁמְעוֹן (shim'ōn), 'heard'; in the N T Σιμεών (also Symeon, Συμεών, in RV of Lk 3 30; Ac 13 11, 15 14): 1. The O T Patriarch and the tribe named after him (Gn 29 33, etc.). See TRIBE, TRIBES, §§ 2–4. 2. One of the ancestors of Jesus (Lk 3 30). 3. An alternate form of "Simon," which was also the name of the Apostle Peter (Ac 15 14; II P 1 1). 4. A spiritually minded man who, according to the infancy narrative (Lk 2 22-39), was supernaturally illumined, and thus empowered to recognize in the child Jesus the expected Redeemer of Israel. His conception of the true work of the Messiah was clearly molded by the picture of the servant of J" in Is 42 7 and 52 12–53 13. This he embodies in the poetic address known in liturgical lore as the Nunc Dimittis, and in the supplementary words to Mary (ver. 34). S. was one of the "Pious," who were "looking for the consolation of Israel." They almost constituted a party at this time, though, unlike the Zealots, they were without political aims and, submissive to the will of Jehovah (and they were spoken of frequently as "the meek," "the humble"), they waited for His salvation. This devout element had persisted in Israel from the time of the earlier prophets (Am 2 6), although it found utterance especially in the Psalms and later prophets (Ps 22 26, 35 10, 68 10; Is 41 17), where the "poor"—i.e., the godly poor—though grievously oppressed by a cruel aristocracy or a foreign enemy and forming only a small minority, represent the ideal Israel, and hope for speedy deliverance by Jehovah. See also MEEK. 5. An aggressive member of the first Christian community, mentioned among the prophets and teachers (Ac 13 1), who bore also the surname "Niger." He is numbered by Epiphanius (1:337) among the seventy-two disciples.

SIMON, sī'mŭn or-mən [MAGUS], mē'gŭs (Σίμων [Μάγος]): An important figure in the heretical history of the early Church. In the earliest sources (Ac and Justin Martyr) he is called simply Simon; "Magus" is a later addition used to distinguish this Simon from others having the same name (e.g., Simon Peter).

1. In the O T.

The earliest reference to S. is found in Ac 8 9-24. Here he is mentioned incidentally,[1] the passage being merely an episode in connection with the story of the spread of the gospel in Samaria. The essential points in the description of S. in Ac are (1) the strong influence which he exerted upon the Samaritans,[2] and (2) his practise of magic (μαγεύων, ver. 9). Opinion concerning him (ostensibly Samaritan opinion) is crystallized in the phrase, "This man is that power of God which is called Great." "Power of God" is hardly to be understood in a Gnostic sense, as by the Church Fathers (see § 2, below), as if it implied a claim to divinity on the part of S.; it gives rather the impression made by his words, i.e., they are such as seem to be wrought by the power of God. This is the usage elsewhere in the N T (cf. Mt 13 54; Mk 6 5; Jn passim). The phrase that follows, "which is called Great," is evidently one of those explanations of which Luke is fond (cf. Ac 1 19, 9 11, 10 1, 27 14). It may be an attempted translation, or even a transliteration (so Klostermann, Probleme im Apostoltexte, pp. 15 ff.), of an Aramaic (or Samaritan) word, possibly one of S.'s esoteric names[3] (cf. ver. 9, λέγων εἶναί τινα ἑαυτὸν μέγαν, and see BAR-JESUS). While the passage in Ac is too episodical to enable us to draw conclusions as to the nature of the teaching of S., the connection of the same with the profession and practise of magic is beyond question, if indeed this be not the reason for its introduction by the writer.[1]

2. In the Church Fathers.

Overmuch dependence is not to be placed upon the statements of Justin Martyr (Apol. I, 26, 56; Dial. 120). (1) His purpose is rhetorical (cf. Apol. I, 26). (2) In one particular at least Justin is known to be in error. The statue in the Tiber to which he refers in Apol. I, 26, was not dedicated to Simon Magus by imperial decree, but set up by a private individual to the Sabine god, Semo Sancus. It is probable that Justin's mention of a Roman visit by Simon was suggested by the statue, and is without basis in fact. On the other hand, it must be admitted that Justin's account contains statements about the Samaritan Simon which there is no good reason to question, especially in view of Justin's own Samaritan origin. Thus, Gitta (Justin, Γιττῶν), the name of the native village of S., Helene, the name of his wife, and Menander, one of his followers, suggest actual tradition. (3) Justin's representation of the teaching of S. is hardly consistent with the statements of Ac. He represents S. as claiming to be the "first God" (ὁ πρῶτος θεός, Apol. I, 26) and "God above every principality and authority and power" (Dial. 120). These are clearly Gnostic terms, not the language of magic like that of Ac. The use of the former by Justin is natural in view of the fact that he himself wrote a treatise against all heresies (Apol. I, 26). While his account is based upon actual traditions, it is undoubtedly colored by his own antiheretical tendencies.

Irenæus' notice of S. (Adver. Hær. I, 23) is very little more than an expansion in the light of 2d-cent. Gnosticism of Justin's account, which is apparently quoted (dicitur) in connection with the supposed statue in honor of S. In Irenæus, S.'s wife, Helene, becomes the Gnostic ἔννοια, the eon dwelling in humanity. S. is no longer represented as claiming to be merely the supreme God, "who descends in Samaria as the Father," but also the delivering eon, who "descends among the Jews as the Son." He is represented as the founder of a sect called Simonians, who are charged with practise of magic and immorality. Hegesippus (Eus. HE, IV, 22 4), Tertullian (De Anima, 34 1), Clement of Alexandria (Strom. VII, 17), Origen (Contra Celsum, V, 62), Eusebius (HE, II, 13 14), add practically nothing new, but Hippolytus (Refut. V, 14) gives what purport to be quotations from a work by S. concerning "the Great Revelation." A complete Gnostic system is ascribed to him, which Hippolytus declares to have been the starting-point of the system of Valentinus. From these passages it is clear, (1) that there existed in the 2d cent. a sect calling themselves Simonians, and (2) that the origin of this sect was traced back, not only by writers on heresy, but by the sect itself to one S., and (3) that remnants of this sect seem to [1] For this reason Schmiedel (EB, art. Simon Magus) is wrong when he makes the writer's failure to complete the history of Simon an argument against the genuineness of the passage in Ac.

[2] It will be noted that the term used is ἔθνος, not πόλις (ver. 10a), as if the influence of S. were more than local. For the presence of Samaritan magic in Egypt, compare the alleged letter of Hadrian to Servianus (Vopiscus, Vita Saturnini, ch. 8).

[3] The use of this term in magical formulas is evidenced. An interesting parallel to Ac 8 9, cited by Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 336 (2d Eng. ed.), is found in Pap. Par. Bibl. nat. 1, 1275 f. (Wessely, I, 76), where the following is found in what seems to be a love incantation: ἐπικαλοῦμαι σε τὴν μεγίστην, δύναμιν τὴν ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ (v. l. τὴν ἐν τῇ ἄρκτῳ) ὑπὸ κυρίου θεοῦ τεταγμένην.

[1] Luke shows a tendency to bring the gospel and its representatives into victorious conflict with magicians and their arts, notably in the case of Sceva (q.v.) in Ac 19 14 (cf. Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 271 f.). Elsewhere also he shows himself familiar with the technical language of magic (cf. πνεῦμα πύθωνα, Ac 16 16; περίεργα, Ac 19 19).

have survived to Origen's time, although at this date it had practically disappeared (Contra Celsum, I, 57). For the possible relation of this S. to the S. of Ac 8 9-24, see below, § 4.

3. In Gnostic and Ebionitic Literature. A somewhat different representation of S. meets us in the so-called Gnostic Acts and the Ebionitic literature of the 3d and 4th cents. In the Acta Petri cum Simone we have a fanciful representation of a contest between Peter and S. before the Emperor Nero, but this takes place after Paul's departure from Rome. In the Acts of Peter and of Paul, Paul appears as the companion of Peter There is nothing in these Acts to indicate opposition between Peter and Paul (against Schmiedel in EB, art. Simon Magus, who makes S. and Paul identical). On the other hand, in the Clementine Recognitions and Homilies, Paulinism is clearly attacked under the guise of a contest between Peter and S. (cf. Letter of James, prefixed to the Homilies, ch. 2; Recog. I, 70). But there are other passages (cf. especially the history of S. given in Recog. VII–XVIII) which can not be explained as concealed references to Paul. The most natural explanation is that the attack on Paulinism, while real, is incidental to the main object of the work, viz., a romantic description of its hero Peter (against Baur, Tüb. Zeitschr. 1831, p. 116 f.; Lipsius, Die apok. Apostelgesch. 1883; Schmiedel, loc. cit.).

4. Critical Conclusions. There is no sufficient reason for doubting the historical character of S. On the other hand, it may well be questioned whether his relation to 2d-cent. Gnosticism is that claimed by Hippolytus and Irenæus (see GNOSTICISM). S. was confessedly a Samaritan, but all that we know of Samaritan religious conceptions from the historians and later liturgies (cf. Cowley, Samaritan Conceptions of the Messiah, Expositor, March, 1895, pp. 161–174) is remote from the teachings of 2d-cent. Gnosticism. The Messiah in Samaritan conception was simply the 'revealer' (Jn 4 25) or 'restorer,' ta'ebh, not the "great God" (Justin, Apol. I, 26), or "standing one" (Clement of Alex., Strom. II, 11; Hippolytus, Refut. VI, 4). Neither are the patristic representations of S. as the founder of Gnosticism self-consistent. While all sorts of Gnostic teachings are attributed to him, it is noteworthy that in all the representations of the sect of Simonians only their practise of magical arts and rites are spoken of (cf. Justin, Apol. I, 26; Irenæus, Adv. Hær. I, 26, 4; Hippolytus, Refut. VI, 15; Celsus, quoted by Origen, Contra Cel. I, 62). It is not an infrequent occurrence for those writing against heresy, and even for heretical sects themselves, arbitrarily to connect their teachings with well-known personalities. A case in point is that of Nicolaus in Ac 6 5, who, without sufficient reasons, is made the founder of the sect of Nicolaitans (Rev 2 6, 15; cf. Irenæus, Adv. Hær. I, 26; Hippolytus, Refut. VII, 1, 24); notably also Cerinthus, whose original propaganda had little or nothing to do with Gnosticism. In the same way, the name of the Samaritan S. might have been easily associated with a heretical Gnostic sect, particularly if a sect known as Simonians actually existed in the 2d cent. Or it is even possible that a purely magical sect, such as might have arisen from the conditions suggested in Ac ch. 8, afterward developed along Gnostic lines. But at the time of Ac ch. 8 this development had certainly not yet begun.

SIMPLE, SIMPLICITY: In the O T this term "simple" is used, mainly in Pr, as the rendering of pᵉthī, which expresses the idea of being easily led astray or persuaded, and which is almost a technical term in the Wisdom literature. In one passage "simplicity" renders the Heb. tōm, 'completeness,' 'integrity,' i.e., with no knowledge of Absalom's plan (II S 15 11). In the N T ἄκακος, 'not bad,' is rendered "simple" (Ro 16 18 AV, "innocent" RV), and in the succeeding verse (Ro 16 19) the word so rendered is ἀκέραιος, 'unmixed.' "Simplicity" (Ro 12 8; II Co 1 12, 11 3) is the rendering of ἁπλότης, 'singleness' or 'sincerity' (cf. Eph 6 5, 3 22, where the same Gr. word is used).

1. Usage of Terms. The O T terms rendered "sin" are ḥaṭā'th, ḥaṭā'āh, ḥēṭ', 'missing the mark'; 'āwōn, lit. 'crooked' (contrasted with yāshār, 'straight' as in Eng.; or as wrong [from "wrung"], contrasted with right), hence iniquity; pesha', 'disobedience,' 'rebellion'; resha', 'wickedness.' The N T words are ἁμαρτία (ἁμάρτημα), 'error' (lit. 'missing the mark'), παράβασις, 'passing over,' 'stepping aside' (across) a normal line (or path); παράπτωμα, 'falling aside' (hence both these last convey almost exactly the idea of transgression); παρακοή, 'disobedience'; ἀσέβεια, 'impiety'; ἀδικία, 'injustice,' 'unrighteousness'; ὀφείλημα, 'debt' (cf. also ἀνομία, 'lawlessness,' Jn 3 4).

2. General Nature of Sin. The kernel of the conception as given by the etymology of these terms is that of deviation from a line given as the standard. If the standard be viewed as a goal to be reached, sin consists in missing it; if it be a norm authoritatively set (a law) with a command to conform to it, sin is disobedience. If it be an ideal perceived by the moral sense, sin is a failure. In any case it is what ought not to be. And whether looked at as missing the mark, departing from the line, or disobeying a command, its main feature is that it offends God.

3. National Sin: Development of the Conception. In the O T the idea of sin emerges in the consciousness of God's Chosen People as early as the revelation of God Himself, and the revelation of His will. But inasmuch as the covenant of J" was from the beginning with the people as a whole, the first conception on the subject is associated with the corporate or national consciousness. It is the people that sin. And the sinfulness of the people is largely that of their kings or leaders in the conduct of public affairs. But even personal offenses on the part of a prominent man do not remain matters between himself and God, but are shared in by the community at large; they are an abomination, bringing down the anger of God on the whole body. But if the essence of sin is offense against J", it follows that the gravest particular sin is preeminently the prevalence among the people of the spirit of departure from J″, i.e., the tendeney to offer worship to idols. But as J″ is the Righteous One, the prophets associate with this faet praetises alien and offensive to the charaeter of Jehovah (eommon vices, such as disregard for life, purity, property). Hosea views sin as the estrangement of the heart of Israel from its God; Isaiah, as insensibility to the holiness and majesty of J″ All the prophets regard it as moral disease and corruption in some part or aspect of communal life. This social or corporate consciousness of sin is embodied in the saerificial ritual whieh provides for the removal and expiation of guilt contracted by the people as a whole (Lv 4 13 f.; cf. also the ritual of the great Day of Atonement, Lv 16 15 f.). The collapse of the national organization with the Exile brought the individual into the foreground, and sin was seen to be rooted in the individual (Ex 33 7 ff., "The soul that sinneth, it shall die"). At the same time, the whole effect of the preaching of the prophets had emphasized the ethical side of religion and revealed the identity of transgression of religious ceremonial law with transgression of moral law, and thus completed the idea of sin as moral evil in the eyes of God. But this was always an ideal; for as ceremonial purity became more and more a goal to be aimed at for itself, sin also came to be viewed as violation of ceremonial preseription. In the N T age, those who lived in disregard of ceremonial prescription were called sinners, and separated into a class clearly distinguishable, on a par with publicans (Mt 9 10; Mk 2 15). The Gentiles from this point of view were all sinners (Gal 2 15). It was only by the teaching of Jesus that the further growth of this tendency was arrested, and the conception was restored to its purely ethical plaee, whcre it is afterward uniformly held by the Apostles and other N T writers.

Sin thus in its fullest and clearest Biblical conception is moral evil as an offense against God. The coneeption ineludes lower views of it, sueh as emphasize the element of folly in sin, and sueh as make it a souree of distressing results, or of the deprivation of the rights of other men; but except as incidentally introduced, all these are subordinated to the main idea that the evil of sin consists in its displeasing God. In the earliest legislation [the Book of the Covenant] oppression and wrong are thus brought under the head of sin (Ex 22 23). The wiekedness of man grieves God, and calls out for judgment and punishment at His hands (Gn 6 5-7, 4 10). In the hearts of upright men like Abraham and Joseph (Gn 22 11, 39 9) it is the fear of displeasing God that serves as the motive of avoiding sin, and not regard for consequences, or the bare faet that sinful conduet was viewed by custom as improper. The preaehing of the prophets derived the impetus and vehemenee whieh characterized it from the eonvietion that God was opposed to sin. Conversely, penitenee is not sorrow for sin per se, but arises from a reeognition of God's right to judge and avenge evil. This is predominantly the trend of thought in the Psalms (50, 51, 130, 143; "Against thee, thee only have I sinned," 51 4).

In harmony with this view, sin is regarded as a voluntary departure from God or disobedienee of His law. It is not an eternal, indestructible principle, inherent in the nature of things (as in Zoroastrianism) and entangling its human victim in its meshes. Nor does it grow by an innate necessity out of the nature of matter, or of life, or of individuality, as in the Hindu Vedanta or the Platonic philosophy. It is a choice of the free will of man, a violation of the law of God. The law which is violated is not physical, working apart from the conscious acceptance of it by the creature. It must be presented to the moral nature and must secure the surrender of the will to it. Its operation, however, does not depend upon its acceptance or non-acceptance, but simply upon its recognition. The willing adoption of the law by the conscience is obligatory. Once recognized, it can not fail to operate. Conformity to it is moral good; transgression of it is sin and brings all sin's consequences. Where there is no knowledge of God's will, there is error but no guilt (Ro 5 13; Jn 15 22, 24)—or at least guilt exists only as far as this ignorance is wilful (Lk 12 14 f.). Accordingly, the more clearly the moral creature knows the will of God and the wrong of standing in opposition to it, the greater is his guilt (Mt 11 21, 12 41 f.). Hence the greatest sin is that against the Holy Spirit, because it is sin against the greatest amount of light.

5. Sin: Voluntary Violation of Law.

But though sin is a creature of the will at its inception and at eaeh of its repetitions, it is not limited to mere action. It is a principle or power governing the life from within (Ro 7 13-25). Inclinations and dispositions that lead men to sinful actions are grouped together under the general name of sin and condemned as such (Jer 13 25; Is 48 4-8; Jn 5 42-44; II P 2 14; Mt 12 34, 36). This is the difference between sin and sins. The former term applies to the principle or power within, the latter to the act in which it is manifested. And as these are centered in one predominant quality, that of disregard for the will of God and preference for self, sin is identified with lawlessness (I Jn 3 4, the nearest approach that the Bible has to a definition of sin).

6. Sin as an Indwelling Principle.

But if the essence of sin is disregard (lack of love or fear) of God, it follows that sinful acts are the result of self-love (self-preference, Is 53 6), and the source and seat of all sin is in self-will. As bodily appetites furnish the most common and easily discerned impulse toward the choice of what one wishes as opposed to what God preseribes, the flesh is viewed as the seat of sin. This conception, however, is scarcely present in the O T, where the flesh appears merely as a synonym of weakness (Gn 6 3; Ps 78 38), calling forth pity. In the Apocrypha the notion of the inherence of sin in the physical nature begins to assert itself (Sir 23 6; Wis 12 10; IV Mac 7 18; cf. Slavonic Enoch, 30 16), and grows into the rabbinieal doetrine of an evil heart (yetser hā ra') and the Pauline idea of the flesh as the seat and instrument of sinful tendeney (see FLESH). Whether sin be a negative or positive reality is not a question that emerges distinctly in the province of Biblical thought.

8. Guilt and Punishment: Death.

The attitude of the sinful man in view of God's law is represented in the term "guilt" (q.v.), and the just and natural treatment of guilt is condemnation by the moral sense of every personal being, and punishment by the just and sovereign Ruler of all creation. Guilt both as blameworthiness and as punishableness is assumed and implied in every case of censure of sinful actions and inclinations, and in every threat of righteous indignation and vengeance in behalf of the offended law. The great and ultimate penalty of sin is death (Ro 6 23, 5 12). But death assumes and carries with it the displeasure (wrath and curse) of God. As the penalty of sin, however, death is not simply the dissolution of the physical tie between body and soul. There are intimations that even in the sinless condition the human frame was to be no exception to the law that every living organism must ultimately be dissolved. When death is called the penalty of sin, it is viewed as already affected by the existence of sin in the world. It has a sting which it derives from sin (I Co 15 56). Apart from this sting, it is scarcely the thing that should be recognized under the name of death.

9. Origin of Sin: The Fall.

The origin of sin in the world is traced to the first man. The account of the temptation and sin of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden (Gn ch. 3), though not alluded to again in the O T, was naturally interpreted as involving the corruption and fall of the whole human race (Wis 2 24; Ro 5 12 f.; I Co 15 22). In the hands of the Apostle Paul, it received a careful elaboration, because it filled a special and logically legitimate place in his system of thought. The correspondence of the Fall to the redemptive work of Jesus Christ in respect to the extent of the influence of each, to the number affected by each, to the place and relation of the mediator of each to the rest of mankind, and the consequences of each, were such that he must needs show them in their fulness of meaning and thus exalt Christ as a revelation of God's wisdom, power, and grace. The Paradise narrative itself betrays a certain consciousness of the important place the affair occupied in the mind of Israel. The figure of the serpent suggests the monster Tiâmat of Assyrian mythology, the great opponent of the gods and undoer of their work. This conception is so much like that of Satan in the subsequent history as portrayed both in the O T and in the N T that the reading of a satanic influence into the action of the serpent by the earlier Christian theology is not as unhistorical and unscientific as it was once supposed to be. This account of the Fall has thus all the appearance of aiming to show how sin entered into the world of mankind. It does not explain the emergence of sin in the universe as a whole. That must have been the work, not of a tempter, but of an original creator of an evil propensity. The account represents evil as already existing outside the earthly world and making its entrance there. The passage, however, could never have been taken in the strictest literal sense. The essential element in it is not that the body of a snake was possessed for a time by an evil spirit, and spoke without the use of vocal organs, or that the first man and woman partook of the fruit of a mysterious tree, but that in some way, either crude and vague, or explicit and consciously present to the moral sense, the first human beings received the suggestion of a departure from the known good (the will of God), and that they yielded and made this suggestion the law of their action. Of the extra-Biblical accounts of primitive man the great majority are void of interest and significance both from the historical and from the religious point of view. Some contain portraitures of a state of primeval innocence, or golden age of prosperity and peace, followed by deterioration and decline (cf. Baring-Gould, Legends of O T Characters, 1:26–39). But the closest parallel, as on all kindred subjects, is the Assyro-Babylonian legend, which, however, is so imperfectly preserved that its decipherment and translation are matters of dispute among specialists. It therefore yields very little light on the subject (cf. Davis, Genesis and Semitic Tradition, p. 65; Boscawen, Bab. and Oriental Records, IV, 251; Sayce, Anc. Mon. pp. 65, 104). In general, its relation to Gn ch. 3 is the same as that of all similar Babylonian parallels to the O T on other subjects. In all these the Hebrew is a purified and spiritualized form, either derived from or cognate with the Mesopotamian, and made the vehicle of some great truths of revelation.

10. Transmission of Sin.

That all sin in the world is an outgrowth of the Fall is assumed in those passages which refer to the matter. In IV Es 4 30 the first sin is compared to a grain of evil seed sown in the heart of Adam, and its subsequent course is called "much wickedness that it hath brought forth to this time." (Cf. Sir 25 24: "From a woman was the beginning of sin, and because of her we all die.") But it is only the Apostle Paul who most emphatically and explicitly asserts this connection. Two separate questions are involved in the subject, viz.: (1) Is the guilt of Adam's first sin shared by all his posterity? and, (2) in what manner is sin transmitted and diffused through the generations of the human race? The first of these questions must be answered by a definite affirmative. The second has been the subject of an extended controversy. (1) From very early times there have been those who have held that Paul's language implies the real existence of all men in the first man, and their participation in that first act by which he fell from his primitive sinlessness. Upon this ground they have based the development of sin in each individual descendant of Adam. But the language of Paul does not easily bear the construction necessary to deduce from it this doctrine. The expression "in whom" (Ro 5 12, AVmg.) "all sinned," which seems to support it, has been eliminated from the discussion as a misunderstanding (cf. AV and RV text). Inherently, too, this explanation meets with the objection that no one is conscious of having been in Adam and of having sinned with him, and apart from such consciousness the imputation of guilt seems ethically irrelevant. (2) A rival view is that which accounts for the effect of the Fall on subsequent mankind by the doctrines of representation and federal headship. When Adam fell, it was not as an individual, but as a representative of the race. Hence, because he was the appointed head of all his posterity, those represented by him are accounted sinful, given sinful natures, and allowed to develop sinful lives. It is deemed a fatal objection to this explanation that the idea of representation is precisely the point that does not appear in Paul's discussion of the subject. It is certainly in harmony with the Pharisaic juridical thought that the action of a representative head is binding on those represented in all legal matters, but the Apostle nowhere applies the principles to the sphere of religious life. (3) The third view on the subject calls into the service the principle of heredity, assuming that as all men inherit from their ancestors natures with tendencies and dispositions, so the race has inherited from Adam a nature inclined toward sin. Under temptation this inclination is developed into actual transgression in every case. This is little different from the realistic transmission theory and is too dependent on modern scientific knowledge regarding the law of heredity to be historically identifiable with Paul's underlying idea as to how sin passes from Adam to his posterity. In the present stage of the investigation it seems as though Paul had not cared to trace the nature of the connection between Adam and the race, but was content to assert and use the existence of such connection in explaining the nature and extent of redemption through Christ. The nearest approach that can be made to his thought is through the study of the analogy between Adam and Christ. As he depends on the mystical union with the Redeemer for the efficacy of the redemptive work, so he may be depending on a mystical union with Adam accomplished by the surrender of the individual will to sin for the passing of Adam's sin to the sinner.

But clear and prominent as the doctrine of sin is throughout the whole range of Biblical teaching, its presentation is neither an end in itself nor a means toward gratifying a philosophic interest in the nature and constitution of man. It is given only in order that a hatred for moral evil may be aroused, that the love of God for providing means for its removal may be appreciated, and these means may be effectually used to secure its forgiveness. To-day it lies about a mile from the sea, and the whole region is a waste of sand and marshes. Cornill and Toy read סְוֵן, i.e., ṣewān = Syene (q.v.).

SIN, WILDERNESS OF (מִדְבַּר סִין, midhbar-ṣīn): According to Ex 16 1, this wilderness lay between Elim and Sinai; but according to Ex 17 1, there was one station between it and Sinai. In Nu 33 11, 12, one encampment on the Red Sea between Elim and the wilderness of S. and three stations between the wilderness and Sinai are mentioned. C. S. T.

SINAI, sai'nai, sai'na-ai, or sai'nê (סִינַי, ṣīnay): The mountain on which the Law was given, also called Horeb (in Ex 3 1, 17 6, 33 6 [E]; Dt 1 6, 4 10. "Sinai" in Ex 19 11, 34 4 [J] and in Ex 16 1, 24 16; Lv 25 1 [P]). From very early times it seems to have been regarded as a sacred mountain, perhaps as dedicated to the Babylonian moon-god Sin. S. is usually identified with a conspicuous group of mountains in the center of the peninsula embraced between the gulfs of Akabah and Suez; more specifically with the peaks known to the Arabs as Râs Sufsâfeh ('peak of the willow,' where Moses cut his rod) and Jebel Musa ('Mt. of Moses,' where he is supposed to have received the Ten Commandments). These peaks are over 6,000 ft. high. At the base of Râs Sufsâfeh, a broad plain extends toward the NW., known as er-Rahah, where the Israelites may easily have encamped. In a valley called Wâdy ed-Deir, on the NE. of the same mountain, stands the famous convent of St. Catharine. There are two other valleys in the same vicinity, both of which are comparatively fertile and well-watered. Along the base of the group, on the side of the plain er-Rahah, runs a natural mound or barrier, suggesting the "bounds" mentioned in Ex 19 23. The rocks of this region are steep and jagged and richly colored. They are composed of granite, porphyry, diorite, and gneiss. A path of stone steps leads up from the convent to the summit. Holy places marked by crosses cover the mountain. Near the top of Jebel Musa stands a chapel dedicated to Elijah (I K 19 8).

The tradition identifying this location with Sinai is as old as Justinian (527–565), who built here a Christian church in honor of the Virgin. But the most ancient tradition, that of Eusebius, points to Jebel Serbal, 6,750 ft. in height and difficult to climb. situated one short day's journey NW. of Jebel Musa. On its N. side there is the small but well-watered and luxuriant oasis of Wâdy Feiran, usually thought to be Rephidim (Ex 17 8). But there is scarcely space in the vicinity for any considerable camp. Tischendorf, Robinson, Ritter, Laborde, Palmer, and Stanley, therefore, rightly reject this identification in favor of the first. Other views of Sinai are: that of Sayce and G. F. Moore, who follow Beke (1874) in advocating a location in Arabia (cf. Jg 5 4; Dt 33 2); and that of Winckler and Cheyne, who insist that the name "Sinai" is a mere cosmological conception. Both views are highly improbable.

SINIM, sai'nim (סִינִים, ṣīnīm): The 'land of Sinim,' perhaps better 'of the Sinites,' is mentioned (Is 49 12) as one of the countries from which the exiles are to return. From the context, it apparently lay to the S. or E. of Palestine, and at a great distance. The LXX. translates "Persians." Of countries to the S., Sin (Pelusium), the wilderness of Sin, and Syene (sᵉwēnī) are suggested. Gesenius, among others, claims that China is here mentioned, but Dillmann and Duhm contend that this name was first known after the 3d cent. B.C., and was written by the Arabs and Syrians tsin. Others mention the tribe 'Sina' at the foot of the Hindu-Kush. It has also been identified with 'Sinite' (Gn 10 17), a tribe of N. Phœnicia. C. SINITE, sai'nait or sin'ait (סִינִי, ṣīnī): The inhabitants of a city or district, probably Sin (Gn 10 17; I Ch 1 15), to be identified with the Siannu of the Assyrian inscriptions, and located near Arka (see ARKITE), about 80 m. N. of Sidon. E. E. N.

SISERA, sis'ə-ra (סִיסְרָא, ṣīṣᵉrā', prob. of Hittite origin): 1. A Canaanite chieftain who assumed the post of general of Jabin's hosts (Jg 4 2 f.) in the war against Deborah and Barak. It appears, however, that Sisera was an independent king of superior standing to that of Jabin (Jg 5 28, 30; I S 10 9); so that he either took the real leadership in the confederated campaign, leaving to Jabin a tutelary presidency, or his apparent subordination to Jabin in the record is due to the working over of the account into its present form. 2. SLAVERY: The basis of primitive Heb. society was the family or clan (see FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 2). In their nomadic state, before the conquest of Canaan, the Heb. family consisted of the father, wife or wives, sons and daughters, and servants. Such servants were, in those early times, probably captives in war or their descendants, or persons acquired by purchase from other tribes or their descendants. As primitive Semitic warfare was often characterized by the "devotion" to death of the living spoil, it is likely that such captives were more often women and children than men, since the latter would be more likely to be put to death. When Israel came into possession of Canaan, the main change, as regards slavery, was that in the more complex conditions of life after the Conquest there was a greater likelihood of Israelites themselves coming into such unfortunate circumstances as to be compelled to sell themselves, or to be sold by process of law, as servants or slaves to another, something which, we may well believe, was rather rare in the nomadic stage.

1. General Place in Ancient Heb. Society.

Servants or slaves formed a large element of the "working classes" in ancient Israel. The Heb. householder and his sons constituted something of an aristocracy. It is likely that every well-appointed estate (like that of Boaz, for example) had numerous male and female slaves by whom the greater portion of the harder work was done. And when town and city life became more developed, all the more substantial families had their servants who were slaves, not "hired servants." Although the last-named class became more numerous in the later kingdom-period, it never assumed the proportions of the slave-class. The "stranger" and "sojourner" were not slaves (see GENTILES), and could possess property and own slaves, even Hebrew slaves, just as the Israelites themselves. It is probable that the great majority of slaves of foreign blood in Israel, at least until the 8th cent., were descendants of the conquered Canaanites (cf. Jg 1 28, 33, 35; II K 9 22). Later, Phœnician slave-dealers found a ready market in Israel (cf. Am 1 6, 9).

The three most distinctive terms for "servants" in Heb. are: (1) 'ebhedh (from the root עָבַד, with the primary significance of 'to work' or 'to do'), the most generic term, expressive of various kinds of subjection (e.g., nation to nation, subject to a monarch, an inferior toward a superior, and of man to God). The 'ebhedh was thus one who 'worked' for another.

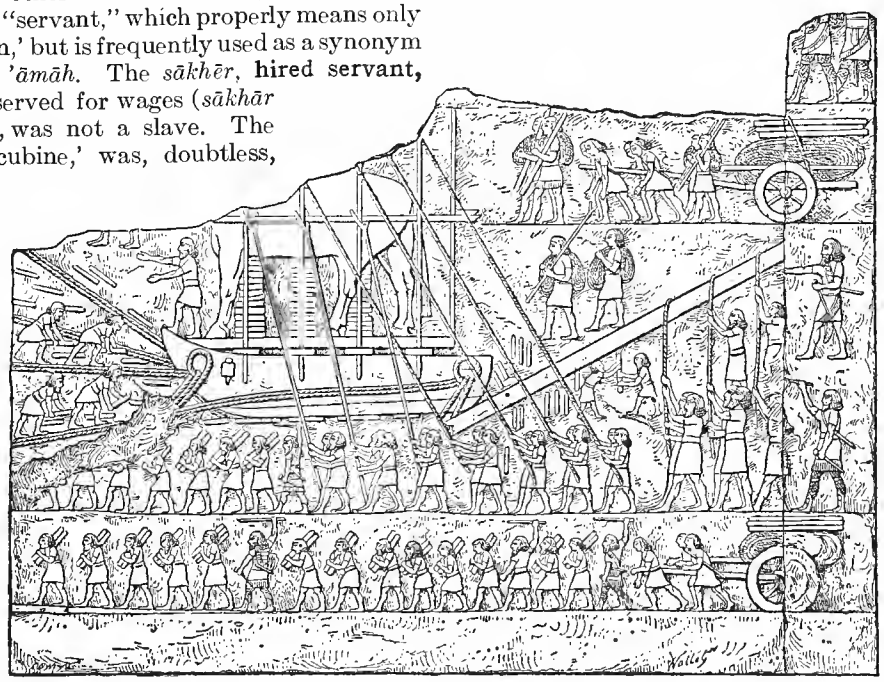
2. Terminology. The term is variously rendered "servant," man servant, bondman, and bond-servant in EV (2) 'āmāh, used for a female servant, rendered handmaid, maid, or maid servant. (3) shiphḥāh, also a female servant and rendered handmaid or maid, sometimes woman servant or maiden. Each of these three terms implies a state of actual servitude or bondage. It is otherwise with na'ar (fem. na'ărāh), often rendered "servant," which properly means only a 'young person,' but is frequently used as a synonym for 'ebhedh or 'āmāh. The sākhēr, hired servant, i.e., one who served for wages (sākhār or maskōreth), was not a slave. The pīlegesh, 'concubine,' was, doubtless, generally a slave, but the term itself connotes rather a phase of ancient marriage conditions than anything in reference to slavery. The word slave occurs in RV only in Dt 21 14 (see § 3, b, below), and in the AV only in Rev ch. 18 (for the Gr. σώματα, 'bodies'). For freedom in Ac 22 28 the RV has more correctly "citizenship" (q.v.).



Transportation of a Colossal Bull by Assyrian Slave-labor.

The status of the slave or servant class in ancient Israel can be presented most suggestively, possibly, by examining the legislation in the codes on the subject, and also noting the supplementary evidence of the customs revealed incidentally in various narratives.

3. Legislation Regarding Slavery. Such legislation as is preserved in the codes relates more particularly to servants who are Hebrews and only incidentally to those of foreign blood. The condition of the latter was less fortunate than was that of the former.

a. In the old code in Ex chs. 21–23, the term of service for a Heb. slave ('ebhedh) is limited to six years (21 2 ff.). We must suppose that a servant of foreign blood was a slave for life. At the end of six years the Heb. servant could go out free (ḥophshī ḥinnām). If he was married when he entered the service, his wife (and children also, without doubt) went out with him. If, however, during his term of service he had been given a wife by the master, she remained the property of the master. But the servant then had the option of continuing to live with his wife and children as a life-slave. As the seal to this, he was brought 'before God' (i.e., the local sanctuary or the household altar), and there at the door his ear was pierced with an awl (21 2-6). The condition of the Heb. woman who had been sold (by her father) to be an 'āmāh was carefully guarded. It was understood that a woman thus sold became a wife of the master. If she did not please him, she was not to be summarily dismissed, but guaranteed certain rights. She could be redeemed by her family. Above all, she could not be sold to an alien. If given as an 'āmāh to the master's son, she was to be honored as a daughter. So long as she stayed under the master's roof she was to be treated honorably. If not, she had the right to go out free, with no stain attached to her name.

Heb. law and custom, unlike Roman, did not give the master unlimited power of life and death over his slaves. In case a master beat his servant (male or female) and the servant died under his hand, the master was to be punished. But if a day or two passed before death ensued, the loss of the servant was counted a sufficient penalty (21 20 f.). If a master caused the loss of a servant's eye or tooth, the servant thereby gained his liberty free of cost (21 26 f.). If a servant were gored (to death) by a neighbor's ox, the owner of the ox had to pay the master 30 shekels of silver (about $18), which was, therefore, the average price of a slave at the time (21 32).

Some additional information regarding the status of servants in early O T times can be gleaned incidentally from the O T narratives. Eliezer, the servant of Abraham, of foreign blood, but born in Abraham's household, was trusted implicitly by his master, and it was Abraham's intention to make him his heir in case he had no son by Sarah (Gn 15 2-4). Jacob, in relation to Laban, was hardly an 'ebhedh in the ordinary sense, since he was not sold to Laban, but put himself voluntarily under Laban's control and for stipulated wages. Yet the three terms of service, seven years for each of the two wives and six years for the cattle, bear a close resemblance to the six-year term of the law in Ex 21 2 ff. And Jacob's case may be taken as an illustration of stipulated terms of service for wives or property, during which time the servant was completely under the control of the master.

How a Hebrew might become a servant of a fellow Hebrew is well illustrated in II K 4 1 ff., where we see that after the death of an insolvent debtor his sons could be taken by the creditor for the debt. Such cold-hearted though formally legal proceedings the prophets severely denounced (cf. Am 2 6, 8 6).

In speaking of female servants the old narratives do not distinguish sharply between the 'āmāh and the shiphḥāh. Hagar, Zilpah, and Bilhah, the maids of Sarah, Leah, and Rachel, are designated sometimes by one term, sometimes by the other. While shiphḥāh, from its etymology, probably originally designated the concubinal relation in which the female servant stood to the master, the two terms eventually came to be used as synonyms. The attempt of Whitehouse in HDB, IV, p. 466, to show a distinction made by Abigail in her address to David (I S 25 23 ff.) must be pronounced unsuccessful, in view of ver. 27. From such statements as we read in Gn 16 6, 21 10, etc., it may be inferred that in many cases the handmaid was the exclusive property of the master's wife, and it was her authority rather than his to which she was subject.

b. The later codes (Dt, HC, and P) show strongly the presence of two tendencies: (a) To distinguish more sharply between the Hebrew servant and the alien, in favor of the former, and (2) to introduce a more humane spirit into the whole. In Dt 15 12 ff. the older law is supplemented by the provision that at the expiration of his term of service the servant is to be furnished liberally with a supply of the necessaries of life. While the Decalogue puts the servant on a level with the free man in his right to the Sabbath rest, Dt adds the provision that the servant is to share and enjoy sacrificial festivities as well as his free master (16 11). It is probable that from very early times the servant of foreign descent was considered as having renounced his allegiance to the god of his fathers and as subject to J", although it must have been necessary for him to be circumcised in order to be entitled to partake fully in the religious observances (cf. the later law in P, Ex 12 44). Other notes of the humanitarian tendency of Dt are its prescription that runaway slaves are not to be returned to their master (23 15 f.), the provision for the considerate and kindly treatment of the female captive (21 10 ff.), especially in case she does not please her master (ver. 14, where instead of "deal with her as a slave" we should read "deal with her brutally" or "in an overbearing, unfeeling manner"), and the merciful enactment regarding the wages of the "hired servant" (24 14; cf. Lv 19 13 [HC]). The Holiness Code also touched the case of the "hired servant" in prohibiting him to eat of "holy things" (Lv 22 10). In this case the sākhēr is presumed to be a foreigner, but a priest's 'purchased servant' can eat of the priest's food (Lv 22 11), presumably, after having been circumcised. In the case of the seduction of a female slave (a shiphḥāh) already betrothed to a man, but not yet "redeemed" (i.e., the marriage-price not yet paid), this code prescribes that the case is to be investigated, the man fined, and compelled to bring his guilt-offering to the sanctuary.

The post-exilic code of P sought to enforce its conception of the (theoretically) holy status of every Israelite by the provision that the poor Hebrew who had to sell himself to a fellow Hebrew was not to be counted an 'ebhedh (which term P would thus restrict to foreigners), but as a sākhēr ("hired servant") or tōshābh ("sojourner"; see GENTILES). His term of service was to end with the year of Jubilee, when he and his family were to return to the ancestral estate (Lv 25 39-46, probably a late insertion in HC). Evidently, it had been found impossible to enforce the old law of a six-year term of service (cf. Jer 34 8-22 for an instance of the flagrant abuse of this law). The same conception of the fundamental distinction between the Israelite and the alien underlies the further provision in P that if a Hebrew became the servant of a "stranger or sojourner," he was to be redeemed by some member of his family (Lv 25 47-55). The necessity of such legal protection for the poorer Israelites, if the ideal character of the community was to be conserved, is evident from Neh 5 5 ff., where Nehemiah found himself obliged to intervene on their behalf by authority, persuasion, and personal example, to save a large element of the community from being reduced to the condition of serfs (bondage).

The tendency of all later Jewish legislation and rabbinical teaching was in the direction of greater humanity toward the servant-class.

4. Slavery in the N T. In this respect Jewish law compares most favorably with the Græco-Roman law, the severity of which in regard to slaves the Jews themselves had many sad opportunities to experience. Perhaps, it was just such experiences that influenced them in their own more merciful legislation. The Essenes repudiated slavery altogether.

While such terms as δοῦλος, διάκονος, παῖς, ὑπηρέτης, οἰκέτης, etc., all rendered "servant," appear frequently in the N T, there is nothing specially distinctive in them, at least in the Gospels, except in Jn 15 15, where Jesus tells His disciples that they are His "friends" rather than "servants." The prodigal asked his father that he might become a μισθίος ('hired servant'), perhaps as expressive of a less intimate relationship than παῖς or δοῦλος. Paul often uses δοῦλος in the religious sense of himself (and Christians in general) as the "servant" of (owned by, controlled by) the Lord Jesus Christ.

The relative importance of the slave-class in the Græco-Roman world of Paul's day is seen in its classification into two great classes, bond and free (I Co 12 13, etc.). Regarding slavery as an institution, Apostolic teaching had nothing to say theoretically. Practically, the Epistles of Paul and Peter counsel servants to be content with their position, to obey their masters, and also counsel masters to be considerate of their servants (I Co 7 21 f.; Eph 6 5; Col 3 22, 4 1; I Ti 6 1; Tit 2 9; I P 2 18). In his Epistle to Philemon Paul deals with the case of the runaway slave Onesimus not by discussing slavery per se, or from the point of view of Roman law, but by seeking to influence Philemon to make the common brotherhood in Christ of both himself and his converted slave Onesimus the determining factor in his treatment of the restored slave.

SLIME: Bitumen or asphalt, not ordinary clay, is what is meant by the Heb. ḥēmār (from ḥāmar, 'to boil') in Gn 11 3, 14 10; Ex 2 3. It was much used in the ancient world for just such purposes as are mentioned in Gn 11 3 and Ex 2 3. The old bitumen pits at Hit on the Euphrates are still a source of supply to the boat-builders of that region. The cement of bitumen furnished a protection to the unburned bricks which rendered them much more indestructible. It abounds in some of the wâdys near the Dead Sea, which was called the Asphalt Lake by the ancients, and the pits whence it was dug for commercial purposes were probably at one time quite numerous (Gn 14 10). SLUICE: A very doubtful rendering (Is 19 10 AV) of a Heb. word sekher usually meaning 'reward.' RV translates, "they that work for hire" ("they that make dams" RVmg.). But the context is better suited by the rendering in AV. A. C. Z.

SMITH. See ARTISAN LIFE, § 10.

SMYRNA, smẽr'na (Σμύρνα): A city, founded 1100 B.C. by Æolic Greeks at the NE. corner of the Bay of Smyrna. It was seized by the Ionic Greeks of Colophon before 688, when it joined the Ionian League. The acropolis of this S. (so-called Tantalis), with the adjacent tomb of Tantalus, lies across the bay N. of modern S. It early attained to wealth and prominence, because it was situated in the path of commerce, and was the outlet for trade between Lydia and the West. Coveted by Gyges and destroyed by Alyattes about 600 B.C., it remained a mere village until the capture of Sardes by Alexander, who in a dream was exhorted by the Nemeses (deities of S.) to rebuild Smyrna. Alexander selected the present site, and his plans (involving paved streets crossing at right angles) were carried out by Antigonus and, later, by Lysimachus. (All this is [indirectly] referred to by John in Rev 2 8: "was dead and [yet] lived.") S. soon became (and has remained) one of the most important commercial cities of Asia, famous for its wealth, temples, buildings, schools of medicine and science. It had a fine, safe harbor, on the site of which the bazaars of the city now stand; for during the siege of S. by Timur (1402) the harbor was partially filled in for siege purposes, so that the modern quay is about 100 yards beyond the ancient shore-line. S. was a faithful ally (cf. Rev 2 10: "Be thou faithful unto death") of Rome during the Mithridatic wars. In the Provincia Asia S. was the seat of a conventus (see ASIA MINOR, § 2). Its claim to the titles of 'Metropolis' and 'First City of Asia' was disputed by Ephesus and Pergamum. S. was styled Neocoros ('Temple-Sweeper' or 'Warden') because of its temple (built 26 A.D.) to Tiberius, and was permitted by the Romans, from Augustus to Gallienus, to coin its own money, though the first coins of S. are those of Lysimachus. The early evangelization of S. (it was one of the "Seven Churches," Rev 1 11, 2 8-11) was due to the presence there of a Jewish colony. Polycarp (the first bishop of S. and a disciple of the Apostle John) was burned (155–156 A.D.) with eleven Philadelphians, near the stadium, where his tomb is still shown. Smyrna's trade was destroyed by the discovery of America and the Cape route to India, but revived gradually from the 16th cent. onward. The city is now a shipping-center for the interior and the adjacent islands. J. R. S. S.

SNOW: The most striking thing about snow to the Oriental is its white color. Consequently, snow is the standard of comparison for whiteness, as in leprosy (Ex 4 6; Nu 12 10), and in cleanness (Mk 9 3), and, therefore, figuratively, of purity or innocence (La 4 7; Is 1 18). See also PALESTINE, § 19. A. C. Z.

SNUFFER, SNUFF-DISH. See TEMPLE, § 16, and TABERNACLE, § 3 (3).

SO, sō (סוֹא, ṣō'): A "king of Egypt" to whom Hoshea of Israel "had sent messengers" (II K 17 4), and thus furnished ground to Hoshea's master, the king of Assyria, for the suspicion that a conspiracy was being planned. The older identification of So with Shabakah (Shabataka) of the Ethiopian (25th) dynasty can not be maintained in the light of the impossibility of reconciling the chronology of So with that of Shabakah. To this is to be added the difficulty of deriving the Hebrew ṣō' from its alleged Ethiopic original, and also the usage of the Biblical writers, which designates the Ethiopian Pharaohs as kings of Cush (cf. II K 19 9). Accordingly, Winckler's argument identifying So with Sib'a, tartan (i.e., general or viceroy) of Pir'u, King of Muṣri in N. Arabia, has been generally accepted (cf. Mittheil. d. vorderasiat. Gesellschaft, 1898, 5). A. C. Z.

SOAKED. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 16.

SOAP (Sope AV): Soap containing an admixture of fats, or oils, was not known to the ancients. The substance used by the fullers (bōrīth, Jer 2 22; Mal 3 2) was apparently a cleansing preparation of vegetable alkali, rather than what we now specifically term 'soap.' In Jer 2 22 this vegetable alkali is differentiated from the mineral alkali (see NITER). Alkaline plants are abundant in Palestine, notably the saltwort (Job 30 4, Salsola kali; see PALESTINE, § 22), and the manufacture of olive-oil is now one of the principal industries of the country. SODOM, sod'ǫm, SODOMA, sod'o-ma (סְדֹם, ṣ'dhōm, Σόδομα): A city mentioned, with Gomorrah, Adama, Zeboim, "cities of the plain," which were destroyed by "fire from Jehovah out of heaven" (Gn 19 24). It was a royal city (Gn 14 2). Lot dwelt in it after he had chosen the Plain of the Jordan (Gn 13 11 ff.). It was destroyed because of its wickedness, described in Gn ch. 19 (cf. Gn 13 13, 18 20). These cities are mentioned with Zoar (q.v.), which is usually located SE. of the Dead Sea. The four cities were in a plain, which was shaken by an earthquake. This caused a sinking of the earth and an eruption of gases and petroleum, which ignited and burned the cities, that were then covered by the waters of the Dead Sea. The old plain is the modern es-Ṣebkha, a morass S. of the Dead Sea. Sir G. Grove, Tristram, Conder, and others locate the cities at the N. end of the Dead Sea, and uphold their view by Biblical passages. The cities were visible from Bethel (Gn 13 3, 10), from Mt. Nebo (Dt 34 3, Zoar), and lay to the N. of the Amalekites (Gn 14 7). In the O T and N T Sodom is often used as a warning example of sin and Divine punishment (Dt 29 23; Is 1 9, 3 9; Jer 50 40; Ezk 16 46; Mt 10 15; Ro 9 29, and often). See also PALESTINE, § 12 (c). C. SOLOMON, sol'o-mǫn (שְׁלֹמֹה, sh'lōmō, Gr. Σολομών), 'peaceful,' 'pacific': The son of David by Bath-sheba (II S 12 24); also named by the prophet Nathan, Jedidiah (ver. 25), 'beloved of J"' He succeeded his father upon the throne, and was the last king of the united nation. The Biblical account of the reign of S. is found in I K chs. 1–11; II Ch chs. 1–9. Josephus (Ant. VIII, 1–8) adds nothing reliable, but, in harmony with later tradition, makes S. play the rôle of sorcerer.

1. Sources.

S. came to the throne about 977 B.C. (see CHRONOLOGY OF THE O T, table). Little of his youth is known, but it is probable that his education was in the hands of Nathan the prophet. He began his reign as a mere youth (I K 3 7)—according to Josephus at the age of fifteen, but two passages (I K 11 42, 14 21) imply that he was at least twenty. Bath-sheba persuaded David to appoint her son his successor. Thus the rights of Adonijah (q.v.), the heir apparent after the death of Amnon and Absalom, were set aside. The accession of S. to the throne was hastened by the conspiracy of Adonijah, who was supported by Abiathar, the priest, and Joab, the veteran commander. Bath-sheba, supported by Nathan, Zadok, and Benaiah, gained the support of the aged monarch. At David's command, S. rode to Gihon on the royal mule, escorted by the king's body-guard, and was there anointed by Nathan. The conspirators, assembled at En-rogel in the vicinity of Jerusalem, hurriedly dispersed. Their connection with this movement involved Joab and Abiathar in disaster. Shimei, David's old enemy, also lost his life through his disobedience (I K 2 36-46; cf. II S 16 5).

2. Accession.

S. inherited a kingdom which had been conquered by the military genius of his father. It stretched from Tiphsah (Thapsacus) on the Euphrates to Gaza (I K 4 24); two of its outposts were Tamar (usually identified with Tadmor), in the Syrian desert, and Ezion-geber, at the head of the Red Sea. His task was to weld this empire into a unity. As far as Israel was concerned, he accomplished this by blotting out the ancient tribal lines in his division of the land, and by redistricting the territory into twelve prefectures for the purposes of taxation (I K 4 7 ff.). With the institution of these administrative units many ancient tribal rights were swept away, and the vicious Oriental system of forced work, the levy, was introduced. We read of 30,000 at work in Lebanon, in monthly relays of 10,000; 70,000 who bore burdens, 80,000 hewers, and 3,300 overseers (I K 5 13-18). A very large part of these laborers was taken from the Canaanitic elements of the population (I K 9 20 ff.). The list of the king's cabinet officers (I K 4 1-6) indicates considerable organization. Jehoshaphat, son of Ahilud, was vizier, or chancellor (Heb. mazkīr); Elihoreph and Ahijah had charge of the state papers and correspondence (Heb. ṣōpherīm); Azariah was at the head of the twelve prefectures, and hence chancellor of the exchequer. Zabud was called the 'king's friend,' a designation of unknown significance, but also mentioned in the Amarna letters (104). Adoniram had the unpopular office of supervisor of the inhabitants who had been reduced to forced labor. S., although traditionally portrayed as a man of peace, had a large standing army. Besides organizing a cavalry force of 12,000, he equipped 1,400 chariots, to supply which he established royal stables, with 4,000 stalls (the 40,000 of I K 4 26 is an error; cf. II Ch 9 25). Making a rough estimate on the basis of the cavalry, we conclude that Israel's fighting strength was 300,000 men, when all branches of arms are considered. The national defense was further provided for by the fortification of Jerusalem and other cities (I K 9 15 ff.) (cf. Jerusalem, § 31). In the North Hazor and Megiddo were strongly garrisoned in order to prevent any uprising on the part of the Canaanites, while Beth-horon, Baalath, and Gezer on the W frowned down upon the Philistines. Tamar, in the Syrian desert, was established as an outpost for the protection of caravans (I K 9 18). (Robinson, however, located it SE. of the Dead Sea, on the route to Ezion-geber.) The wisdom of this policy soon became evident. Rebellion broke out in Edom, and, although Hadad is said to have ascended the throne, he was kept in check (I K 11 14-22). The narrative (I K 11 23-25) implies continued warfare between Israel and Rezon of Damascus. Jeroboam sowed the seeds of rebellion and civil war, which bore bitter fruit for the successor of S. (I K 11 26 ff.). This conspirator found an asylum with Sheshonk I of Egypt. In all this S. changed the conception of the kingdom from that of an ideal, theocratic realm, where the ruler represented J", to that of an Oriental world-power, in which the monarch practised aggrandizement and oppression for his own selfish ends.

4. His Buildings.

As a builder on a magnificent scale, S. was a true Oriental monarch. His fame in this respect is usually associated with the building of the Temple. This sanctuary, however, was only a part of a pile of royal buildings erected on Mt. Zion. The Temple was located on the northern and highest eminence (Jer 26 10). Situated on the southern end of the hill was the House of the Forest of Lebanon, which was probably an assembly-hall for the elders and nobility of Israel. Next to this edifice, on its northern side, stood the Porch of Pillars, which led directly to the Throne Porch, or Hall, of Judgment (7 7). Beyond the Throne Porch and nearest to the Temple stood his house, the royal residence, and the harem (I K 7 8). The entire group of structures, Temple included, was surrounded by a court. (For a detailed description of these buildings see JERUSALEM, §§ 25–30, and TEMPLE, §§ 5–19.)

5. Foreign Policy and Commerce.

Outside of Jerusalem S. laid out gardens and vineyards (Ec 2 4-6), and he must have provided a system of water-works, although nothing definite is said of this in the O T. To carry out such a building program required a large force of workmen and a well-filled treasury This last was secured, partly by an oppressive system of taxation, and partly by the development of commerce. Forced labor furnished the workmen and artisans.

S. was a diplomat rather than a soldier, and succeeded in forming several alliances with advantage to himself. Probably, at the very opening of his reign he made a treaty with Pharaoh (Pusukamne or Pasebchaun, of the 21st dynasty). It was ratified by the marriage of S. to the daughter of the Egyptian monarch, who captured Gezer and gave it as a dowry to his daughter. The ulterior purpose of this league was to foster close commercial relations between the two nations, and upon S. devolved the task of keeping open the caravan route to Mesopotamia (I K 3 1, 7 8. 10 26 ff.). Another confederate of S. was Hiram of Tyre (I K 9 10 ff., 26 ff.). The latter found it to his interest to secure the friendship of the new power, through whose territory ran the caravan routes to Arabia and Egypt. Phœnicia furnished both the material and the skilled workmen for the many building enterprises of the Israelitic monarch (I K 5 9-12). In return S. paid an annual tribute (I K 5 11) and ceded twenty cities in Galilee (I K 9 11 ff.). The visit of the queen of Sheba was due to commercial and political reasons. The aggressive commercial policy of S. aroused anxiety in the Sabean kingdom. The Ophir commercial fleet (I K 9 28) might be the precursor of vessels of war. It was to settle such questions, as well as to satisfy herself as to the wisdom and glory of S., that the Arabian queen visited Jerusalem (I K 10 1-10). These alliances were the basis of his wealth and commerce. His possession of Gezer, Dor, and Megiddo (Jg 1 27b; Jos 17 11; I K 4 11) gave him command of the caravan route from Egypt to the East, and enabled him to levy toll on caravans. Hiram's sailors manned the ships of the fleet which sailed from Ezion-geber, bringing gold and other products from Ophir on the E. coast of the Persian Gulf (I K 9 26 ff., 10 11 f.). S. was also interested with Hiram in the Phœnician voyages to Tarshish (10 22). In addition to what flowed through the ordinary channels of industry, taxes, and tribute, his commercial enterprises are said to have brought S. 666 talents of gold annually. However, the phrase "in one year" (10 14) can scarcely mean annually, but must refer to the most prosperous year of his reign. The Biblical writer describes the wealth of S. in hyperbolical language (10 27). The income derived from trade was supplemented by oppressive taxation (I K 4 23 ff.), to support his pomp and splendor.

6. Personal Life and Character.

S. was a true Oriental in his love of splendor. The poet recalls the magnificence of his palanquin and his escort (Song 3 6-11). His harem was large; the figures of Song 6 8 (60 queens, 80 concubines) refer to the inmates of the harem at one time, while those of I K 11 3 (700 wives and 300 concubines) cover his entire reign. Political reasons prompted many unions with foreign princesses, which led him to the toleration of strange cults. This laxity is condemned in the O T (I K 11 1-8), and later the Rabbis looked upon these marriages as the beginning of disaster for Israel (cf. Sir 47 19 ff.).

In the OT "wisdom" is a technical term, signifying a knowledge of the principles and laws according to which God governs nature and the lives of men. S. is looked upon as supremely gifted with such wisdom (Lk 11 31). He received this in answer to his prayer at the opening of his reign (I K 3 7 ff.; cf. Sir 47 16 ff.). His wisdom manifested itself in a shrewd administration of justice (I K 3 16 ff.) and in his knowledge of plants and animals (I K 4 32 f.). Of the men with whom he is compared in his possession of this gift we know nothing (I K 4 30 f.). He is the hero of the Song of Songs, is impersonated in Ecclesiastes, and is, without doubt, the author of many of the Proverbs contained in the canonical book of that name (I K 4 32). He probably laid the foundation for that side of Hebrew literary activity which flowered in the books of the Wisdom literature. Tradition ascribes Pss 72 and 127 to him. The apocryphal Book of Wisdom (7 17-21) attributes encyclopedic knowledge to S., representing him as well versed in cosmology, demonology, astronomy, zoology, anthropology, botany, etc. The author of this work makes him philosophize after the manner of the Alexandrian schools, and puts into his mouth expressions which show an acquaintance with the Platonic and Stoic systems (8 20, 9 15, etc.). The so-called Psalter of Solomon is really a collection of Pharisee psalms. Later generations looked upon S. as a man of fervid piety, for his prayer at the dedication of the Temple (I K ch. 8), in the Deuteronomic version as we possess it, is "one of the grandest devotional utterances to be found in prechristian devotional literature." His practical religion was not lived upon the lofty plane of this prayer. Although he never formally forsook the worship of Jehovah, the national God, he tolerated and took part in the worship of foreign deities. He was certainly not an absolute theoretical monotheist, after the manner of the later prophets, and, while without the serious faults of his father, David, he nevertheless lacked also the latter's intense devotion to Israel's God.

7. Solomon in Later Legend.

The Solomon legends form a vast subject, which can be only touched upon. Josephus (Ant. VIII, 2 5) attributes to him the power of expelling demons, makes him the author of incantations for alleviating distempers and diseases, and derives from him the method of exorcism as it was practised in the days of the historian. According to rabbinical tradition, he had power over the demons by means of a talismanic ring, upon which the name of God was inscribed, and it was the theft of this ring which enabled Asmodeus, the chief of the demons, to usurp the throne of S. The relation of Israel's great monarch to Asmodeus has been a favorite theme with both Jewish and Mohammedan writers. By a misinterpretation of I K 4 33 the Rabbis ascribed to him full knowledge of the speech of birds and beasts. (See JE.) S. appears in the Koran in suras 21, 27, 28, 34, 37, 38. The story of S., Queen Bilqis, and the Hoopoe (sura 27) is really borrowed from the Targum of Esther (1 2). See Hughes, Dict. of Islam. The fame of Israel's great monarch has been spread far and wide through Oriental lands in the literature which Islam has produced.

SOLOMON'S PORCH. See TEMPLE, § 31.

SOLOMON'S SERVANTS ('abhᵉdhē shᵉlōmōh): Among those who returned with Zerubbabel are mentioned the children of "Solomon's servants" (Ezr 2 55, 58; Neh 7 57, 60), who afterward dwelt in the cities of Judah (Neh 11 3). They are mentioned with the Nethinim (q.v.) in all these passages, and are probably to be included with them, though not named in Neh 3 26, 31, 10 28 [29]. The Nethinim were 'those given' to the service of the Temple, and are traced back to Solomon (I K 9 20, 21; cf. Jos 9 23), if not to David (Ezr 8 20). Solomon levied bond-servants (I K 9 20 f.) from the old inhabitants of Canaan, and probably gave some of them to the lower service of the Temple, as "Nethinim." Their descendants seem to have formed a separate class, and to have maintained their identity until after the Exile. C. S. T.

SONG OF SONGS (שִׁיר הַשִּׁירִים, shīr ha-shīrīm), 'Song of Songs,' Song of Solomon AV): The full title reads: "Song of Songs, which is Solomon's." The common title Canticles is from the Vulg. Canticum Canticorum.

1. Name and Place in the Canon.

"Song of Songs" is a superlative expression signifying the best or greatest of songs (cf. "holy of holies," "vanity of vanities"). The second half of the Heb. title clearly points to Solomon as the supposed author.

In the Heb. Canon the book belongs to the third division (the "Writings" or Hagiographa); and is the first of the five Mᵉgillōth or "Rolls" (Song, Ru, La, Ec, Est) which were read publicly at the great annual feasts, Song being assigned to the eighth day of the Passover.

At the Council of Jamnia (90 A.D.) Rabbi Akiba made high claims for the book, saying that "no one in Israel ever doubted that the Song of Songs defiled the hands [i.e., is canonical], for the whole world is not worth the day on which the Song was given." At this time the book had apparently been already placed among the sacred writings, and it may have been considered canonical before the beginning of our era[1]; but the very extravagance of the language used by its admirers seems to indicate that for a long while there was dispute as to its canonicity, and it is a singular fact that the Song is never referred to in the other O T Books, the O T Apocrypha, the N T, Philo, or Josephus. The admission of the work into the Canon would have been based upon two assumptions: (1) its Solomonic authorship, and (2) the existence of a veiled religious meaning, which could be brought to light through an allegorical interpretation. We shall see later, however, that both of these assumptions were groundless.

2. Structure.

At first glance, the Song is simply a poem concerning affection between the sexes, sometimes rather too frank in expression for our Western ears, but culminating in a matchless panegyric upon true love, which atones for any previous coarseness. The work gives a vague impression of unity, although its structure seems rather confused. It is clear that more than one person speaks, but it is difficult for the English reader to disentangle the various utterances, or to discover a coherent plan running through the book.

To a somewhat less extent,[2] the same confusion

[1] The Talmud mistakenly ascribes the introduction of the Song into the Canon to Hezekiah's college of scribes (cf. Pr 25 [1]).

[2] The fact that in Heb. the pronouns usually indicate the gender removes a good deal of the uncertainty which is inevitable in our translations. Even in the Eng., however, a clue may be found by remembering that "my love" (e.g., 1 [9, 15], etc.; not, however, "my love" in 1 [7], 3 [5, 8]) always refers to the woman, while "my beloved" (e.g., 1 [13, 14, 16]) indicates the man. The mention of the "daughters of Jerusalem" (1 [5], 2 [7], etc.) is also suggestive.

appears even in the Heb., and widely differing hypotheses have been put forth concerning the structure of the poem. All the theories worthy of serious discussion, however, may be considered as variations of one or another of the three now to be presented.

(1) A Collection of Love Songs. This view has recently been ably restated by Budde,[1] who bases his arguments largely upon descriptions of modern Syrian marriage customs first published in 1873 by J. G. Wetzstein,[2] then Prussian consul at Damascus. According to this theory, the book contains a number of poems (Budde distinguishes twenty-three) sung during the week following a wedding, when the bride and groom presided over elaborate ceremonies and were honored as "king" (Solomon) and "queen." These particular songs may have been written down by an interested spectator or, more probably, formed the repertoire of some professional musician.

Such an explanation, however, presupposes a practical identity between trans-Jordanic customs of to-day and Palestinian usage of 2,000 years ago, which has yet to be proved. Moreover, a celebration like those which Wetzstein describes would require more songs than can possibly be dissected out of Canticles, as well as some of a different character. But, most important, such a hypothesis does not adequately account for the undeniable unity of literary form or for the particular events to which this poem so often and so definitely refers, excepting by supposing so many editings and transpositions that the whole question is begged, and we come back to the undeniable fact that, whatever the poem may have been originally, it is now a connected dramatic whole.[3]

Nevertheless, the researches of Wetzstein and the elaborations of Budde have been of great value in calling attention to modern parallels to many portions of the book, and in suggesting the probability that the allusions of Canticles are consciously colored by the ancient popular wedding festivals, if, indeed, the author did not deliberately incorporate in his poem extracts from some of the favorite songs which were used on such occasions.[4]

(2) A Dialogue. Those who maintain the unity of the book differ as to the number of speakers introduced. The traditional view among both Jews and Christians (supported in modern times by Keil and Delitzsch) was that there are but two principal characters, Solomon and a Shulammite maiden (6 13), and that the poem is made up of mutual expressions of love and admiration.[5]

(3) A Drama. Most modern scholars, however, follow Ewald's view[1] that there are three chief characters, viz., Solomon, the Shulammite, and her shepherd lover; and that from various hints we can reconstruct a background of incident which will explain the utterances of a dramatic or semidramatic poem.

The story, briefly, is this: A beautiful country girl from Shulam (i.e., Shunem, 5 m. N. of Jezreel) was surprised by the king on one of his journeys to the north (6 11 f.), was brought to Jerusalem and placed in the royal palace (1 4b, 5), where, as the poem opens, the ladies of the harem ("daughters of Jerusalem") are singing the praises of Solomon. The king himself makes great efforts to win the affection of the Shulammite (1 9, etc.); but she remains faithful to the memory of her shepherd lover (1 7, etc.), who at last appears, and is allowed by the magnanimous monarch to return to his mountain home with his bride (8 5 ff.).

It must be admitted that even this last explanation does not remove all the difficulties of what is perhaps the most obscure book in the Bible. The drama is elsewhere unknown in Hebrew literature (unless the Book of Job is such), and, granted that the Song is dramatic, we must suppose that it was intended to be read or sung rather than acted. Furthermore, in the Song there are none of the usual indications concerning the dramatis personæ, scenes, etc., so that a great deal must be read between the lines. Those who hold this view of the structure of the poem are not always in agreement as to the assignment of the various speeches, and it is often necessary to interrupt the dialogue with supposed musings, dreams, and apostrophes to the absent which seem awkward and far-fetched. In particular, there is a difference of opinion as to whether, in passages such as 4 7-15, the shepherd lover actually appears upon the scene, or is only imagined to speak by his distracted sweetheart. But, when all this is acknowledged, the dramatic conception of the poem comes nearest to eliminating its problems, best explains the frequent incidental allusions, and, as we shall see, alone supplies an ethical motive which warrants the acceptance of the work in the sacred Canon.

It is possible that the story of the adventures of Solomon and Abishag the Shunammite (cf. I K 1 3 ff., 2 17 ff.) was current among the Jews, in which case it would be less necessary to indicate the speakers, and many details which are obscure to us would have been clear to those who were familiar with the popular tradition. See HDB, iv, p. 593a.

3. Authorship and Date. As to authorship, place of composition, and date, the only thing upon which all modern scholars are agreed is that Solomon could not possibly have written the Song which now bears his name. The statement of the title is of little value, as this is plainly by a later writer (the relative 'ăsher, "which," of 1 1 is never used in the body of the book). According to the theory of the Song mentioned above, the great king would never have composed a poem which sets him in so unfavorable a light. But the denial of Solomonic authorship does not depend upon any particular theory concerning the structure of the work. The coupling of Tirzah (cf. I K 15 21) with Jerusalem (6 4) points to a time later than the division of the kingdom of Solomon. Above all, the diction "exhibits several peculiarities, especially in the uniform use of the relative sh- for 'ăsher, and in the recurrence of many words found never or rarely besides in Biblical Hebrew, but common in Aramaic, which show either that it must be a late work (post-exilic), or, if early, that it belongs to North Israel, where there is reason to suppose that the language spoken differed dialectically from that of Judah" (see Driver, LOT, p. 448 f., for a list of such words).

[4] See Rothstein in HDB, iv, p. 594.

[5] The anaylsis of the poem according to this scheme, as well as that which follows, will be found in Driver's LOT. The Modern Readers' Bible (part entitled "Biblical Idylls") arranges the complete text very attractively in accordance with the traditional view.

[1] Ewald's first treatment of the Song appeared in 1826, and his last, in the Dichter des Alten Bundes, in 1867. He did not originate this theory, however; it had been propounded earlier by Jacobi (in 1771).

The latter alternative is preferred by Driver himself, largely because of the freshness of the recollections of Solomon and his court and the general purity and vigor of the style, which seem to indicate a comparatively early date. The prevailing tendency of recent critics, however, is to place the poem in the Greek period (3d cent. B.C.). The evidence of the local coloring is not conclusive. The majority of the allusions seem to refer to N. Palestine (though this is also disputed); but there is no reason why a Judæan should not have been familiar with this part of the country, and a poet would naturally lend verisimilitude to his work by frequent allusions to localities near the home from which the heroine was supposed to have been taken.

4. Interpretation.

It has already been said that the introduction of the Song into the Canon was based upon an allegorical interpretation. Such an exposition presupposed the traditional view of the structure of the work. The bride was the Jewish people, the bridegroom Solomon was God, and the progress of the poem embraced the entire history of Israel from the Exodus to the coming of the Messiah.

The allegorical interpretation was taken over by the early Christians, except that for Jehovah and Israel they substituted Christ and His Church. With slight modifications, this view was accepted practically exclusively until the end of the 18th cent., and is indicated in the chapter-headings of the Authorized Version. The book has always been a favorite among those of a mystic turn of mind,[1] and the allegorizing has often been carried out in elaborate, not to say offensive, detail. It need hardly be said that the poem itself does not contain a single indication that there is any such cryptic meaning.

According to the modern conception of the book, however, it contains a clear and helpful ethical teaching. It is a glorification of true love, which, in spite of all the imagined seductions of a rich and sensuous Oriental court, remains faithful to its plighted troth, and repels every tempting allurement like a virgin fortress guarded by walls and towers (8 10). Not Solomon in all his glory could banish from the heart of the exiled country maiden the image of her absent lover. The self-indulgent autocrat with a harem of "threescore queens, and fourscore concubines, and virgins without number" (6 8; cf. I K 11 3) would have been a poor type of the saving grace of the Divine Bridegroom; but the shepherd wooer who found his heart's desire resting beneath the apple-tree inspired the sweet love lines (8 6 f.) which are both the text and the climax of the poem.

> "Set me as a seal upon thy heart,
> As a seal upon thine arm:
> For love is strong as death;
> Jealousy is cruel as Sheol;
> The flashes thereof are flashes of fire,
> A very flame of Jehovah.
> Many waters can not quench love,
> Neither can floods drown it:
> If a man would give all the substance > of his house for love,
> He would utterly be contemned."

The present writer deprecates the efforts, still not infrequently made, to combine the ethical and allegorical interpretations, even to the extent of admitting that the love here described may be typical of a higher love. Of course it may! So may any record of human affection (e.g., "Sonnets from the Portuguese") be cited to make more vivid our conception of the depth of love which His people ought to bear to God. But the Song of Songs does not mean this; and when both O T and N T abound in unmistakable and sometimes elaborate comparisons between Divine and human love (e.g., Is 54 4 ff.; Jer 2 2, 3 1; Ezk ch. 16; Hos chs. 1–3; Mt 9 15; II Co 11 2; Eph 5 31 f.; Rev 21 2), it seems unnecessarily confusing to search for further types in this obscure poem. It is most significant that when the Bridegroom of the Church at length appeared, neither He nor His disciples ever found it necessary to apply to the Christ the words of the Song of Songs.

On the other hand, according to the modern view of the book, there is an adequate ethical teaching. If pure and faithful love between one man and one woman is of all mortal affections most like the ideal relation between mankind and God, then surely an inspiring defense of this most Divine of human relationships is at least as worthy of a place among the canonical writings as are the business maxims of Proverbs, the ancient laws concerning washings and tithings, or the history of cruel wars.

LITERATURE: The most important works have been mentioned in the footnotes. Perhaps the best commentary for the English reader is the little book by Andrew Harper in the Cambridge Bible series (1902), with an appendix which reprints the entire poem with the necessary indications concerning scenes, speakers, etc. L. In Gn 6 2-4 they are represented as existing before the Flood, and from their union with women sprang the "mighty men of old." Some interpret this passage by making "the sons of God" men of the pious descendants of Seth, and "the daughters of men" the wicked descendants of Cain; but this is impossible. [1] Bernard of Clairvaux preached eighty sermons on the first two chapters.

SOOTHSAYER, SOOTHSAYING. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 3.

SOP: The rendering of ψωμίον, 'a morsel of food' (Jn 13 26-30). It was (and still is) the custom in the East to eat broth or other liquid foods by dipping bread in them. See also MEALS, § 3. E. E. N.

SOPATER, sō'pa-ter or sŏp'a-ter (Σώπατρος): A Berœan, one of Paul's companions on his last journey to Jerusalem (Ac 20 4). Possibly the same as Sosipater (Ro 16 21); if so, he was of Jewish birth ("kinsman" is to be taken in the racial, not family, sense). E. E. N.

SOPE. See SOAP.

SOPHERETH, so-fī'reth or sŏf'e-reth (סֹפֶרֶת, ṣōphereth), 'scribe': The ancestral head of a family of "Solomon's servants" (Neh 7 57). In Neh 7 57 used with the article (Hassophereth). E. E. N.

SORCERER, SORCERY. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 3.

SORE. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5 (9).

SOREK, sō'rek (שֹׂרֵק, sōrēq), THE VALLEY OF: The mod. Wâdy Ṣurâr, the natural highway from Philistia to Jerusalem and the route of the modern railway. Map II, C 1, D 1. The wâdy begins to the NW of Jerusalem and reaches the sea as the Nahr Rûbîn ('Reuben river'), 9 m. below Jaffa. Although mentioned by name only in Jg 16 4, this valley was doubtless also the scene of the battles of I S chs. 4–7 The "camp of Dan" (Jg 13 25 mg.) lay on the N. slope of the valley, opposite Beth-shemesh. See G. A. Smith, HGHL, 218–226. L. G. L.

SOSIPATER, so-sip'a-ter (Σωσίπατρος): Mentioned in the postscript (see QUARTUS) to Ro ch. 16 (vs. 21-23), with Lucius and Jason, who are described as kinsmen—i.e., fellow countrymen—of the writer (cf. Ro 9 3). It is possible that this Sosipater is to be identified with the Berœan Sopater mentioned in Ac 20 4. J. M. T.

SOSTHENES, sŏs'thē-nīz (Σωσθένης): The head of the Jewish synagogue in Corinth at the time of Paul's arrest in that city (Ac 18 12 f.), and probably the successor of Crispus, after the conversion of the latter (Ac 18 8). When Gallio refused to listen to the charges against Paul, the Jews (which seems to be the correct interpretation of "all" [πάντες] in ver. 17) turned upon S. and maltreated him, evidently because of his weak prosecution of their case. If this S. is the same person as the one mentioned in I Co 1 1, he subsequently became a Christian. Later tradition makes the S. of the latter passage one of the Seventy (Eus. HE, I, 12 1 f.). J. M. T.

SOTAI, sō'tai, sō'tê, or sō'ta-ai (סוֹטַי, סוֹטָי, ṣōṭay): The ancestral head of one of the families of "Solomon's servants" (Ezr 2 55; Neh 7 57). E. E. N.

SOUND, TO. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

SOUTH (as a point of the compass). See EAST.

SOUTH, THE: To the S. of Judah lay the region known by the Heb. name נֶגֶב, negebh (i.e., 'dry' or 'waste'), rendered in AV by "south" (as though a mere point of the compass), in RV by "the South" (as a proper noun), except in those cases in which it is used solely for a point of the compass. The exact boundaries of this region can not be given. It was thought to begin in the Calebite possessions near Debir (cf. I S 30 14). It extended to Kadesh-barnea, about 60 m. SW. of Debir, with a breadth of about 40 m. It included such places as Arad, Beer-sheba, Rehoboth, Sibnah, Kadesh-barnea, and probably others, the exact location of which can not now be recovered. Its designation negebh, 'dry,' was only comparative. It had fewer springs and was less fruitful than Judah, but was not a desert like much of the region farther S., e.g., the wilderness of Sin. It was the home of many tribes, Amalekites, Jerahmeelites, Calebites, etc., some of whom became incorporated into Judah, while others, more hostile, were later driven out or exterminated. This whole district was considered a part of the land of Israel, and was assigned to the tribes of Judah and Simeon. The Simeonites were incorporated later into Judah, but the memory of their original possession is reflected in such passages as Jos 19 1-9. See also PALESTINE, § 6, and cf. Cheyne in EB, art. Negeb, with map. E. E. N.

SOW, SOWER. See, in general, AGRICULTURE, § 5.

SPAIN (Σπανία): S. is mentioned in the Bible only in Ro 15 24, 28, but is identified usually with the Tarshish of the O T, whose rich mines attracted the Phœnicians. The N. and W portions of this wealthy peninsula were not subjugated by the Romans until the time of Augustus, but the rest enjoyed an abundant trade with Rome by sea and by good roads. "Roman civilization pervaded S. earlier and more powerfully than any other province" (Mommsen). A native Latinity, represented by the Senecas, Lucan, Martial, and Quintilian, gave S. a high place in the literature of the 1st cent. It was popularly regarded as the western limit of the world (cf. I Clement, i, 4, επὶ τὸ τέρμα δύσεως). For Paul's visit see TIMOTHY, EPISTLES TO. R. A. F.

SPAN. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 2.

SPARROW See PALESTINE, § 25.

SPARTA, spār'ta (Σπάρτη), also called Lacedæmon: The capital of Lacedæmonia or Laconia was peopled at first by the Leleges, Minyæ, Phœnicians, then in turn by Æolians, Achæans, and the Dorians, who held sway in historical times. Two kings of the old native royal families (Agiadæ and Eurypontidæ) ruled conjointly and held the supreme authority both in war and religion. Associated with them were five Ephors (with control over everything) and a Gerousia (consisting of twenty-eight men above sixty years of age). The state was a demoeratic monarchy, in which matters of great moment were decided by the town meeting. S.'s constitution (extremely conservative) was based on the laws of Lycurgus (circa 820 B.C.). The people formed three classes: sovereign Dorians (few in number), the subject Achæans (Periœccoi), and the serfs (Helots). The mode of life was simple; the youth belonged to the state, not to the family, and were drilled in the use of arms from their infancy. Thus S. came to be regarded as the leader of Greece in war. Thebes (under Epaminondas) was the first to break S.'s power (362 B.C.), which was finally crushed by Antigonus Doson (King of Macedonia) and Philopœmen (an Achæan general) at Sellasia (221 B.C.). S. became prominent again under the tyrant Nabis (died 192 B.C.), but only for a short time. It is difficult, therefore, to see any historieal importance in the message of Jonathan, the Asmonean high priest of the Jews, to the Spartans (c. 146 B.C.; cf. I Mac ch. 12) seeking their friendship. The reference in I Mac 12 7, 20-23 implies that Areus I, King of Sparta (309–265 B.C.), had shown great friendship for the Jews in the days of the high priest Onias I (c. 323–300 B.C.). But little is known of the reasons and circumstances of these relations between Judæa and Sparta. See also ONIAS. J. R. S. S.

SPIDER. See PALESTINE, § 26.

SPIES: The practise of using spies to obtain desired information ("spy out" or "search") as to an enemy's land, condition, or plans must have been widely current in the ancient East. References to it in the O T are fairly numerous (Gn 42 9 ff.; Nu 13 1 ff., 21 32; Jos 2 1 ff.; Jg 1 23, 18 2; I S 26 4; II S 10 3). Of these the most noted instances are those of the twelve spies whom Moses sent from Kadesh to examine the land of Canaan (Nu ch. 13 and Dt 1 22 ff.) and the two whom Joshua sent to ascertain the condition of Jerieho (Jos 2 1 ff.). In the first instance, the narrative in Nu ch. 13 appears to be composite, a fusion of two distinct accounts. In one (P), twelve men are selected by Moses at the command of J" and sent from the wilderness of Paran to go through the entire length of Canaan, even to its extreme N. boundary. They were gone forty days and returned with an evil report which greatly discouraged the people (Nu 13 1-17a, 21, 26a, 32). According to the other account (JE), it was the people at Kadesh who requested that spies be sent. Moses agreed, selected twelve men, and sent them into "the South" (q.v.) and into the "hill-country" as far as the Valley of Eschol (near Hebron) to examine the land very carefully and bring back specimens of its fruit. This was done, but the majority of the spies were so terrified by the gigantic inhabitants and the strong cities that they discouraged the people from attempting the conquest (Nu 13 17b-20, 22-24, 26b-31, 33, and Dt 1 22-33). It also seems likely that in JE's account Joshua was not thought of as one of the spies, since Caleb alone is mentioned (Nu 13 30; Dt 1 36; cf. Nu 14 34). In P's account Joshua is named in the list (Nu 13 8). There can be no doubt that the tradition as found in JE is the more trustworthy. A tentative analysis of this into its original elements (J and E) is possible (Nu 13 17a f., 18a,c, 19, 22, 27, 28, 30 = J; 17b f., 18b, 20, 29, 33 = E), but the differences here are not great.

The account of Joshua's spies (Jos ch. 2) is also composite. In one strand emphasis is laid upon the fact that Rahab's house was on the city wall so that she could let the spies down through a window which was to be designated by a scarlet thread in order that she could be rescued when the city was captured (see especially vs. 12, 14, 15, 17-21, and the sequel in 6 21, 25). In the other strand, the location of Rahab's house is not given, and in the sequel, while the wall has fallen flat (6 20), the spies go into the city to rescue Rahab (6 22 f.). E. E. N.

SPONGE: Sponges are found in abundance in the Mediterranean. Their use in Palestine in the time of Christ is attested by the Gospels, which record the manner in which a drug designed to lessen pain was administered to Jesus (Mt 27 48; Mk 15 36; Jn 19 29). J. M. T.

SPOON. See TEMPLE, § 16, and TABERNACLE, § 3 (3).

SPOUSE: The translation of the Heb. term kallāh (Song 4 8-12, 5 1; Hos 4 13 f., all AV), which is more accurately rendered in RV by "bride." E. E. N.

SPRING: The geological formation of Palestine and the elimate with its long dry season give an exceptional value and importance to springs especially to those that are perennial (see PALESTINE, §§ 14–16, 19 f.). It was due to this that springs were venerated with sincere reverenee and often thought of (especially in very early times) as abodes of deity (see SEMITIC RELIGION, § 8), a mode of thought that persisted down to comparatively late times. Names of places located near springs were often compound, the first syllable, En ('ayn), meaning 'spring.' E. E. N.

STACTE, stac'ti or -tē. See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 2 (1).

STAFF: This term renders the following Heb. and Gr. words: (1) badh, 'bar of wood.' Such bars were used in the building of the sanctuary (Ex 25 13 f.; Nu 4 6 f.; I K 8 7). (2) hōtz, 'ēts, 'etsāh, 'tree' 'wood'; but, more particularly, the shaft of a spear (I S 17 7, 21 19). (3) mōt, mōṭāh, 'pole' which two persons might use in carrying a load on their shoulders (Nu 13 23; I Ch 15 15). (4) maṭṭeh, 'rod,' 'cane,' carried about as a badge of dignity or personal convenience (Gn 38 25); also figuratively (Ezk 4 16, 5 16). (5) māqēl, the same as (4) (Gn 32 10). (6) mish'eneth, mash'ēnāh, 'stay,' 'support' (Jg 6 21; Ex 21 19; Is 3 1). (7) pelekh, 'a distaff'—to lean upon (II S 3 29). (8) shēbheṭ, 'cane,' 'reed' (II S 23 21). (9) ξύλον, 'bludgeon,' used in attack or defense (Mt 26 47). (10) ῥάβδος, 'cane,' the same as (4) (Mt 10 10). A. C. Z.

STEERSMAN. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

STEPHANAS, stef'a-nas (Στεφανᾶς): One of the first converts in Achaia, whom, together with his family, Paul baptized (I Co 1 16, 16 15). With Achaicus and Fortunatus, he seems to have come to Ephesus with messages from the Corinthian church, probably also with the letter to which our I Co is a reply. These messengers were probably also the bearers of the latter Epistle. J. M. T.

STEPHEN, stī'vn (Στέφανος, 'crown'): One of "the seven" prominent disciples in the early Church who were chosen to see to the distribution of food, etc., to the needy members of the community (Ac 6 5 f.). His Gr. name indicates probably that he was a Hellenistic Jew. He was noted for his faith and spiritual gifts (Ac 5 5, 8). His activity in the new cause brought him into conflict with the zealous Hellenistic Jews of Jerusalem, who, angered by his eloquent presentation of the new faith, at last brought him to trial before the Sanhedrin, on the formal charge of blasphemy. In spite of his character, his defense of his faith in Christ was not heeded. He was rudely interrupted, condemned to death, and stoned, Saul of Tarsus consenting to the act and holding the garments of the chief witnesses against Stephen (Ac 6 11–8 1, 22 20).

Stephen was not only the first Christian martyr, but he was also the first of the early primitive Apostolic Church to perceive the logical consequences of Jesus' teaching, viz., that the existing Jewish cultus, with its traditions and its Temple, was of a temporary character, and that with the recognition of Jesus as the Messiah a new era had dawned in which these things were of secondary value. We have only a fragment of his speech preserved, but this, with the charge that was formulated against him, shows the general drift of his thought. He thus anticipated Paul in asserting the larger, more universal scope of Christianity. It was a remarkable fact that Saul of Tarsus, who held the garments of Stephen's executioners, was destined to become the chief exponent of the principles for which Stephen died. E. E. N.

STERN. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

STEWARD, STEWARDSHIP: In the O T "steward" is not the rendering of a simple Heb. term (except in I Ch 28 1 AV, where the Heb. is sar, 'prince' or 'ruler'). In Gn 43 16, 19, 44 4, the Heb. means 'one who is over the house.' In Gn 15 2, "steward" AV, the literal rendering is "son of the possession of my house," i.e., 'possessor of my house'; cf. RV. But the text here is suspicious. In Dn 1 11, 16 the Heb. word meltsar (Melzar AV) is probably the title of the officer who had charge of Daniel. The RV renders "steward," but this is little more than a guess. In the N T ἐπίτροπος is a general term for a caretaker and is well rendered "steward" in Mt 20 8; Lk 8 3. But in Gal 4 2 ("steward" RV), "guardian" or "governor" (AV) is equally preferable. The other N T terms οἰκονόμος, οἰκονομία, οἰκονομεῖν (all derived from οἰκία, 'house,' and νέμειν, 'to manage') are well rendered by "steward," "stewardship," the plain reference being to the management of a large property by an overseer. Paul (I Co 4 1 f.; Tit 1 7) and Peter (I P 4 10) use the term οἰκονόμος figuratively of the Christian ministry. E. E. N.

STOCKS. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (b).

STOICS, stō'ics (οἱ Στωικοί): One of the philosophic schools of Greece, adherents of which disputed with Paul in Athens (Ac 17 18, "Stoicks" AV). The Stoics were so called because Zeno (331–264 B.C.), the founder of Stoicism, lectured in the Στοὰ ποικίλη ('colonnade decorated with paintings'), though the real literary founder of Stoicism was Chrysippus (280–207). Zeno's starting-point was the Cynicism of Crates, on which he constructed a philosophical system of his own that went far beyond the narrow limits of Cynicism. The moral teachings of Stoicism were austere, and their practical, cosmopolitan character greatly influenced men of the period. Stoics postulated the ideal wise man, who is guided by reason, regulates his emotions or passions in accordance with the assent given by the mind to its perceptions, is unmoved by joy or grief, and submits uncomplainingly to necessity. He alone attains to virtue, the chief end of man, and brings his actions into harmony with nature and the universal reason inherent in nature, that is, he subordinates the human to the Divine will. Action (business and politics) is a necessity for man. Virtue insures happiness, but happiness is not the chief end of man; though without passion, the wise man is not without feeling. He is not indulgent, but just to himself and others. He alone is free, a king and lord, the peer of Zeus himself. The world arose from fire; so did mind, which is a real corporeal entity, and into fire they resolve themselves again by effluxion. The universal reason that moves all things acts in accordance with fixed laws. This working formative force in the universe is God, whose existence is proved by the dispensations of providence, divination, and the allegorical interpretation of popular beliefs. Stoicism was popularized by Marcus Aurelius, but finally (after Antoninus) supplanted by Syncretism.

STOMACHER, stum'ak-ẹr: The rendering of the Heb. pᵉthīgīl (Is 3 24 AV, "robe" RV). The exact meaning of the Heb. word is unknown. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 6.

E. E. N.

STONE: The Heb. and Aram. 'ebhen and Gr. λίθος are the common words thus translated. In addition, tsūr (Job 22 24), 'rock,' tsᵉrōr (II S 17 13), 'pebble,' and ψῆφος, 'a small worn stone,' are translated "stone" in RV. In the following passages the AV rendering "stone" is changed in RV: ṣela', "rock" i.e., 'cliff' (Ps 137 9, 141 6); paḥadh, "thigh" (Job 40 17); ḥeres, "potsherd" (Job 41 30); πέτρος, "Peter" (Jn 1 42). The natural stones served as a pillow (Gn 28 11, 18); as a sacred pillar (matstsēbhāh; see PILLAR) (Gn 28 18, 22, 35 14, etc.); as a memorial (Jos 4 3 ff.); as a witness (Gn 31 45 f.; Jos 24 26 f.); as a seat (Ex 17 12); as a well-covering (Gn 29 2 f., 8 ff.); or, heaped up, as a covering for dead bodies (Jos 7 26, 8 29; cf. 10 18, 27; I S 18 17); and also for sealing tombs (Mt 27 60, 28 2; Jn 11 38 f.). The Law was inscribed on stones (Dt 27 2 ff.; Jos 8 32). Unhewn stones were used for altars (Jos 8 31; Ex 20 25; Dt 27 5 f.; cf. Jg 9 5, 18, and I S 14 33; I K 18 31 ff.; I S 6 14 ff., also as the resting-place of the Ark; cf. ver. 18 RV). Stones on the land were thought to injure it (II K 3 19, 25; cf. 'stony ground,' Mk 4 16, etc.), were dangerous to the traveler on foot (Is 62 10; Ps 91 12 = Mt 4 6; cf. the figurative use of "stone of stumbling," Is 8 14; I P 2 8). Ore is called "stone" (Dt 8 9; Job 28 2). For "stone" (Is 34 11 AV), RV has "plummet." Small stones were used as weapons (Ex 21 18; Nu 35 17, 23); they were hurled by engines (II Ch 26 15) or by slings (Jg 20 16; I S 17 40 ff.; I Ch 12 2 ff.; Job 41 28). Stones were thrown as an expression of hatred (II S 16 6; cf. Jn 8 59, 10 31), where the use of stones as a punishment for certain crimes is perhaps also intended, as often in the O T and N T. Cf. the verbs ṣāqal, rāgham, λιθάζειν, καταλιθάζειν (Lk 20 6), λιθοβολεῖν, 'to stone.' Death by stoning was the punishment, among other things, for idolatry (Dt 13 10, 17 5; cf. Lv 20 2); for possession of familiar spirits (Lv 20 27); for cursing (Lv 24 23); for unchastity of certain forms (Dt 22 21, 24; cf. Jn 8 7); Naboth was stoned (I K 21 13); also a hated taskmaster (I K 12 18); as a material, stone was used for vessels (Ex 7 19), tables (Ezk 40 42), tablets (Ex 24 12, etc.; Dt 4 13, etc.; I K 8 9), idols (Dt 4 28, etc.). Stones served for pavements (II K 16 17, etc.) and walls (Pr 24 31); great and costly hewn stones were used in buildings (I K 5 17 f., 6 7, etc.), as foundations (Is 28 16), as walls (Lv 14 40 ff.); for the capstone (Zec 4 7; cf. 3 9), the corner-stone (Job 38 6); the term is a figure of honor (Jer 51 26; cf. Is 28 16) and of the Messiah (Ps 118 22; Mt 21 42). Stones were set up as topographical marks (Jos 15 6, 18 17; I S 7 13, "Eben-ezer," 'ebhen hā-'āzer; I S 20 19; I K 1 9). Precious stones (q.v.) were largely used in the Temple (II Ch 3 6, etc.). Hailstones are mentioned (Jos 10 11). Characteristics of a stone occur in similitudes—heaviness (sinking) (Ex 15 5; cf. Neh 9 11; Jer 51 63), immobility (Ex 15 16), strength (Job 6 12), firmness (Job 41 24), commonness (I K 10 27; II Ch 1 15, 9 27, etc.), dumbness (Hab 2 19; cf. Lk 19 40). In metaphors—men become stones (are petrified) through fear (I S 25 37; Ex 15 16); are hard of heart (Ezk 11 19, 36 26).

C. S. T.

STONES, PRECIOUS: The collective expression "precious stones" (Heb. and Gr. in the sing., 'ebhen yᵉqārāh, λίθος τίμιος, II S 12 30; Pr 17 18; Ezk 28 13; Rev 21 19, etc.) is used in the Bible in a non-technical and practical rather than in a precise and accurate sense. Variant expressions are "pleasant stones," Is 54 12 AV; "stones to be set," I Ch 29 2; Ezk 28 13; "glistering stones," I Ch 29 2 AV; "stones for inlaid work," I Ch 29 2 ARV. These all designate roughly defined groups of minerals (exclusive of the simple metals) which on the ground of real or imaginary qualities had come to be regarded as extremely valuable. Gems seem to have been chiefly imported rather than indigenous to Palestine (I K 10 11; Ezk 27 22; cf. I K 10 2, 10). The art of engraving stones for signet-rings was known from the earliest times (Ex 28 11; cf. Gn 38 18; I K 21 8). Jewels were also inset in crowns (II S 12 30) and were types of beauty, rareness, and costliness (Job 28 16 ff.; Pr 17 8); but the statement that Solomon garnished the Temple with "precious stones" (II Ch 3 6) which had been gathered for that purpose by David (I Ch 29 2, 8) shows that the Jews did not make our modern distinction between rare gems and ornamental stones, such as onyx and agate.

1. General Character of Allusions to Precious Stones in the Bible.

The term jewels in the EVV does not represent strictly gems or precious stones, but is used with the same breadth as in other connections and designates any articles, either manufactured or as found in nature, which may serve as ornaments or ornamental utensils. The Heb. words which it renders are kelī (Gn 24 53; Ex 11 2; Nu 31 50), ḥᵉlī, ḥᵉlyāh Song 7 1; Hos 2 13), nezem, 'nose-ring' (Pr 11 22; cf. DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II, § 1), and ṣᵉgullāh (Mal 3 17; cf. PECULIAR PEOPLE).

The most important Biblical references to precious stones are in the following passages: Ex 28 17-20 39 10-13 (the high priest's breastplate), Job 28 16-19 (the value of wisdom), Ezk 28 13 (the covering of the king of Tyre), Rev 21 11, 18-21 (the new Jerusalem). In speaking of precious stones as a class the tendency seems to have been to reduce their number to twelve. This is the case with the three lists in Ex, Ezk, and Rev. The second of these lists as given in the Heb. text contains only nine gems, but in the LXX. the number is twelve. A comparison of the lists shows that they are intended to include the same stones, those on the breastplate of the high priest being taken as the model list.

The identification of the stones of the high priest's breastplate is a problem of great difficulty. We are quite sure that certain gems were unknown to the ancients; some, such as the diamond, ruby, and pearl, must be excluded from the list because of the large surface required (at least 2 sq. in.), and others were too hard to be engraved by the methods then in use. Positively, the ancient versions (cf. also Jos. Ant. III, 7 5; BJ, V, 5 7) tell us what the Heb. names were supposed to indicate at the time these translations were made; in the case of a few jewels mentioned also in other connections, the context gives a clue; and the etymology is suggestive in some instances. Nevertheless, several of the identifications proposed below are hardly more than guesses.

2. The Stones of the Breastplate.

The ancient translations often evidence great uncertainty, the same word being rendered several different ways in the same version. AV seems quite at sea in some of its identifications, but is more consistent than ARV, whose marginal readings are inexcusably careless. See below, e.g., pᵉnīnīm and tarshīsh.

The twelve stones were:

(1) 'ōdhem, the 'red' stone (Ex 28 17; Ezk 28 13), sardius; "ruby" EVmg. Almost certainly the sard, a brownish-red variety of carnelian; the same as N T "sardius" (Rev 21 20) or sardine stone (Rev 4 3 AV). (2) pīṭᵉdhāh (Ex 28 17; Job 28 19; Ezk 28 13) = τοπάζιον (Rev 21 20), topaz. Probably modern chrysolite. (3) bāreqeth, the 'flashing' stone (Ex 28 17; Ezk 28 13), carbuncle; "emerald" ARVmg. The same stone as N T σμάραγδος, emerald (Rev 21 19; cf. 4 3). Presumably rock-crystal, though emerald is not impossible. (4) nōphek (Ex 28 18; Ezk 27 16, 28 13), emerald; "chrysoprase" AVmg.; "carbuncle" (a clear red garnet) ARVmg., which is doubtless correct. (5) ṣappīr (Ex 28 18; Is 54 11; La 4 7, etc.) = N T σάπφειρος, sapphire. The modern sapphire, however, was unknown in ancient times, so this stone must be the lapis lazuli (Rev 21 19 ARVmg.). (6) yahălōm, the 'hard' stone (Ex 28 18; Ezk 28 13), diamond, which is out of the question (see above). ARVmg. renders by "sardonyx." Perhaps by this the onyx is meant. (7) leshem (Ex 28 19), ligure AV; jacinth ARV; "amber" ARVmg. Possibly the yellow jacinth, though the identification is very doubtful. (8) shᵉbhō (Ex 28 19), agate, seems correct. (9) 'aḥlāmāh (Ex 28 19) = ἀμέθυστος (Rev 21 20). Without doubt the modern amethyst. (10) tarshīsh (Ezk 28 13), beryl; "chrysolite" AVmg.; "chalcedon" ARVmg. (Ex 28 20), "topaz" (Song 5 14), "stone of Tarshish" (Ezk 10 9). Some golden-yellow stone, perhaps the topaz. If so, the same as the "chrysolite" of Rev 21 20. (11) shōham (Gn 2 12; Ex 28 9, 20; Job 28 16; Ezk 28 13, etc.), onyx; beryl ARVmg. is probably correct. Beryl is also mentioned in Rev 21 20. (12) yāshᵉphēh (Ex 28 20; Ezk 28 13). The EVV are surely right in identifying this with the N T ἴασπις (Rev 4 3, 21 11, 18, 19), the modern jasper.

3. Other Precious Stones.

The following precious stones are mentioned in the O T: (1) bᵉdhōlaḥ (Gn 2 12; Nu 11 7); may be a gem (? pearl), but more probably is bdellium (so EV), a fragrant, resinous gum. (2) rāmōth (Job 28 18; Ezk 27 16); may be some kind of coral. (3) pᵉnīnīm (Pr 3 15, 8 11, etc.), rubies; "corals" ARVmg. (La 4 7), "red coral or pearls" (Job 28 18). Probably the red coral, which was highly prized by the ancients. (4) shāmīr, diamond (Jer 17 1), and adamant (Ezk 3 9; Zec 7 12), was a hard, cutting-stone, probably the modern emery. (5) gābhīsh (Job 28 18), pearl AV; crystal ARV. Probably the rock-crystal. (6) kadhkhōdh, the 'sparkling' stone (Is 54 12; Ezk 27 16), agate AV; "chrysoprase" AVmg.; ruby ARV may be correct; but the identification is doubtful. (7) zᵉkhūkhīth (Job 28 17), crystal AV, is probably glass (ARV), which was rare and precious in ancient times.

The arrangement of the stones on the breastplate was probably as indicated in the following diagram:

3 Rock-Crystal? (transparent)	2 Chrysolite? (yellow)	1 Sard (red)
6* Onyx? (black and white)	5 Lapis Lazuli (blue)	4 Carbuncle (red)
9 Amethyst (purple)	8 Agate (red?)	7 Jacinth? (yellow)
12* Jasper (green?)	11 Beryl? (green)	10 Topaz? (yellow)

* Nos. 6 and 12 are interchanged in the LXX.

Besides those already mentioned (see above, § 2, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 5, 9, 10, 11, 12), the following gems are named in the N T: (8) χρυσόπρασος (Rev 21 20), chrysoprase; chrysoprasus, a green variety of chalcedony. (9) χαλκηδών (Rev 21 19), chalcedony, was a green stone from the copper-mines near Chalcedon, probably dioptase (emerald copper). (10) μαργαρίτης (Mt 7 6; I Ti 2 9; Rev 17 4, etc.) is, of course, the pearl. (11) κρύσταλλος (Rev 4 6, 21 1; cf. 21 11), crystal, i.e., rock-crystal. (12) ὑάκινθος (Rev 21 20; cf. 9 17), jacinth AV and ARV (hyacinth in 9 17); "sapphire" ARVmg. is doubtless correct. (13) σαρδόνυξ (Rev 21 20) is rightly rendered sardonyx (red and white onyx).

STONE-SQUARER. See GEBAL.

STONING. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, §§ 2 (c), 3 (a).

STOOL: (1) The rendering of 'obhnayīm in Ex 1 16. The word means literally 'potter's wheel' (cf. Jer 18 3) and was applied, because of similarity of form, to a kind of stool, used in midwifery as a support to a woman at childbirth ("birth-stool" RV). (2) kiṣṣē', i.e., a seat of some sort (II K 4 10). The word is commonly used for "throne." E. E. N.

STORIES. See COSMOGONY, § 3.

STRANGERS AND SOJOURNERS. See GENTILES.

STRANGE WIFE, STRANGE WOMAN. See GENTILES.

STRANGLED (THINGS): In the letter sent by the Apostolic Council to the Gentile Christians, the latter were recommended to "abstain from things sacrificed to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled and from fornication; from which if ye keep yourselves, it shall be well with you" (Ac 15 29; cf. vs. 20, 25). "Strangled" things (πνικτά) were animals put to death without shedding their blood. To eat such animals was intensely repugnant to Jewish feeling (cf. Lv 17 13; Dt 12 16, 23; which illustrate the general attitude, though they do not specifically treat of "strangled" things). The Jewish Christians of Jerusalem felt that in regard to such things Gentile Christians ought to conform to the standards of Judaism, evidently thinking of them as moral rather than ceremonial requirements.
E. E. N.

STRAW: The rendering of the Heb. tebhen, which means the stalks of the grain in their broken or 'chopped' state after threshing (see AGRICULTURE, § 8). This finely broken straw was used both as fodder (Gn 24 25, 32; Jg 19 19, etc.) and in the manufacture of brick (Ex 5 7 ff.). E. E. N.

STREET. See CITY, § 4.

STRENGTH OF ISRAEL: A designation of J", Israel's God, in I S 15 29. The Heb. word nētsah, rendered "strength," means 'brilliancy' or 'fame,' and probably "glory" would be a better rendering than "strength." E. E. N.

STRIPES. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (b).

STRONG, STRONG MAN. See MAN (5), (6).

STRONGHOLD. See CITY, § 4.

STUBBLE: The rendering of the Heb. qash (from a root meaning 'dry'), designating the dry stems of grass, or grain, that remain in the field after harvesting (cf. Ex 15 7), quick to burn (Is 5 24), and easily blown about by the wind (Job 21 18). The word is frequently used as a symbol of that which is light, unstable, and passes quickly away (Is 33 11, 40 24, etc.). E. E. N.

STUD: This word occurs only once (ʿequddōth, Song 1 11), in the pl., as the name of an ornament consisting of small silver points, sprinkled over a gold surface, which in this case is either in the form of a ball or of a plait (RV). A. C. Z.

STUFF: This term is the AV rendering of kēlī (twelve times), mᵉlā'khāh (only Ex 36 7, lit. 'work'), and σκεῦος (only Lk 17 31, "goods" RV; cf. Mt 12 29; Mk 3 27) in the sense of 'goods,' often household furniture and utensils (Gn 31 37; Neh 13 8, etc.). The RV has "baggage" (I S 10 22, 25 13, 30 24) for impedimenta of an army or a company of travelers.
C. S. T.

STUMBLE, STUMBLING-BLOCK: Life, in its moral or religious aspects, being often likened to a walk, or progress in a way or path, the terms "stumbling" and "stumbling-block" are often used figuratively of practises or conceptions that are detrimental to religion and morals. Such O T expressions as are found in the Prophets (Is 8 14, 28 7, 57 14; Jer 6 21, 18 15) are frequently applied in the N T, both by Jesus (Mt 5 29; Mk 9 42, 14 27, etc.) and by Paul (Ro 14 13, 21; I Co 8 9 ff.), in a general sense and also with special reference to the difficulty the Jews found in believing on Jesus as the Messiah (Ro 9 32 f.; I Co 1 23; see also I P 2 8). E. E. N.

SUAH, sū'ā (סוּחַ, sūaḥ): A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 36). E. E. N.

SUBTLE, SUBTILE: This term renders, in the AV (1) ḥākhām, 'wise'; the context of II S 13 3 gives it an evil meaning. (2) mirmāh, 'guile' as RV (Gn 27 35). (3) nākhal (in Hithpael), 'deal knavishly' (4) nātsar, 'secretive,' 'wily' as RV (Pr 7 10). (5) ʿāqᵉbhāh, 'insidiousness' (II K 10 19). (6) ʿārōm, 'crafty' (I S 23 22). In Pr in a good sense 'shrewd.' (7) ʿārūm, 'crafty' (Gn 3 1); with a good meaning in Pr. (8) ʿormāh, 'prudence' as RV (Pr 1 4, 8 5, 12), a true knowledge of the principles of life. Also in a bad sense (Ex 21 14; Jos 9 4). (9) δόλος, from a vb. meaning 'catch with a bait' or 'line' (Mt 26 4; Ac 13 10, "guile" RV). (10) πανουργία, 'craftiness' as RV (II Co 11 3), in LXX. for ʿormāh in a good sense. C. S. T.

SUCATHITES, sū'cath-aits (הַשֻּׂכָתִי, sūkhāthīm, Suchathites AV): One of three families of "scribes" (i.e., persons learned in the Law, etc.) who lived at Jabesh in Judah (locality unknown) and who reckoned their descent from the Rechabites (I Ch 2 55). The statement implies post-exilic conditions.
E. E. N.

SUCCOTH, suc'eth (סֻכּוֹת, ṣukkōth), 'booths': 1. A place near the Jabbok, at which Jacob on his return from Paddan-aram built booths for his cattle (Gn 33 17). By some it is identified with Tell Deir 'Alla, 1 m. N. of the Zerka, or Jabbok (Map III, H 3); by others it is located somewhere on the S. side of the same stream. According to Jos 13 27, it was within the territory of Sihon, King of Heshbon; according to Jg 8 4 ff., Gideon, in pursuing the kings of Midian, crossed over the Jordan and came to Succoth. Near it were the foundries of Solomon (I K 7 46; II Ch 4 17). Robinson proposed as a possible site 'Ain es-Sâkût, a place 9 m. S. of Bethshan, on the W. side of the Jordan, but this is very improbable. 2. The camping-place at which the Israelites first halted after starting from Egypt (Ex 12 37; Nu 33 5), probably to be located near the modern Ramses, in Wâdy Tumilât, in the NE. portion of the Delta. Though the name is good Hebrew, Naville and Brugsch derive it from Thuku, or Thuket, a district in ancient Goshen. See map under ISRAEL, § 3 (2).
G. L. R.

SUCCOTH-BENOTH, suc"oth-bi'noth סֻכּוֹת בְּנוֹת, ṣukkōth bᵉnōth): The name of an idol introduced into Samaria by the Babylonians (II K 17 30). It may be either a corruption of Zarpanit, the consort of Marduk, the tutelary deity of Babylon (so Rawlinson and Schrader), or it may be the Hebraized form of the Assyr. sakkut binûti, the 'supreme judge of the universe' (so F. Delitzsch). Amos probably alludes to the same deity in the phrase "the tabernacle [sikkuth] of your king" (5 26), which was an image carried in procession. See also SEMITIC RELIGION, §§ 19 and 33 (2). G. L. R.

SUCCOURER. See PHŒBE.

SUCHATHITES, sū'cath-aits. See SUCATHITES.

SUITS OF APPAREL: The rendering of the Heb. mahălātsōth in Is 3 22 AV ("festival robes" RV). Garments of costly material are probably meant. The same word is rendered "rich apparel" in Zec 3 4. E. E. N.

SUKKIIM, sŭk'ki-im (סֻכִּיִּים, ṣukkiyyīm): A people who, with the Lubim and Ethiopians, accompanied Shishak, King of Egypt, against King Rehoboam (II Ch 12 3). The LXX. has "Troglodytes." Wiedemann suggests the inhabitants of the land of Succoth (Ex 12 37) in Egypt (Thuku), near Pithom. C. S. T.

SUNRISING: A part of the phrase "toward the sunrising," which correctly renders mizraḥ shemesh (Nu 21 11, etc.; without shemesh, 'sun,' Nu 34 15). It means 'the East.' C. S. T.

SUPERFLUOUS PARTS. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (10).

SUPERSCRIPTION: In the NT ἐπιγραφή is used (1) of the inscription on a coin designating the authority under whom it was minted (Mk 12 16 and ||s). (2) Of the designation of the crime for which a criminal was crucified. This was written in brief form on a board and nailed to the cross above the head of the sufferer, after being suspended from his neck or carried before him on the way to the execution. Mt calls it the αἰτία ("accusation," 27 37), while John (19 19 ff.) designates it as a τίτλος, title. Mk and Lk use ἐπιγραφή ("superscription," Mk 15 26; Lk 23 38). The wording of the accusation is not reported in exactly the same terms by the different evangelists. John tells us that it was in three languages (since Palestine had such a mixed population). Common to all the Gospels are the words "King of the Jews," which expressed the actual charge. Possibly, the wording varied slightly in each of the three languages. E. E. N.

SUPH, sŭf (סוּף, ṣūph): A name which, with others, aims to define the place where Moses delivered his farewell (Dt 1 1). The names are all somewhat puzzling, and no satisfactory explanation is at hand. Some would identify Suph with Suphah (Nu 21 14); but as the site of this is also unknown the difficulty remains. The AV in both instances reads "Red Sea," because the 'Sea of Suph' (i.e., 'reeds') was its Heb. name, but this rendering is certainly wrong. E. E. N.

SUPHAH, sū'fā (סוּפָה, ṣūphāh, Red Sea AV): A locality celebrated in a fragment of ancient song (Nu 21 14). It was somewhere among the upper valleys of the Arnon, but its exact site is unknown. See also SUPH. E. E. N.

SURETY. See PLEDGE.

SURFEITING: The term κραιπάλη, rendered "surfeiting" (Lk 21 34), means literally the headache and nausea following a debauch, from which it came to be used sometimes to signify the intemperate revelings themselves. S. D.

SURNAME. See NAME.

SUSA, sū'sa. See SHUSHAN.

SUSANCHITE, su-san'cait. See SHUSHANCHITE.

SUSANNA, su-zan'a (Σουσάννα; from the Heb. shāshannāh, 'lily'): 1. One of the women who befriended Jesus (Lk 8 3). 2. A character from which an apocryphal document is named. See DANIEL, APOCRYPHAL ADDITIONS TO, § 2. E. E. N.

SUSI, sū'sai (סוּסִי, ṣūṣī): The father of Gaddi, a Manassite (Nu 13 11). E. E. N.

SWADDLE, SWADDLING-BAND: These words render in the AV: (1) ṭāphaḥ, 'dandle' (cf. La 2 22 RV), lit. 'to carry on the palms of the hands,' from a denominative ṭephaḥ, 'handbreadth.' (2) ḥāthal (in Hoph.), 'enwrap,' 'swaddle,' used (Ezk 16 4) of Jerusalem under the figure of an infant. (3) ḥăthullāh, "swaddling-band," used (Job 38 9) figuratively of dark clouds enveloping the sea. (4) σπαργανοῦν, 'wrap in swaddling-bands' (Lk 2 7, 12). The infant was placed diagonally on a square piece of cloth, the ends of which were turned over the body, the feet, and under the head, and fastened by bands tied around the child thus wrapped up. C. S. T.

SWALLOW. See PALESTINE, § 25.

SWAN. See PALESTINE, § 25.

SWEAR. See OATH.

SWEAT, BLOODY: The expression occurs in Lk 22 44, a passage whose right in the text is very much disputed. Whether it is intended to denote the actual exudation of blood with water in the perspiration is also a question. If this is not the meaning, the drops of sweat alluded to somehow must have resembled blood. The occurrence of the escape of blood with perspiration is attested by historical instances (cf. Plummer, Int. Crit. Com., ad loc.). A. C. Z.

SWEET CANE. See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 1, and PALESTINE, § 22.

SWEET INCENSE, ODOR. See Ointments and Perfumes, § 2, and Sacrifice and Offerings, § 15.

SWIFT BEASTS, SWIFT STEEDS: These words render in the AV: (1) kirkārōth (Is 66 20, "dromedaries" RV). (2) rekhesh (Mic 1 13), 'steed.' The term rekhesh was probably used of a special breed of horses in the service of kings because of their swiftness. RV reads "swift steed" (I K 4 28 [5 8], "dromedaries" AV; Est 8 10, 14, "mules" AV). See also Palestine, § 24. C. S. T.

SWINE: The Heb. term ḥăzīr refers to the undomesticated wild boar of Palestine, which was used by the Canaanites and Syrians both for food and sacrifice. The Israelites were specially forbidden to eat swine's flesh (Lv 11 7, etc.), and came to look with abhorrence on such a practise. Both the flesh and blood of swine were thought to be exceptionally repulsive to J" (Is 65 4, 66 3, 17). Though loyal Jews would have nothing to do with swine, they were acquainted with their habits, which served to give point to popular proverbs (Pr 11 22; Mt 7 6). See also Palestine, § 24. E. E. N.

SWORD. See Arms and Armor, § 2.

SYCAMINE, sic'a-min, SYCAMORE. See Food and Food Utensils, § 5, and Palestine, § 21.

SYCHAR, sai'cār (Συχάρ, Jn 4 5): A town in Samaria identified by its nearness to the well of Jacob. According to a tradition, based probably on Gn 33 19 and 48 22, the patriarch had given this, with some land surrounding it, to his son Joseph. The town is noted as the residence of the Samaritan woman with whom Jesus engaged in the conversation recorded in Jn ch. 4. Some difficulty is experienced in identifying the modern site (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, pp. 367 ff.). But, upon the whole, there is a considerable unanimity in finding the modern equivalent of the name "Sychar" in El-Askar, a village, with a spring and some ancient rock-hewn tombs, about ½ m. N. of Jacob's well. See art. Shechem for a map illustrating the site. A. C. Z.

SYNAGOGUE, THE (συναγωγή, 'an assembling together,' used frequently in the LXX. for the congregation [qāhāl] or the assembly ['ēdhāh] of Israel; in later times, the equivalent of the Aram. bēth ha-khᵉneṣeth, 'the house of assembly'): The local organization common in later Israel, for the purposes of worship, education, and for the supervision of the social and civil life of the community. That an institution of such importance in the history of Judaism as the synagogue should be invested by Jewish tradition with great age is not surprising. The fact is, however, that we are quite in the dark as to its beginnings. These beginnings were, doubtless, in the time of the Captivity, when the loss of the Temple worship and the conditions of exile emphasized the need of worship and instruction. The return of the exiles, with their desire deepened by suffering, to keep the Law and be faithful to their God, opened the way for the development of synagogal services alongside of the Temple cultus. As there is no mention of the synagogue in the O T Apocrypha, we are without means of tracing its development. This development, however, must have been steady and substantial, for in the times of the N T we find the synagogue widely established and exercising a weighty influence in Jewish life.

1. Origin.

In considering this phase of the subject, we must distinguish, as Schürer indicates, between towns in which there was a mixed population of Jews and Gentiles and those which were wholly Jewish. In the former an independent organization for religious matters would be necessary, if the Jews were not greatly in the majority. In a town made up entirely of Jews—certainly in a small town—the civil and religious authorities would be identical, i.e., the elders of the town would be also the elders of the synagogue. We can not be sure that in large towns, where there were several synagogal communities, there was a separate body of elders for each community, except, perhaps, where synagogues for different nationalities existed, as in Jerusalem. From early times it seems to have been a requirement that a synagogue should not be erected in a town where there were not ten men of leisure to look after its affairs. A synagogue thus constituted was under the government of the elders, who had the right to discipline and punish offending members. The methods of punishment were scourging and excommunication. In addition to the elders, who had general supervision over the affairs of the synagogal community, the following officials were immediately connected with the synagogue: (1) The ruler of the synagogue (ἀρχισυνάγωγος), whose duty it was to look after the external order in public worship, to select teachers or readers, to examine the discourses of public speakers, and, in general, to see that the service was conducted in accord with ancestral usage. He had also the supervision of the synagogue building. The office was not identical with that of 'elder' (πρεσβύτερος), or 'ruler' (ἄρχων), nor with that of 'president of the Gerousia' (γερουσιάρχης), though one person could fill two offices, e.g., that of 'ruler' and 'ruler of the synagogue,' at the same time. As ruler of the synagogue, his duties were confined entirely to the synagogue, i.e., he had no part in the general direction of the affairs of the community. Each synagogue had one ἀρχισυνάγωγος. (2) The ḥazzan or "attendant" (ὑπηρέτης, minister AV, Lk 4 20). It was incumbent upon him to bring forth the sacred rolls of Scripture for reading, and to replace them in the ark, or sacred chest. He executed the punishment of scourging, and instructed the children in reading. (3) The receiver of alms.

(After Sanday's "Sites of the Gospels.")

As it was in the synagogue that the collection of alms took place, these men were appointed to receive and distribute the same. They correspond to the deacons of the Christian community.

3. The Synagogue Building. It will help to clearness in understanding the arrangement of the service (see below) to get before us the general construction of the synagogue and its furnishings. The size and costliness of a synagogue would depend, of course, upon the wealth of the Jewish population. Some of the synagogues of the ancient world, as, e.g., those in Antioch and Alexandria, were among the finest structures in the city. The ruins of a costly building are found at Tell Hum (Capernaum?) in Palestine. The building was generally rectangular in form, and, if of the finer order, divided in the interior by three or even five rows of columns. In Palestine, the synagogues lie N. and S., with the front on the S. The synagogue at Irbid had its door on the E. "In general, the style was influenced by the Græco-Roman, although it shows very characteristic differences from it. In particular, it was marked by a wealth of overladen ornamentation" (Schürer, HJP, II, ii, pp. 52–89). In the small places the building would be very plain and on some central site. Whatever might have been the size or character of the structure itself, the following furnishings would be found in all synagogues: (1) The chest, or ark, for the rolls of the Law and other sacred books, which were kept in linen cloths and in a case. The ark was placed in a shut-off part of the synagogue, in front of which hung a curtain. (2) The reading-platform (βῆμα) stood near the center, and upon it was the lectern (ἀναλογεῖον). (3) Seats were arranged in the remaining space for the congregation, men and women sitting apart. The chief seats of the synagogue were in front of the ark, facing the people, and were reserved for those who were held in the highest honor. (4) Lamps and trumpets completed the outfit of the synagogue. The latter were for use in the service on feast-days.

4. The Order of Service.

For the order of service the Mishna is our authority, but there is little doubt that the order which it gives was in all its principal parts that of the time of Christ. Of these there were five: (1) The recitation of the Shema, (2) prayer, (3) the reading of the Law, (4) the reading of the Prophets, (5) the benediction. The Shema, so called from the opening word ("Hear [O Israel]"), consisted of Dt 6 4-9, 11 13-21; Nu 15 37-41, two introductory benedictions, and three closing benedictions. Reference to these O T passages will show that the purpose of this part of the service, which was recited by the people, was to bring before the minds of the worshipers the sacredness of the Law. In the prayer, which was offered by one chosen for this act by the ruler of the synagogue, the people silently joined, saying "Amen" at its close. The petitioner himself stood in front of the ark. Certain fixed forms of prayer were probably in use in Christ's time. The Shemoneh Esreh is one of the finest examples of these. It did not attain its full form until after the destruction of Jerusalem, but in its earlier form was used in Christ's day. This prayer may be found in Edersheim's Life and Time of Jesus, I, p. 440. Next in order after the prayers came the Scripture lessons. As the synagogue was primarily for instruction, this part of the service was of the most importance. The ḥazzan took the roll of the Law from its place and handed it to him who was to begin the reading. On Sabbath-days at least seven persons were called upon by the rules of the synagogue to read, successively, parts of the Law. Each had to read at least three verses, and they must be read, not repeated from memory. Any member of the congregation might be invited to read, even minors, but if priests and Levites were present, they were invited first. The reader was accustomed to stand (Lk 4 16). A benediction was pronounced before and after each person's reading. Following the lesson from the Law came a lesson from the Prophets (the Haphtarah). The older historical books were included under the Prophets. Only one person was called upon for this duty. No regular order of lessons, as in the case of reading from the Law, seems here to have been followed at first. Sections were chosen rather to illustrate or enforce the lesson from the Law. Jesus in this way made choice of His own selection (Lk 4 16). As the people were not familiar with the original language of the Scriptures, it was necessary to translate them, as the reading went on, into the Aramaic. In the case of the Law, one verse was read at a time and then translated; of the Prophets, three verses were taken at a time (see TARGUM). A sermon or lecture followed the reading of the Scriptures, and this could be given by any one competent so to do. The preacher sat during his discourse (Lk 4 16). The whole service concluded by a blessing pronounced by a priest, if one were present, otherwise it was changed into the form of a prayer. The order above described is that of the principal morning service. In the afternoon and on week-day services the reading from the Prophets was omitted, and only three members took part in the reading of the Law.

5. Value and Importance of the Synagogue.

From the time of its establishment the synagogue has been of great importance to Judaism. It has, perhaps more than any other institution, given life and character to the Jewish faith. Within its sacred precincts the people came face to face not only with the Law, but with all that teaching which in interpreting the Law made Judaism what it was in Christ's day. It was the point of contact between the people and their religious teachers. There was but one Temple, while synagogues were all over the land. The people went to them with earnest purpose, listened with reverent attention, and there learned not only the requirements of the Law, but the hopes of the nation as both were interpreted to them. So the Jews have done ever since. The synagogue is the vital center of Judaism (cf. Schürer, HJP; Oesterly and Box, The Religion and Worship of the Synagogue, 1907). J. S. R.

SYNAGOGUE OF THE LIBERTINES (Λιβερτῖνοι, from Lat. libertini, 'freedmen'): The name of worshipers in one of the two synagogues in Jerusalem whose members disputed with Stephen (Ac 6 9). They were evidently Jews who had been taken captive in Pompey's war and had been liberated afterward by their masters, enjoying thus the privileges of Roman citizenship (cf. Philo, Legat. ad Caium, 23). They worshiped in this synagogue, along with Jews from Cyrene and Alexandria (τινὲς τῶν ἐκ τῆς συναγωγῆς τῆς λεγομένης Λιβερτίνων, καὶ Κυρηναίων καὶ Ἀλεξανδρέων), either as visitors to the city or as a community statedly resident in the place. In either case, they are likely to have united with their fellow worshipers in the erection of the building for their common use. The reading Λιβυστίνων, advocated by Blass (Philology of the Gospels, pp. 49 ff.), which would make them Jews of Libya and the synagogue a house of worship in general of African Jews, has considerable support. SYNTYCHE, sin'ti-kę (Συντύχη): One of Paul's fellow workers in Philippi, mentioned in Ph 4 2, together with Euodia, with whom she seems to have had some disagreement. See also EUODIA. J. M. T.

SYRACUSE, sir'a-kiūs (Συρακοῦσαι): The most important city of Sicily, situated on the E. coast of the island. It had been one of the most famous and magnificent colonies of Greece, but, along with the rest of Sicily, it suffered greatly in the civil wars of the Republic. Even in Paul's time it retained much of its splendor, Caligula having restored many of its temples; but it never recovered its importance, though the emperors gave it local self-government. Paul, as a prisoner under Roman guard, arrived here from Melita, probably toward the end of February, and waited for three days to get across to Rhegium in Italy (Ac 28 12). There is no record of any work done by the Apostle in the city. R. A. F.

SYRIA, sir'i-a, SYRIAN, sir'i-an: The name "Syria" (which does not occur in the Heb. OT, where 'Ărām is always used) seems to have been derived from the old name Suri of the Assyrian inscriptions, which denoted a district on the upper Euphrates. It came to be used by the Greek writers (from Herodotus down), and at last entirely supplanted the more correct Aram, Aramæan. Syria included the territory bounded by the Taurus Mountains, the Euphrates and the Syrian Desert, the Arabian Desert and the Mediterranean. All this territory was settled more or less thoroughly by people of Aramæan stock. Historically, Syria does not show a steady progressive development toward unification. It was always a group of related, but not united, petty kingdoms or tribes. Consequently, its history is a part of the history of the Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Greek, Roman, and Mohammedan empires successively. Not once was there in this vast region a united effort toward independent self-government. See ALEXANDER; ANTIOCH; ANTIOCHUS; ARAM; ASSYRIA; BABYLON; DAMASCUS; MACCABEES; PERSIA; ROME. E. E. N.

SYRIAN ("Syriack" AV) LANGUAGE. See ARAM, § 1, and ARAMAIC LANGUAGE.

SYROPHŒNICIAN, sai"ro-fę-nish'an (Συροφοινίκισσα): It is not clear that this designation is used with any attempt at precision (cf. Mk 7 26). If precision is not aimed at, the term is simply synonymous with Phœnician (cf. Mt 15 22, "a woman of Canaan" AV, "Canaanitish" RV); otherwise, the distinction which later appears between Syria Magna and Syria Phœnice must have already existed and found its way into popular usage. SYRTIS, sir'tis (quicksands AV). See MEDITERRANEAN.

TAANACH, tê'a-nac (תַּעְנָךְ, ta'ănākh, also ta'nākh): A Canaanite town which formed part of the line of fortresses guarding the S. border of the Plain of Esdraelon (Jos 12 21, 17 11 f., 21 25, Tanach AV; Jg 5 19; I K 4 12; I Ch 7 29). Map III, F 1. Recent excavations, conducted for the Austrian Government by Dr. Sellin in 1902–04, at T. have resulted in most interesting discoveries, including cuneiform tablets, images of Astarte, an Amorite rock-hewn altar, a whole street of sacred columns, jar-burials of newborn infants, evidences of human sacrifices in connection with the building of houses, and other proofs of an exceedingly ancient history and of the corrupt practises common to the Canaanite religion. L. G. L.

TAANATH-SHILOH, tê"a-nath-shai'lō (תַּאנַת שִׁלֹה, ta'ănath-shīlōh): A place on the NE. border of Ephraim (Jos 16 6). It was identified by Eusebius and Jerome with Thena, 10 m. E. of Nâblus (Shechem). It is probably the modern Ta'na, 7 m. SE. of Nâblus, with old cisterns and rock-tombs. Map III, G 3. G. A. Smith suggests that it was a fortress guarding the upper end of the Wâdy el-Ifjim. C. S. T.

TABBAOTH, tab'a-oth (טַבָּעוֹת, ṭabbā'ōth), 'signet-rings': The ancestral head of one of the families of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 43; Neh 7 46). E. E. N.

TABBATH, tab'ath (טַבַּת, ṭabbāth): A place somewhere in the Jordan Valley, about midway between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea (Jg 7 22). The exact site is unknown. E. E. N.

TABEEL, tê'bę-el (טָבְאֵל, ṭābh'ēl, Tabeal AV), 'God is good': 1. A person of doubtful identification in the days of Ahaz. It was the plan of Pekah and Rezin to overthrow Ahaz and place "the son of Tabeel" on the throne of Judah (Is 7 5 f.). Winckler (*KAT*³, p. 135) is confident that "the son of Tabeel" was none other than Rezin himself. The name is identical with Tabrimmon ('Rimmon is good,' I K 15 18), Rimmon being the name of a deity. In the Heb. text it is so pointed as to be pronounced Tabeal—i.e., 'good for nothing,' but this may be due simply to the pause. 2. A Persian official west of the Euphrates (Ezr 4 7). E. E. N.

TABER: This verb (only Nah 2 7 [8] AV) means 'to play on a taber [tabor],' a tambourine-like instrument without the jingles. It renders the Poel participle of tāphaph, to 'drum,' 'beat' (cf. Ps 68 25, "playing with timbrels"). In Nah 2 7, RV reads "beating upon their breasts [hearts]," an act of mourning. Stade, following the LXX., reads mᵉtsaphtsᵉphōth, Pilpel ptcpl. of tsāphaph, 'twittering.' C. S. T.

TABERAH, tab'ę-rā (תַּבְעֵרָה, tabh'ērāh), 'burning': A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 11 3; Dt 9 22). Site unknown. E. E. N.

In the priestly portions of the Hexateuch (q.v.) there are frequent references to a tent or "tabernacle" which was constructed by Moses at the command of God and, with its attendant priesthood, was the fundamental feature of Israel as the holy people of J". Outside of P, the references to the Tabernacle in the O T are, with one or two important exceptions, found only in passages influenced by the views of P.

I. The Structure Described in P.

1. Origin and Purpose of the Tabernacle.

In the narrative of P the making of the Tabernacle with the organization of the cultus was the chief work done at Sinai. Immediately after the Israelites arrived here, Moses ascended the mount to meet God, and after a six days' theophany, entered into the cloud and there received the directions concerning the Tabernacle (Ex 17 1a, 19 1-2, 24 15-18a, 25 1 ff.; see Exodus, § 4). The account in Ex 25 1–31 17 and chs. 35–40, which is continued in Lv chs. 8 and 9, is not all of one composition, but consists of several strands distinguished from one another by their terminology and by other differences (cf. Carpenter-Harford, The Comp. of the Hexateuch, p. 266, note). As the account stands it may be analyzed as follows:

I. The Directions for Making the Tabernacle, 25 1–32 17.
  Preliminary: Regarding the materials to be collected from the people, 25 1-9.
  A. The Main Section, 25 10–29 45.
    1. The three most sacred, significant, and symbolic pieces of furniture, 25 10-40.
      (1) The Ark, vs. 10-22.
      (2) The Table of Showbread, vs. 23-30.
      (3) The Candlestick, vs. 31-40.
    2. The Tabernacle, or 'dwelling' (mishkān), 26 1-37.
      (1) The 'dwelling' proper, of curtains of fine linen, vs. 1-6.
      (2) The goat's-hair "tent" over the curtain, vs. 7-13.
      (3) The "covering" of skins, ver. 14.
      (4) The "boards" (qerāshīm, = ?) of the 'dwelling,' vs. 15-25.
      (5) The "veil" (pārōkheth) between the "holy" place and the "most holy" place, vs. 31-35.

      Conclusion, as to the purpose of the Tent and the ideal embodied in it, 29 43-45.
  B. Supplementary Section, chs. 30–32.
    1. The Altar of Incense, 30 1-10.
    2. The Redemption Money, 30 11-16.
    3. The Laver of Brass, 30 17-22.
    4. The Anointing Oil, 30 23-33.
    5. The Incense, 30 34-38.
    6. The Artisans who were to do the work, 31 1-11.
    7. The Sabbath, 32 12-17.
II. The Construction of the Tabernacle in Accordance with the Foregoing Instructions, 34 29–39 43.
  Moses comes down from the mount, face all aglow, and gives the people the commandments he had received (34 29 ff.), beginning with the Sabbath-law (35 1-3), then he calls for offerings and workers (35 4-19), to which call the people liberally respond (35 20-29). Bezalel and others are appointed to superintend the work (35 30–36 7). In the account that follows of the making of the Tabernacle and its furniture (36 8–39 43), the order of the instructions is not followed exactly, and the whole account evidences itself as secondary to the original in chs. 25–29.
III. The Erection of the Tabernacle and the Formal Institution of the Worship, Ex ch. 40 and Lv ch. 8 f.

This account of the making of the Tabernacle and of the organization of the worship about it as a center is followed, in the main thread of P's narrative, by the description of the arrangement of the camp, details of the order of march, and other related matters in Nu chs. 1–4.

The prominence given to the Tabernacle in P is evidenced not only by the elaborate care with which it is described and by the fact that it forms the central point of the whole cultus-organization, but also by the names given to it. In P the Tabernacle, as regards its structure, is viewed simply as a tent ('ōhel, sometimes rendered "tent," but more frequently "tabernacle," in AV). But this tent was the "tent of meeting" ('ōhel mō'ēdh, "tabernacle of the congregation" AV, incorrectly) or the 'dwelling' (mishkān, "tabernacle" in both RV and AV; e.g., Ex 25 1, etc.). The significance of these terms is fully expressed in Ex 29 43 ff. The Tabernacle was to be the 'meeting-place' between God and His people Israel, the place where He 'dwelt' in their midst. It was thus the holiest place on earth, the center of Israel's life as the people of J". Other terms such as miqdāsh, "sanctuary" (Ex 25 8, etc., also qōdhesh, Ex 30 13, etc.), or "tabernacle ['ōhel] of the testimony" (Ex 38 21; Nu 9 15, etc., 'ōhel hā-'ēdhah or 'ōhel hā-'ēdhūth), because here the two tables of the 'testimony' were kept in the Ark (Ex 25 16, 21, etc.), each emphasizes one phase of the same general idea.

2. Place of the Tabernacle in the Camp.

In P Israel is always spoken of as in "camp" or on the march. The legislation is all formulated, as if intended to apply to such conditions, although in reality it was intended to apply to a settled community living in its own land. The "camp" is really a legal fiction. Consequently, the Tabernacle, however elaborate and expensive it may have been, is viewed as a portable sanctuary, something not unknown to Semitic antiquity, a tent rather than a house, and the place assigned it in reference to the camp is not without great significance. In the arrangement of the camp in P the determining principle is that of the varying degrees of holiness possessed by the different elements which, all told, made up the holy nation. The camp is described as a hollow square or rectangle, located true to the points of the compass, each side guarded by three of the twelve tribes. Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun were encamped on the E., viewed as the front and considered, doubtless, as the most honorable position; Reuben, Simeon, and Gad made up the S. side; Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin (i.e., the house of Joseph) formed the W. or rear; and on the N. were Dan, Asher, and Naphtali (Nu 2 1-32).

Within this square was a second one formed by the priests and Levites (Nu 3 21-39). The priests (i.e., "Aaron and his sons"; see Priesthood, § 9) and Moses occupied the place of honor, the E. or front side. The S., W., and N. sides were occupied respectively by the Kohathite, Gershonite, and Merarite divisions of the Levites, to each of which was assigned certain specific parts of the sanctuary and its furniture as their special charge.

Within this second square of Levites was the rectangular court of the Tabernacle, marked off by curtains and pillars, within which were, at last, the altar of burnt offerings and the holy "dwelling" (see § 3, below). Thus the whole arrangement symbolized the idea of holiness. Next to the profane world was the holy nation, with Judah in the place of honor, then the more holy Levites, with the priests in the place of honor, then the still more holy enclosure or court with the altar in the center of its E. half, then finally the "sanctuary," with its Holy Place, and last of all the Most Holy Place, in the center of which was the 'Shekinah,' i.e., the manifestation of God Himself over the golden mercy-seat between the cherubim (cf. the reference to Ezekiel's Temple, § 6, below).

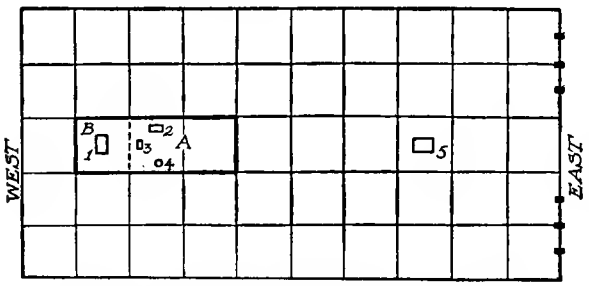
When camp was broken, the division of Judah set forward first, followed by that of Reuben. Then the Levites, with the Tabernacle in their midst, made up the center, followed by the divisions of Ephraim and Dan (Nu 2 1-31). In taking down the Court and the Tabernacle the greatest care was exercised lest any profane eyes should gaze on the holy things (Nu 4 1-34).

3. Details of Structure.

(1) The Court and its Furniture (Ex 27 9-19, 39 9-20). The Court was a double square or a rectangle 50 × 100 cubits in size. Its limits were marked by curtains or hangings hung on sixty acacia pillars set in sockets of brass, 5 cu. apart. Each pillar was 5 cu. high, with a band or fillet of silver at the top, and also provided with silver hooks by which the curtains were secured. The pillars were held firm by cords and brazen tent-pins. The curtains for the N. and S. sides were each 5 cu. high by



Court of the Tabernacle (Scale ¼ in. = 10 Cubits).

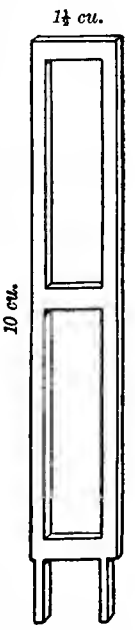
100 cu. long, of fine white linen; that for the W. side was 5 × 50 cu. On the E. side two short curtains, each 5 × 15 cu. and hung on three pillars, extended from the corners toward the center, leaving an opening of 20 cu. wide in the center, which was closed by a screen of fine linen embroidered in colors and suspended from four (really five) pillars.

The furniture of the Court consisted of the portable brazen altar of burnt-offerings with its accessories such as pots, shovels, basins, flesh-hooks, and fire-pans (27 1-8, 38 1-7; on which see ALTAR, § 2) and (according to the secondary strata of the account) the brazen laver, kiyyōr, which was to stand between the altar and the sanctuary (30 17-21; the notice in 38 8 contains a curious anachronism).

(2) The Tabernacle Proper (Ex 26 1-37). Theoretically, this is viewed as a tent, but of very peculiar structure. The "tent" proper consisted of two sets of curtains, one of which was to serve as the covering for the other. The first set of curtains constituted the "dwelling" (Ex 26 1). It consisted of ten curtains of fine twined linen in which figures of cherubim were woven or "embroidered" in "blue and purple and scarlet." Each curtain was 4 × 28 cu. in size. The curtains were sewed together in two sets of five each, and the two sets were coupled to each other by fifty golden clasps (taches AV) linked into fifty loops of blue thread sewed on the edge of each set. These ten curtains when so joined together made a covering 40 × 28 cu. in size, which was to be spread over a framework consisting of upright "boards" so arranged as to make a structure 10 cu. wide by 30 cu. long and 10 cu. high. The covering, when spread upon the framework, hung over each side to the length of 9 cu. (9+10+9 =28) and at the rear to the extent of 10 cu., since the edge of the covering was flush with the front of the framework. Over this was spread the "tent" made of eleven curtains of goat's hair, each 4 × 11 cu., made in two sets of five and six curtains each, fastened together with loops and brazen clasps. The first curtain of the front set was doubled and hung over the front of the structure. Along the N. and S. sides this covering overlapped the under one by a cubit, but at the rear the edges of the two coincided. The point most open to discussion in the description of the Tabernacle is the term qeresh (pl. qᵉrāshīm, rendered "boards"). The usual theory, based on the probably erroneous ideas of the LXX. and Josephus, regards them as pillars, and is advocated, e.g., by Benzinger (in EB, art. Tabernacle). But this makes the whole structure a most unwieldy and impossible affair (each "board" being a huge timber 1 × 1½ cu. square × 10 cu. long and weighing between 1,000 and 2,000 lbs.). There is no evidence that qeresh means any such thing (cf. Nowack, Heb. Archäologie, II, p. 56, note). It is the plausible suggestion of A. R. S. Kennedy (HDB, IV, p. 659 f.) that the "boards" were light, strong frames shaped somewhat like the accompanying figure, sufficiently rigid to sustain the weight of the curtains and give the necessary firmness to the walls and yet so open as to allow the rich embroidery of the inner curtains to be visible from the inside, which would be impossible on the ordinary theory that qeresh means a solid 'board' or pillar. The projecting legs (tenons) of these frames were set in sockets of silver, each socket weighing a talent (38 27), or about 96 lbs. On each of the N. and S. sides of the Tabernacle there were twenty "boards," making up the total length of 30 cu. to a side. The W. end had but six "boards" (=9 cu.), but as the two corner ones were each doubled in some way, the total width of 10 cu. was easily obtained. The "boards" were overlaid with gold plate. The E. end was closed by a screen suspended on five acacia pillars overlaid with gold and with golden hooks, and set in sockets of brass. To add to the rigidity of the structure the "boards" on the N. and S. sides were joined by bars of acacia overlaid with gold, which passed through rings of gold. Five bars were used on a side, the middle one in each case extending the whole length of the side, the upper and lower ones being only half as long.



Over this whole structure, to protect it from the weather, were spread (just how we do not know) two coverings, one of rams' skins dyed red and the other of sealskins (q.v.).

(3) The Holy Place and its Furniture (Ex 25 23-40, 26 31-35). The space enclosed by the "boards," curtains, and the screen at the E. end was divided into two parts, one double the area of the other, by a veil of the same beautiful fabric as the curtains, which was suspended by golden hooks on four acacia pillars overlaid with gold and set in silver sockets. This veil was placed 20 cu. from the E. end of the dwelling, exactly under the place where the curtains of the inner covering and the "tent" above them were joined together by their clasps. The purpose of this veil was to separate the dwelling into two rooms, the larger one (10×20 cu.) being called the "holy place."

According to the older stratum (Ex chs. 25–29) of the account, the furniture of the Holy Place consisted of a table and a lamp-stand with their necessary accessories.

The table (shulḥān, Ex 25 23 ff.; also called shulḥān ha-panīm, 'table of the presence,' Nu 4 7; cf. also Lv 24 6 and II Ch 29 18) was of acacia wood plated heavily with pure gold. It was 1½ cu. high, 2 cu. long, and 1 cu. broad. The top was probably quite thick and heavy and around it ran a golden "crown," zēr, or decorated mounting. To stiffen the legs they were encased near the feet by a "border," misgereth, a handbreadth broad, likewise surmounted by a golden "crown." To this "border" were attached the rings of gold through which the gold-plated staves were passed. On the table was to be placed the showbread (leḥem pānīm, 'bread of faces,' i.e., bread set before the 'face,' or in the presence of God). The table was thus in reality an altar, and it is so called in Ezk 41 22. The service of the table was of pure gold and consisted of dishes (qᵉārōth, probably platters to hold the loaves), spoons (kappōth, cups for the frankincense; cf. Lv 24 7), flagons (qᵉshōth, for the wine), and bowls (mᵉnaqqiyyōth, also for the wine). The ritual of the table is given in part in Lv 24 5-9. The table was to be placed on the S. side of the Holy Place (Ex 26 35).

The lamp-stand or candlestick (mᵉnōrāh) was of "beaten work" of pure gold (cf. Ex 31 8; Lv 24 4). From a main stem or shaft three pairs of branches extended, curved upward so that the ends of the branches and stem were on the same level. At intervals on both branches and stem and also on their ends were almond blossoms (both knop and flower). In the seven blossoms which formed the ends of the stem and branches were to be placed the seven golden lamps. Tongs or snuffers and snuff-dishes of gold were also provided, together with "oil-vessels" (Nu 4 9). The lamps were to be cared for daily, and the oil was to be of the finest variety (Ex 27 20 f.; Lv 24 1-4).

In the secondary strata of the account mention is made of an altar of incense (Ex 30 1-10; cf. ALTAR, § 2, at the end). This was a chest-like structure 2 cu. high, 1 cu. long, and 1 cu. wide, of acacia wood overlaid with gold. It had "horns" at the corners and was provided with a "crown," rings, and staves like the table of showbread. It was to be placed "before" (i.e., east of) the veil. The ritual of this altar is given minutely in Ex 30 7-10, but over against these directions must be placed the fact of a strange silence regarding this altar in other passages where it would naturally be referred to. Nothing is said of it in Lv ch. 16 in the ritual for the Day of Atonement (in spite of Ex 30 10), and in other passages the incense is brought before the Lord on censers (Lv 10 1; Nu 16 17). Furthermore, neither in Solomon's Temple (in the old account in I K) nor in that of Ezekiel is anything said of an altar of incense. It is probable, therefore, that the description in Ex 30 1-10 belongs to a stratum of P originating between the date of Lv ch. 16 and the Chronicler (cf. I Ch 28 18; II Ch 4 19), and that it was due to the introduction, during the Persian period, of an altar of incense into the Second Temple.

(4) The Most Holy Place (qōdhesh ha-qōdhāshīm, holy of holies AV) was, in size, a perfect cube of 10 cu. in each dimension. It was this that was viewed as the real 'dwelling' of J", for it was here, in a mysterious manifestation of Himself above the mercy-seat of the Ark, the one article of furniture in this room, and not at the door of the Tent, as in Ex 33 9 (E), that J" promised to "meet with" and "commune with" His people (Ex 25 22). See also ARK.

II. The Historical Value of the Account in P.

4. General Considerations.

Was the elaborate structure described by P ever actually used by the Israelites? This question can not be satisfactorily answered in the negative by the merely general objection that at the time of the Exodus the Israelites were too simple, rude, and poor to have been able to make such an expensive sanctuary. The true answer must be gained from the internal character of the account itself and its agreement or disagreement with other statements in the O T record. On the traditional assumption that Moses wrote the whole account, as well as the rest of the Pentateuch, we have a right to demand that there shall be no inconsistencies or contradictions either in the account itself or between it and the rest of the Pentateuch. If such are found, it is evident that more than one hand has had a share in the composition, and it then becomes our duty to analyze the account as minutely as possible, in order to get possession of all the facts involved and discover, if possible, a solution of the problem. Furthermore, if Moses wrote the account of the Tabernacle in Ex, the presence of such a sanctuary with its elaborate cultus must have left some trace of its existence in the early history as we have it recorded in Jos to II K. A brief consideration of the evidence bearing on this question will now be attempted.

5. Tent and Altar in JE and D.

In the account of the reconciliation between J" and the Israelites after the making of the golden calf (Ex 33 5 ff.), we are told that "Moses used to take the tent and to pitch it without the camp . . and he called it, The tent of meeting" (ver. 7). On this Tent J" descended in a cloud, when Moses entered it, and there He spoke with him at the door of the Tent (ver. 9). Moses' "minister Joshua departed not out of the Tent" (ver. 11). That this passage is but a fragment of an originally longer account is evident; but what else that account contained is unknown. Brief, however, as this fragment is, it seems to have a very different idea of the place of the Tent in reference to the camp (outside, instead of in the very center, as in P), of the part of the Tent where J″ manifested Himself (at the door, instead of in the Most Holy Place) and of the persons in charge (Joshua, instead of Aaron, his sons, and Levites).

The altar of burnt offering is a most essential element in P's account of the Tabernacle and also of the cultus. It is the one only altar of sacrifice known to the priestly law. But in Ex 20 24-26 (JE) we find something quite different. Not a brazen, artificial altar, but altars of earth, or at best of unhewn stone, are prescribed, to be erected at the different places where J″ may record His name.

In the order of march prescribed in P (Nu chs. 2–4 and 10 1-28) the Ark is to be carried by the Kohathite Levites in the center of the line (six tribes in front of it and six in the rear). But in Nu 10 33 f. (JE) the Ark leads the march, apparently at some distance from the main body.

These differences seem to forbid absolutely the ascription of all the passages containing them to one and the same author or date. Their importance is enhanced only when we discover that in the entire Code of Dt there is not the slightest reference to the Tabernacle, which seems to prove beyond all doubt that this code could not have proceeded from the same hand (or hands) that wrote P. For in P the entire system of worship centers about the Tabernacle and the Aaronic priesthood (q.v.). The same general subject of worship is covered in D in the form of a general national code. How could D have omitted the Tabernacle and its services if he assigned them the importance given to them in P?

Another feature of the early literature is that while a Tent made by Moses is referred to (as in Ex 33 7 ff.) and also an Ark (Nu 10 33 f.; cf. Dt 10 1 ff., based on JE), there seems to be no close connection between the two. They are not spoken of together, and while the Levites have charge of the Ark, nothing is said of their care of the Tent (cf. Dt 10 8).

The truth seems to be that the early historical tradition lost sight of the Tent Moses made, probably because, in the shifting and uncertain fortunes of the Conquest and "judges" periods, it was lost or destroyed, and no one knew its fate. In none of the early notices of the Ark, at Shiloh (I S chs. 1–6), or at Kiriath-jearim (I S 7 1 f.), or of its removal to Jerusalem (II S 6 1-19; cf. especially ver. 17) is anything said about the Mosaic Tent. Only in late editorial additions or glosses is there any reference to the "tent of meeting" (i.e., P's Tabernacle) in the earlier historical books (Jos–II K; as, e.g., I S 2 22, or I K 8 4). Even the Deuteronomic editor of I K must have been ignorant of its existence, or he could not have written what we find in I K 3 2. The same silence regarding the Tabernacle is found in the pre-exilic Prophets.

If, then, the description of the Tabernacle in P is at variance with the older references to the Mosaic Tent, Ark, and altar, and if the Mosaic Tent disappeared altogether at a comparatively early date, what is to be said of P's Tabernacle? Is it to be considered altogether a fiction? The answer to such questions is to be determined by considering what sources the authors of P may have had at their disposal and under what influences they made use of such sources.

6. The Sources of P's Description of the Tabernacle.

Among the sources must be set down:

(1) The tradition of the Mosaic Tent. That there was such a tradition is certain from the traces of it in JE, and that the only form of it was that found in Ex 33 5-11 is not certain or even probable. It is not at all unlikely that there was an old tradition in priestly circles of a somewhat elaborate tent made by Moses to serve the purpose of at least a temporary sanctuary in the wilderness.

(2) A second source drawn on by P must have been the several Temples (of Solomon, of Ezekiel's vision, and the Second Temple) with which the authors of P were acquainted. Solomon's Temple was 20 cu. wide by 60 cu. long, and the Tabernacle of P is just one-half of these dimensions. Solomon's Temple had a "holy place" (20×40 cu.), in which there was a table of showbread and ten golden "candlesticks," and also in the rear of this a most holy enclosure, containing the Ark only (20 cu. square), separated from the former by a wall with olive-wood doors. In Solomon's Temple the walls of both rooms were profusely decorated, especially with figures of cherubim, and nearly all the woodwork was plated with pure gold. This Temple also had a court in which there were a brazen altar and an immense brazen laver (the molten "sea"). All these things with slight modifications the Tabernacle also had, though on a smaller scale.

(3) A third source from which the authors of P drew must have been the ideas concerning the centralization of the cultus (one and one only sanctuary and sacrificial altar allowed), as set forth in the Code of Dt (q.v.), and the new emphasis on holiness and the distinctions to be made between the holy and the profane set forth and urged upon the exiles by Ezekiel, especially in his ideal sketch of the restored community (Ezk chs. 40–48). After reading this sketch, it is not difficult to see where P got his idea of the camp as a series of concentric enclosures of varying degrees of holiness, the innermost and holiest of all being the Tabernacle; for Ezekiel sets forth almost exactly the same idea. According to him, the holy land is to be divided into a number of parallel strips running from E. to W A first series, the domain of seven tribes, lies N. of the central portion, and a second series, for five tribes, lies S. of the central strip.

The central portion of the center strip was a square (25,000 cu. each way) divided into three parts: one for the Levites (10,000×25,000 cu.) on the N., one for the "city" and its land (5,000×25,000 cu.) on the S., and the center one for the priests (10,000×25,000 cu.), in the exact center of which lay the sanctuary where J″ had His throne, where He dwelt (Ezk 43 7), and its court (500 cu. sq.); see TEMPLE, §§ 19 ff. It requires but little modification of this general plan to give us P's arrangement of the camp with the Tabernacle (the "dwelling") at the center.

(4) Finally, the authors of P, or at least those who supplemented the earlier form of P, were acquainted with the Second Temple and its more formal cultus-arrangements. Little is directly known of this Temple before its rebuilding by Herod. But we do know that it contained an altar of incense, a golden candlestick, and a table of showbread (I Mac 1 22, Ezekiel's Ideal of the Holy Land and People.

4 49) and before it was an altar of burnt-offerings made of stone (I Mac 4 45 f.). Whether the altar of incense was placed in it at the first is uncertain; more probably it was a later addition to the furniture of the Holy Place. No attempt was ever made to make another Ark of the Covenant after the loss of the original one when Jerusalem fell in 586 B.C.

The description of the Tabernacle is an essential part of the P document. In fact, in this description the ideal teaching of this great document reaches its climax. Starting with the creation of the universe (Gn 1 1), the writer draws ever nearer to his main theme—how the infinite, holy God has His abode among men in the midst of His holy people Israel. When he wrote, it had probably long been the custom to assign a Mosaic origin to all the important legitimate religious customs then current (as Dt had already done). That there could be but one altar, one sanctuary, one priestly family; that the line between the holy and the profane must be drawn most strictly; that the sanctuary and its services must be as expensive and beautiful and elaborate as possible—all such ideas as these had long been current and accepted, and, of course—so he must have reasoned—they were entertained and taught by Moses. Making use of the tradition of the Mosaic Tent as he understood it, the author of P (in its original form) built his description mainly on the data of Solomon's Temple and on Ezekiel's idealistic picture (this is what we find now embedded in Ex chs. 25–29, Nu chs. 2–4, etc.). Later additions in the same spirit extended this by transferring to it elements from the subsequent developments of the cultus (as the Altar of Incense, Ex ch. 30, etc.), or from the more fully developed theories of later times. The Tabernacle of P is not, therefore, a bald fiction, but an honest, sincere attempt to set forth a great ideal on the basis of ancient tradition and established usage.

TABITHA, tab'i-tha. See DORCAS.

TABLE: This word is the rendering of: (1) lūaḥ, 'tablet.' See TABLE, TABLET. (2) mēṣabh, 'that which surrounds,' 'is round.' The meaning is doubtful (Song 1 12), perhaps 'table' or 'cushion,' 'divan.' (3) shulḥān, properly a 'skin' or 'round leather mat' spread on the ground. It often had a string run around the edge so that it could be drawn up and used as a bag for carrying food. The name was also applied to the wooden or metal tray set on a stand. Those who ate from the table gathered about it, sitting on the ground, chairs, or couches, according to its height above the ground (I K 10 5, 13 20); later, it became the custom to recline at table (Jn 12 2 RVmg.). The king ate at a "table" (Jg 1 7; I S 20 29, etc.); private individuals had them (I K 13 20; Job 36 16, etc.); and it was one of the pieces of furniture in a bedroom (II K 4 10). It is used figuratively of wisdom (Pr 9 21). In the following passages tables for sacred uses are mentioned: That for the showbread in the Tabernacle was made of wood overlaid with gold (Ex 25 23 and seventeen times in chs. 25–40; Nu 3 31, 4 7; Lv 24 6); in Solomon's Temple it was a table of gold (I K 7 48; II Ch 29 18 [ten in number]; II Ch 4 8, 19, 13 11; cf. I Ch 28 16); in Ezekiel's Temple there were tables on which the offerings were to be slain (Ezk 40 39, etc.; Ezk 40 40 [eight in number]; of stone, 40 42; an altar of wood, called a "table," 41 22; cf. 44 16); Mal speaks of the altar as a table (Mal 1 7, 12). In Is 65 11 "table" means an idolatrous meal; and in Ezk 39 20 it is a figure of J"s sacrificial feast. (4) κλίνη, 'reclining-couch' or 'bed' (Mt 7 4), correctly RVmg. "couches." (5) πλάξ, 'slab,' 'tablet' (II Co 3 3; He 9 4); see above under (1). (6) τράπεζα, a 'table with four feet,' LXX. for shulḥān; used in the N T in various senses, as a 'dining-table' (Mt 15 27; Mk 7 28; Lk 16 21, 22 21, 30; cf. Ac 16 34, "food" RV, "table" mg.); 'a feast' (Ro 11 9; I Co 10 21); the stand of a money-changer (Mt 21 12; Mk 11 15; Jn 2 15; Lk 19 23, "bank" EV; Ac 6 2, where moneys or goods placed on a table for distribution are perhaps meant); the table for showbread (He 9 2).

TABLE, TABLET: (1) The word "table" is the rendering of lūaḥ, in Ex 24 12, etc. (of the "tables" of stone). The same Heb. word is rendered "boards" or "planks" (Ex 27 8; Ezk 27 5, etc.) and metal "plates" (I K 7 36). It is also used of the heart (Pr 3 3, 7 3; Jer 17 1) and in Is 30 8 of a writing-"tablet" of some sort. The root meaning of the term is unknown. On Is 8 1, 30 8 and on the N T passages (Lk 1 63; II Co 3 3; He 9 4), see BOOKS AND WRITING, § 1. (2) In Is 3 20, RV substitutes "perfume-boxes" for the AV "tablets." The Heb. means literally 'houses of the soul.' (3) On Ex 35 22 and Nu 31 50, cf. the RV; see also DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II, § 2. E. E. N.

TABOR, tê'bọr or -bōr (תָּבוֹר, tābhōr): 1. A village in Zebulun given to the Merarite Levites (I Ch 6 77), probably the same as the Tabor on the border of Issachar (Jos 19 22), and that at which Zebah and Zalmunna slew Gideon's brothers (Jg 8 18); not impossibly also the same as Chisloth-tabor of Jos 19 12, a town on the border of Zebulun. Its exact location is uncertain, but it was probably not far from Mount Tabor. 2. Mount Tabor, called by the Arabs Jebel eṭ-Tûr (like Sinai, Gerizim, and Olivet). A mountain on the boundaries of Issachar, Zebulun, and Naphtali (Jos 19 22, 12), 5 m. E. of Nazareth and about 12 m. W. of the S. end of the Sea of Galilee. Map IV, D 7. Its altitude is 1,843 ft. above sea-level. Olive-, fig-, carob-, but especially oak- and terebinth-trees grow upon its slopes. The view obtained from its summit looking SW. toward Mt. Carmel across the fertile Plain of Esdraelon ("the great battle-field of history") is one long to be remembered. From Dt 33 19 it seems probable that it was the seat of an ancient sanctuary. Here Barak assembled the forces of Issachar and Zebulun to fight against Sisera and the Canaanites (Jg 4 6, 12, 14). Jeremiah uses it as a figure of the supreme power of the king of Babylon (46 18). Both Antiochus the Great (218 B.C.) and Josephus (66 A.D.) fortified it (Polybius, V, 70, 6; Jos. BJ, IV, 1 8). Saladin captured it in 1187, but the crusaders failed in the attempt to do so in 1217. An ancient tradition, traceable back as far as Jerome and Origen, associates T. with the scene of the Transfiguration, but in Christ's time the top of the mountain was probably covered with houses, ruins of which and of an old fortress, as well as of churches and monasteries with pools and cisterns, are still to be found on it. Two monasteries, one Greek, the other Latin, now crown its flat, oblong (3,000 × 1,300 ft.) summit. 3. The oak ("plain" AV) of Tabor, which Saul passed on his way home after having been anointed by Samuel (I S 10 3). The context of this passage locates it between "Rachel's sepulcher in the border of Benjamin at Zelzah" (ver. 2) and "the hill of God," perhaps Gibeah (ver. 5), but its exact site is unknown. Ewald (History, III, 21) identified it with "the palm-tree of Deborah between Ramah and Bethel in the hill-country of Ephraim" (Jg 4 5; cf. Gn 35 8). G. L. R.

TABRIMMON, tab-rim'en or tab'ri-mon (טַבְרִמּוֹן, ṭabhrimmōn), 'Rimmon is good': King of Damascus, father of Ben-hadad I (I K 15 18), and one of the earliest kings of the dynasty. E. E. N.

TADMOR, tad'mōr (תַּדְמֹר, tadhmōr), derived from tāmār, 'palm': A city "in the wilderness," whose building is ascribed to Solomon (II Ch 8 4; also I K 9 18, AV, ARVmg., Heb. mg.); known to later history as the famous Palmyra, but since the Arabian period called again by its ancient name of Tadmor. The Tamar of I K 9 18, however, was probably not Tadmor. Palmyra was situated in a fertile oasis of the Syrian Desert, 120 m. NE. of Damascus, and thus was a natural halting-place for caravans passing between the Euphrates Valley and the Mediterranean. At the same time, its desert barriers enabled the city to enjoy practical freedom from imperial control. Palmyra reached the height of its wealth, culture, and influence during the reigns of Odenatus (255–267 A.D.) and his widow, the great Zenobia, when the city was the capital of an independent kingdom whose power was felt from Armenia to Egypt. In 273, however, a Roman army, led by the Emperor Aurelian in person, defeated the Palmyrene troops and destroyed the splendid capital. Modern Tadmor is a squalid Arab village surrounded by magnificent ruins, among the more important of which are an ancient aqueduct, Roman walls built by Justinian, the great Temple of the Sun, peculiar sepulchral towers, and superb colonnaded avenues. L. G. L.

TAHAN, tê'han (תַּחַן, taḥan): 1. The ancestral head of the Tahanites, a clan of Ephraim (Nu 26 35), called Tahath in I Ch 7 20. 2. A descendant of 1 in the fourth generation (I Ch 7 25). E. E. N.

TAHAPANES, ta-hap'a-nîz. See TAHPANHES.

TAHASH, tê'hash (תַּחַשׁ, taḥash, Thahash AV): The ancestral head of an Aramæan clan supposed to be descended from Nahor (Gn 22 24). On the name see SEAL. E. E. N.

TAHATH, tê'hath (תַּחַת, taḥath): I. 1. The ancestral head of a clan of Ephraim (I Ch 7 20, called Tahan, Nu 26 35). 2. Another name in the same genealogy (I Ch 7 20). 3. A Korahite Levite (I Ch 6 24, 37). II. A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 33 26 f.). Site unknown. E. E. N.

TAHCHEMONITE, tā'kẹ-mọn-ait (תַּחְכְּמֹנִי, taḥkemōnī, Tachmonite AV): A patronymic of Josheb-basshebeth (= Adino, q.v.), the chief of David's three mighty men (II S 23 8). The form חַכְמֹנִי, ḥakhmōnī, in the parallel passage (I Ch 11 11) is probably correct; the ת of the longer form being a mistake for the article ה. C. S. T.

TAHPANHES, tā'pan-hîz (תַּחְפַּנְחֵס, taḥpanḥēṣ, also Tahapanhes, Jer 2 16 AV, and Tehaphnehes, תְּחַפְנְחֵס, tᵉḥaphnᵉḥēṣ, Ezk 30 18): A city in Egypt where Jeremiah and the Jews with him fled after the murder of Gedaliah (Jer 43 7 ff.). It was situated on the Pelusiac branch of the Nile (the E. frontier of Egypt), 5 m. SE. of Tanis (Zoan). The classical writers called it Daphnæ, and its modern name is Tell Defneh. As a frontier town it was garrisoned (Herod. II, 30), a fact which no doubt contributed to its selection as a refuge for the fugitive Jews. Much of its history has been verified through excavations conducted by Flinders Petrie. Ezekiel (30 18) prophesied its destruction. Mention of the place is also made in the Book of Judith (1 9).

A. C. Z.

TAHPENES, tā'pę-nîz (תַּחְפְּנֵיס, taḥpᵉnēṣ): The name of the wife of an unnamed Pharaoh, a contemporary of Solomon, who gave the queen's sister in marriage to Hadad the Edomite (I K 11 19 f.). The name is not mentioned elsewhere, nor is it found in the Egyptian inscriptions, but the fact that Hadad returned and, according to the LXX. of I K 11 22, became a formidable opponent of Solomon bears out the historicity of his marriage with the king's sister-in-law. A. C. Z.

TAHREA, tā-rî'a or tā'rę-a (תַּחְרֵע, taḥrēa'): A descendant of Saul (I Ch 9 41, called Tarea in 8 35).

E. E. N.

TAHTIM-HODSHI, tā''tim-hŏd'shai (תַּחְתִּים חָדְשִׁי, taḥtīm ḥodhshī): A "land of Tahtim-hodshi" is referred to in II S 24 6. This puzzling name has given rise to many conjectures, of which the most plausible is that it is a textual error for 'the land of the Hittites to Kadesh' (so LXX. [L]). If so, the northern limit of David's rule is represented as Kadesh on the Orontes. E. E. N.

TALENT. See MONEY, § 9, and WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 9.

TALITHA CUMI, ta-lî'tha: An Aramaic expression translated in the context (Mk 5 41) "Maiden [I say unto thee], arise." The citation of the original Aramaic words used by Jesus is characteristic of Mk (cf. 7 11, 24, 14 36, 15 24). A. C. Z.

TALMAI, tal'mai or -mê (תַּלְמַי, talmay): 1. One of the "children of Anak" at Hebron (Nu 13 22; Jos 15 14; Jg 1 10). See ANAK. 2. King of Geshur (q.v.) and father of David's wife Maacah, the mother of Absalom (II S 3 3, 13 37; I Ch 3 2). E. E. N.

TALMON, tal'mŏn (טַלְמוֹן, ṭalmōn): An ancestor of a Levitical family of gatekeepers (I Ch 9 17; Ezr 2 42; Neh 7 45, 11 19, 12 25). E. E. N.

TAMAH, tê'mā. See TEMA, II.

TAMAR, tê'mar (תָּמָר, tāmār), 'date-palm': I. An unidentified town at the S. end of the Dead Sea. According to Ezk 47 19, 48 28, it formed the SE. corner of the Holy Land (cf. Nu 34 4; Jos 15 2-4). The same place is probably meant in I K 9 18 (where the Kᵉthibh is more correct than "Tadmor" of the Qᵉre and II Ch 8 4). Winckler (Gesch. Isr. ii, 98) reads in this passage, instead of "Ba'alath and Tamar," "Ba'alath-tamar," which he identifies with Ba'al-tamar in Benjamin.

II. 1. The daughter-in-law of Judah, through whom he lost his two older sons, and by whom he became the father of Perez and Zerah (Gn 38 6, 11, 13, 24; Ru 4 12; I Ch 2 4). Under these personal names we have probably the story of two unsuccessful attempts of clans of the tribe of Judah to occupy the Canaanite town of Tamar and the subsequent peaceful mingling of Judah with its inhabitants, out of which arose the new clans of Perez and Zerah. 2. A daughter of David who was violated by her half-brother Amnon and was avenged by her own brother Absalom (II S ch. 13; I Ch 3 9). 3. A daughter of Absalom (II S 14 27). The LXX. adds "and she became the wife of Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, and bare him Abiathar." In this case she was identical with Maacah (I K 15 2; II Ch 11 20 ff.). The Lucianic text of II S 14 27 reads "Maacah" instead of "Tamar." L. B. P.

TANNER. See ARTISAN LIFE, § 16.

TAPESTRY: This word occurs in the Bible only in Pr 7 16, 31 32 ("coverings of tapestry" AV, "carpets of tapestry" RV, "cushions" RVmg.). It renders the Heb. marbhādhīm, literally 'things that are spread.' A. C. Z.

TAPHATH, tê'fath (טָפַת, ṭāphath): A daughter of Solomon and wife of Ben-abinadab, one of Solomon's prefects (I K 4 11). E. E. N.

TAPPUAH, tap-piū'ā or tap'yu-ā (תַּפּוּחַ, tappūaḥ), 'apple [tree]': 1. An old Canaanitic royal city in the Judæan lowlands (Jos 12 17, 15 34), connected genealogically with the Calebites of Hebron (I Ch 2 43). 2. The name, both of a district (Jos 17 8) which belonged to Manasseh, and of its city, also called En-Tappuah, on the border between Ephraim and Manasseh, but counted as Ephraim's (Jos 16 8, 17 7 f.). TARGUM: The name given to the Aramaic versions of the O T. The language spoken by the Jews after the Exile was not Hebrew, but Aramaic (q.v.). During the whole period in which the synagogue (q.v.) developed as an institution, the original language of the O T was unknown to the mass of the people Hebrew was understood only by those who made it a special study. As the Scriptures were read in the original in the synagogues of Palestine, it was necessary to translate them for the understanding of the listeners. In this way arose the targums of the O T books. The word targum means 'translation,' or 'interpretation.' The targums, therefore, are translations, or paraphrases of the Hebrew Scriptures. It was the custom in the synagogue, in reading the Law, to read one verse, and then wait until that had been translated or paraphrased before proceeding to the next. In the same way the reading from the Prophets was rendered into the vernacular, except that three verses were taken at a time. In earliest times it was forbidden to the interpreter to read his translation. It was feared lest the written targum might be placed upon the same level of authority as that held by the original. But the use of written targums was permitted for private instruction. Three stages may be marked in the growth of the targums: (1) the purely oral stage; (2) the stage in which they were partially written; (3) the stage in which they were written fully and with authoritative sanction. Our knowledge of the first and second stages is derived largely from later statements made regarding the customs in reference to the synagogues. The story of the confiscation of a Targum on Job in the 1st cent. A.D. (Bab. Shab. 115 1) shows the existence of written targums before the time when they received official sanction. All the targums extant are of a late date. They may be classified as follows:

I. Of the Pentateuch. (1) The Targum of Onkelos, also called the Babylonian Targum. (2) The Targum of Jonathan (pseudo-Jonathan), also called the Jerusalem Targum. Both of these targums cover the entire Pentateuch. (3) A third, containing only parts of the Pentateuch, is known by the name of the Fragmentary Targum, or the Jerusalem Targum II.

II. Of the Prophets. The Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel, also called the Babylonian Targum on the Prophets.

III. Of the Hagiographa: (1) The Targum of the Psalms, Proverbs, and Job. (2) The Targum of the Megilloth (Cant., Ru, La, Ec, Est). (3) The Targum of Chronicles.

Of most importance are the targums on the Law and the Prophets. Only a brief description of the different targums can be given here. 1. The Targum of Onkelos: The author of this targum is really unknown, for its ascription to Onkelos is due to a mistaken application of the tradition regarding the Greek version of the O T by Aquila to the Aramaic translation of the Pentateuch. The confusion of the names Onkelos and Akylas (Aquila) accounts for this mistake. The better name for this targum is the 'Babylonian,' because of its general acceptance in the Babylonian schools. It was received from Palestine, where it may have been compiled, in whole or in part, in the 2d or 3d cent. A.D., but it received its final redaction in Babylonia, in the 4th or 5th cent. This latter fact accounts for the traces of Babylonian influence upon its vocabulary. The translation contained in this targum is faithful. "Wherever it deviates from the literalness of the text, such a course in its case is fully justified either by the obscurity of the passage or the wrong construction that naturally would be put upon its wording by the multitude." Noticeable are its departures from the text when it wishes to avoid anthropomorphisms and any expressions reflecting on the worthiness of God. 2. The Jerusalem Targum (of pseudo-Jonathan): Until the 14th cent. this targum was known under no other name than the Jerusalem Targum. It is due to the carelessness of some scribe that an abbreviation ת"י was interpreted 'Targum Jonathan,' rather than 'T. Jerusalem.' Certainly Jonathan ben Uzziel, the reputed author of the Targum on the Prophets, can not have been its author. He is said to have lived near the time of Christ, and this targum introduces in its interpretations facts and references, e.g., the breaking up of the West Roman empire and the names of Mohammed's wives, which bring its date down to the 7th or 8th cent. A.D. It had its origin in Palestine, and differs essentially in its general character from the Targum of Onkelos. Instead of giving merely a faithful translation or paraphrastic understanding of the original, it seeks by allegory, parable, or story to illustrate and illumine the meaning. It is virtually a haggadic treatment of the Pentateuch. Like the Targum of Onkelos, it avoids anthropomorphisms and anthropopathisms. It is "a mine of information on most of the religious and dogmatic conceptions of the Judaism of the Talmudic age." Much discussion has been given to the relation of the pseudo-Jonathan Targum to the Fragmentary Targum. This latter contains only about 850 verses, and these belong mainly to the historical sections of the Pentateuch. It is not necessary here to go into the various theories which have been offered in order to set forth the inner relation of the Palestinian targums. It is sufficient to say that they are closely related. 3. The Targum of Jonathan (ben Uzziel) on the Prophets: The reputed author of this targum is said to have been a pupil of Hillel. The sole authority for his authorship is a statement of the Talmud (Meg. 3a), but by that same Talmud another name is given, R. Joseph bar Chija of Babylon (270–333 A.D.). Whether we can discover his name or not, there is evidence in this work of the hand of one man who has given to the whole of it the stamp of his redaction. The targum originated in Palestine, and, like that of Onkelos, received its final form in Babylonia. In its treatment of the historical books it is much more literal than in its rendering of the Prophets. In this latter part it follows the haggadic method of added allegory, parable, and story, in order to illumine the passage. The traits common to other targums, such as the avoidance of anthropomorphisms, the interpretation of figurative language, and the emphasis upon that which is to the glory of any Israelite, are all here. 4. The targums of the Hagiographa are all late in origin. As they are mostly private literary works, their value is varied. They show in general the characteristics of their models—the older targums—and are for the most part of Palestinian origin. The most noteworthy feature regarding them must be given in a single word. The Targum on the Psalms and Job is a faithful translation, with haggadic additions; that on Proverbs is marked by Syriac features arguing the use of the Peshiṭta version. The targums on the Megilloth are notably paraphrastic; Esther is extant in two forms, one of which is quite literal, the other quite paraphrastic. The Targum on Chronicles, which was not known to exist until very late, combines literal translation with haggadic paraphrase.

LITERATURE: An extensive literature on the targums, mostly from the pens of German scholars, is in existence. (See lists in HDB and in JE, vol. xii.) J. W. Etheridge (1862, 1865) has translated into English the targums on the Pentateuch. See also Schürer, HJP (3d ed.), vol. i, pp. 147–152, and the literature there indicated.

TARPELITE, tär'pel-ait (טַרְפְּלָיֵא, ṭarpᵉlāyē'): Apparently a class of officials, 'tablet-writers' (Ezr 4 9). E. E. N.

TARSHISH, tär'shish (תַּרְשִׁישׁ, tarshīsh): I. 1. A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 7 10). 2. One of the seven princes of Persia (Est 1 14). See PRINCES, THE SEVEN. II. A geographical and ethnological term. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

TARSHISH, SHIPS OF. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

TARSUS, tär'sus (Ταρσός, now Tersûs): The chief city of Cilicia, whose situation at the junction of the natural trade-routes between western Asia Minor, Syria, and the Far East early made it an emporium for commerce and important for strategy. It lay on the river Cydnus, which ran through the ancient city, whereas the modern town is wholly on the western bank. Assyrian influences were felt at T. even in the 9th cent. B.C., for the name Tarzi (the capital of Qaua, earlier form of Que) occurs in an inscription of Shalmaneser II (860–824 B.C.), who conquered Cilicia (834). Some ancient writers claimed that T. was founded or fortified by Sennacherib (705–681) after the plan of Babylon; others said that Asshurbanipal (668–626), the Greek Sardanapalus, was its founder. After Cilicia had become Hellenized, it was claimed that T. was founded by the Argives who had gone with Triptolemus in pursuit of Io; others said that its founder was Perseus, who, besides his Greek rôle, was the original Assyrian, and gave his name to Persia. Shortly after the death of Asshurbanipal, T. became the capital of an independent kingdom (about 607) under princes who bore the title of 'Syennesis,' and who later accepted the Persian suzerainty. This was true of the time of Xenophon, when T. was populous and wealthy. T. retained its Oriental cast until the time of the Seleucids, when many Greeks settled there, enriched themselves, established a school of philosophy (university), which became famous, especially under the first Roman emperors, who patronized it. To T. belonged Athenodorus the Stoic, the teacher of Augustus, and Nestor the Platonist, the teacher of Marcellus, the nephew of Augustus. T. was the birthplace of St. Paul, and of Boëthius, of the tragedian Dionysius, of the Stoics Antipater and Archedemus. In the civil wars T. favored Cæsar and actually changed its name to Juliopolis when Cæsar visited the city. Antonius made it a free city. He summoned Cleopatra to appear before his court at T. Cleopatra, impersonating Aphrodite, sailed up the Cydnus (38 B.C.) in a gilded galley with silver-plated oars and vanquished her judge, so that scoffers told how Venus had enmeshed Bacchus. In 22 B.C. T. was made the capital of the imperial province of Cilicia, when Augustus confirmed the rights and privileges bestowed by Antonius, and also raised T. to the dignity of a metropolis. It was an important city during the Parthian and Persian wars. As the metropolis of Cilicia, T. represented the religious interests of the Isaurians, Cappadocians, and Syrians.

The ruins of ancient Tarsus are now 15–20 ft. below the surface of the modern town, which, built of mud and stone, nestles amid magnificent gardens of semitropical trees, as the myrtle, oleander, pomegranate, fig, orange, lemon, and citron. The soil is intensely fertile, and the exports of T. comprise wheat, barley, cotton, madder, yellow berries, valonia, wax, linseed, sesame seed, colored leather, hides, and wool. The finest apples, apricots, cherries, and grapes come from the foothills of the Taurus Mountains. On the outskirts of the city is a tomb venerated by Christians as the tomb of Paul, by Moslems (perhaps correctly) as the tomb of el-Mamûn. J. R. S. S.

TARTAK, tär'tak. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 36.

TARTAN, tär'tan (תַּרְתָּן, tartān, Assyr. turtanu, tartanu): The official name of the commander-in-chief of the Assyrian army. An officer of this rank was in command of Sargon's campaign against Ashdod in 720 B.C. (Is 20 1); and with the Rabsaris and Rabshakeh, other similar officials, demanded of Hezekiah the surrender of Jerusalem in 701 B.C. (II K 18 17). In authority and dignity the tartan stood next to the king himself. Several names of generals who held this rank appear in the lists of the eponyms of the empire. I. M. P.

TASKMASTER: This term is the translation of sar-maṣ, 'officer of the labor-gang' (Ex 1 11), i.e., a superintendent of one of the companies of men who rendered forced labor in the Egyptian corvée or levy. Such officials were set over the Israelites when they were compelled to build store-cities for the Pharaoh. They are often depicted on the Egyptian monuments armed with long rods with which they chastised those who failed to accomplish the task assigned for the day (cf. Ex 5 14). In Ex 3 7, 5 6, 10, 13, 14; Job 3 18, "taskmaster" represents the Heb. word nōgēṣ, 'driver,' which is simply another name for the same class of officials. David and Solomon had similar officers who coerced the Canaanites assigned to labor upon their public works (II S 20 24; I K 4 6, 5 16 [30], 12 18 = II Ch 10 18). The Prophets use the word as a figure for a tyrannical native ruler (Is 3 7), or for a foreign oppressor (Is 9 3, 14 2, 4; Zec 9 8). L. B. P.

TATTENAI, tat'ᵉ-nai (תַּתְּנַי, tattᵉnay, Tatnai AV): The Persian governor of the satrapy W of the Euphrates, circa 520 B.C., who sent to Darius I asking that the records be searched to see whether Cyrus had given permission to the Jews to rebuild their Temple (Ezr 5 3 ff.). The name is undoubtedly Persian, and is believed to have been recovered in texts on contract tablets belonging to Darius' reign.

TAUNT, TAUNTING PROVERB. See TERMS OF BLESSING AND REPROACH.

TAVERNS (THE THREE), Τρεῖς ταβέρναι: A collection of roadside drinking places, 30 m. S. of Rome (Ac 28 15). The site remains unidentified. The term tabernæ rarely meant inns for shelter and entertainment of travelers, and keepers of such places were disreputable persons. It was bad form both in Greece and Rome to enter them. J. R. S. S.

TAX, TAXATION, TRIBUTE: In the nomadic period taxes were unknown to the Hebrews. The chieftains received voluntary presents from those who sought their protection (Gn 32 13-21, 33 10, 43 11), but they exacted no regular dues of their kinsmen. Only from aliens could tribute be taken. After the conquest of Canaan, this custom remained unchanged. The so-called "Judges" never collected taxes, but received only a special portion of the spoil of war (Jg 8 24; I S 30 26). When the Canaanites were subdued, they were compelled to render forced labor (maṣ), translated in AV and RV "tribute" (Jos 16 10, 17 13; Jg 1 28-35). When Israel was worsted, it had to submit to forced labor or to pay tribute (euphemistically called "a present" AV) to the victor (Gn 49 15-20; Jg 3 15-18).

In the city communities of Canaan very different conditions prevailed. Here there had long been kings who collected regular taxes (cf. the Tell-el-Amarna letters and the letters discovered by Sellin at Ta'anach). With the adoption of Canaanite civilization and the establishment of the monarchy, taxation became a necessary part of the Israelitic system of government. I S 10 27 shows that Saul received regular dues called "presents" (cf. II Ch 17 5), and in I S 17 25 he promises the man who will kill Goliath that his family shall be "free," i.e., exempt from taxes. The "covenant" that David made with the elders of Israel (II S 5 3) doubtless included provision for his support, and the census (II S ch. 24) may have been for purposes of taxation. According to I S 8 15-17, the taxes consisted of a tenth of the crops and of the increase of the herds. Under Solomon an elaborate system was devised for collecting these revenues (I K 4 7-19). There were also royal monopolies and tariffs on imported goods (I K 10 15, 28). Powerful kings, such as David and Solomon, received in addition the "presents" of conquered nations (II S 8 10-12; I K 4 21, 10 25; II Ch 17 11). Under Solomon Israel experienced the hardship of the levy, maṣ (I K 5 13 ff.), i.e., forced labor. See Solomon, § 3.

Under the later kings, who acquired no income from trade or from foreign sources, taxes and other exactions became exceedingly burdensome (I S 8 11-13). Their collection was farmed out to officials who cruelly oppressed the people (Am 2 3, 5 11; Is 3 14 f.; Mic 3 1-3). At the time of the Syrian supremacy large sums of money had to be sent as "presents" to Damascus (I K 15 18 f., 20 1-6). Then came the Assyrian, the Egyptian, and the Babylonian exactions, which lasted until the fall of Jerusalem (II K 15 19 f., 16 8, 17 4, 18 31, 23 33-35, 24 1).

In the Persian period we read of mindā, 'tribute' (= Assyr. mandatu, 'present'), a special forced contribution, bᵉlō, 'custom' (= Assyr. bêltu), 'tribute,' and hălāk, 'toll' or 'tariff' (Ezr 4 13, 20, 7 24). There was also a tax of 40 shekels a day imposed by the governor (Neh 5 15), besides the presents that had to be brought him (Mal 1 8). The result was extreme poverty in the community (Neh 5 4 f.).

In the Greek period there was a poll-tax, an exaction of one-third of the grain and one-half of the fruit, a tax on salt, and a special tax to furnish new crowns to the monarch (I Mac 1 29, 10 28 f., 11 34 f.). The Ptolemies farmed out the revenues to the highest bidders (Josephus, Ant. XII, 4 4). The Seleucids collected them by royal officials (I Mac 1 29).

Under Roman rule Judæa had to pay a regular tribute, but the collecting was left in the hands of the native rulers, who followed the ancient methods (Josephus, Ant. XIV, 10 5 f.; XV, 9 1). When subsequently, after the death of Herod, the government was administered by procurators, the Roman system of taxation was introduced. The census or poll-tax (Gr. ἀπογραφή, Lk 2 2, "taxing" AV, "enrolment" RV; or κῆνσος, Mt 17 25, 22 17-19; Mk 12 14, "tribute" EV) was gathered by Roman officials. The more troublesome tolls and duties (Gr. τέλος, whence τελώνιον, Mt 9 9; Mk 2 14; Lk 5 27, "receipt of custom" AV, "place of toll" RV) were farmed out to the highest bidders (see Publican). On the religious dues see Priesthood, §§ 3, 4, 9 (c); Sacrifice and Offerings; and Tithe.

TEACH, TEACHER, TEACHING: In the O T, "teaching" as an educational term means the process of training the young in the knowledge of God. Teaching simply for the sake of imparting information on all sorts of subjects is unknown to the O T. Making children acquainted with the will of God is, however, recognized as an important parental duty (Pr 4 4), the performance of which gives rise, first to religious and later, to comprehensive education (see Education). But the parent is not the only teacher. He must himself be taught by the representative of J" who is commissioned to give his people the Torah. The prophets, though not called by the name (the word mōreh, 'teacher,' occurs only in Hab 2 18), claim a right to be listened to as the conveyors and exponents of J"'s wishes concerning conduct (cf. Hos 4 6, 8 1; Am 2 4; Mic 4 2; Is 1 10, 2 6, etc.). But that priests also claimed and exercised the privilege of teaching is evident from the rebuke administered to them by Micah (3 11) because they "teach for hire." After the Exile, teaching as a function passed into the hands of the scribes; since, from the nature of their professional work as students of the Law, they were first looked up to as competent expounders and then took upon themselves the work of teaching. Accordingly, they were also designated by the term 'rabbi,' i.e., 'great one.'

In the N T the teacher was he who could give clear solutions of puzzling problems in the sphere of religious thought. Jesus was recognized as able to do this and was called "teacher" (διδάσκαλος, Jn 3 2; Mk 12 14); but as Christianity raised a class of questions peculiar to itself, it also called forth leaders who could answer them and grouped these leaders under the name of teachers (Ac 13 1; I Co 12 28; Ro 12 6-8; Eph 4 11; here teachers are placed side by side with apostles and prophets). See also CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, § 6, and, in general, EDUCATION.

At first, teaching was probably only a function, but in the Church of the 2d cent. it came to be vested in an office clearly defined and recognized as such (Did. 13 2, 15 1-2; Barn. 1 8; Ign. Eph. 3 1; Herm. Mand. IV, 3 1). The Teaching of the Twelve was a manual designed to be used by such official teachers in the Church. A. C. Z.

TEBAH, tî'bā (טֶבַח, ṭebhaḥ): A clan descended from Nahor (Gn 22 24). The name seems to appear as that of an Aramæan town (II S 8 8, Betah; cf. I Ch 18 8, Tibhath), taken by David from Hadarezer, King of Aram-zobah (q.v.). E. E. N.

TEBALIAH, teb''a-lai'ā (טְבַלְיָהוּ, ṭebhalyāhū), 'J" hath purified' (?): The son of Hosah, a Merarite Levite (I Ch 26 11). E. E. N.

TEBETH, tî'beth (טֵבֵת, ṭēbhēth): The tenth month of the Jewish year. See TIME, § 3. E. E. N.

TEHAPHNEHES, tę-haf'nę-hîz. See TAHPANHES.

TEHINNAH, tę-hin'ā (תְּחִנָּה, tᵉḥinnāh), 'supplication': An individual (or clan?) of Judah, the 'father' of the city of Nahash, named as one of "the men of Recah" (I Ch 4 12). See RECAH. E. E. N.

TEIL, tîl. See PALESTINE, § 22.

TEKEL, tî'kel. See MENE, MENE, etc.

TEKOA, te-kō'a (תְּקוֹעַ, tᵉqōa'); spelled Tekoah in II S 14 2, 4, 9 AV, and I Mac 9 33 RV: The name of a town of Judah (I Ch 4 5; cf. the LXX. of Jos 15 60), in the wilderness of Tekoa (II Ch 20 20). The town is identified with the ruins of modern Tekû'a, which is about 5 m. S. of Bethlehem. Map II, F 2. It is located on a hill whose altitude is about 2,700 ft. above sea-level, from which is obtained a fine view of Bethlehem, the Mount of Olives, the valley of the Jordan, the mountains of Moab, and the N. end of the Dead Sea. David as a shepherd-boy, and in his exile wanderings, must have become thoroughly familiar with all the region round about. Ira, the son of Ikkesh the Tekoite, dwelt here (II S 23 28); also the prophet Amos (Am 1 1). It was here that the "wise woman" lived whom Joab employed to persuade David to bring home his banished son Absalom (II S 14 2 ff.). Rehoboam fortified T. (II Ch 11 6). It was reinhabited after the Exile, and its citizens assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding Jerusalem's walls (Neh 3 5, 27). Simon and Jonathan fled to the Wilderness of T. from before Bacchides (I Mac 9 33). Jerome speaks of it as abounding in shepherds with their flocks. The Talmud praises its oil, and an Arab geographer its honey. To-day the ruins of the former city cover a space of four or five acres. G. L. R.

TEKOAH, te-kō'ā, TEKOAHITE, TEKOAH, WILDERNESS OF. See TEKOA.

TEL-ABIB, tel''-ê'bib (תֵּל אָבִיב, tēl 'ābhībh), 'hill of ears of grain': A place in Babylonia, on the Chebar (q.v.), where dwelt a colony of exiled Jews (Ezk 3 15). It was common in Babylonia to call a mound where a town had once existed a til-abūbi, 'mound of the Flood,' i.e., ruined by the Flood. The Hebrews probably simply changed the pronunciation of the name of one of such mounds when they came to occupy it. E. E. N.

TELAH, tî'lā (תֶּלַח, telaḥ): A clan of Ephraim (I Ch 7 25). E. E. N.

TELAIM, tę-lê'im (טְלָאִים, ṭelā'īm): A town where Saul mustered his army when he made war on Amalek (I S 15 4). It was in the S. of Judah, probably the Telem (q.v.) of Jos 15 24. Wellhausen and Driver, ad loc., read טַלָּאִם (ṭelā'īm); and correct in I S 27 8 מִעוֹלָם to מִטֶּלָם ("from of old" to "from Telam"; cf. LXX. Γελάμ). Wellhausen would also read in I S 15 7 "Telam" for "Havilah." C. S. T.

TELASSAR, tę-las'ar (תֶּלַאשַּׁר, tᵉla'ssār, II K 19 12; תַּלְשַׁר, tᵉlassār, Is 37 12): The name of an Assyrian province, in which the children of Eden (q.v.) dwelt. Bît-Adini (Eden) was on both banks of the Middle Euphrates, and accordingly, T is possibly the Til-ašuri ('hill of Assur'), near Mâ-tani, mentioned in an inscription of Esarhaddon. C. S. T.

TELEM, tî'lem (טֶלֶם, ṭelem): I. A gatekeeper who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 24). II. A town in the S. of Judah (Jos 15 24) which is not yet identified. See TELAIM. C. S. T.

TEL-HARSHA, tel''-hār'sha (תֵּל חַרְשָׁא, tēl ḥarshā', Tel Haresha AV), 'hill of the forest' (or 'hill in the mountain,' if the name be Babylonian): The home of a colony of exiles (Ezr 2 59; Neh 7 61) in Babylonia. E. E. N.

TEL-MELAH, tel''-mi'lā (תֵּל מֶלַח, tēl melaḥ), 'hill of salt,' or, if the name be Babylonian, perhaps 'hill of sailors': The home of a colony of Jewish exiles (Ezr 2 59; Neh 7 61) in Babylonia. E. E. N.

TEMA, tî'ma (תֵּימָא, têmā', 'on the right,' i.e., 'south'): I. An Arabian trading-tribe and a locality (Job 6 19; Is 21 14; Jer 25 23), counted as a 'son' of Ishmael (Gn 25 15; I Ch 1 30). The locality is now known as Teimâ, a fertile oasis and prosperous village about 200 m. SE. of Akabâ. It was an important place on the ancient caravan-route between N. and S. Arabia. On the edge of the oasis are famous salt-beds. Ruins of a city wall have been found, and old Aramaic inscriptions which prove Teimâ to have been the seat of an ancient civilization. See Doughty, Arabia Deserta, I, 284-300, with plan.

II. Temah RV. The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 53, Thamah AV; Neh 7 55, Tamah AV). L. G. L.

TEMAH, ti'mā. See TEMA, II.

TEMAN, tî'man (תֵּימָן, têmān), 'which is on the right hand': An important district, apparently in the N. part of Edom (Ezk 25 13). Esau's grandson was called Teman (Gn 36 11). In Am 1 12 and Hab 3 3 T. seems to be used for all Edom, and one of the early kings of Edom was from T. (Gn 36 34). Job's friend Eliphaz was a Temanite, i.e., one of the district or tribe of Teman (Job 2 11). The Temanites were renowned for their wisdom (Jer 49 7). Eusebius (Onom. 158.7) speaks of a town, also, of Teman, 15 Roman miles (Jerome says 5) from Petra, having a garrison. G. L. R.

TEMANITE, tî'man-ait. See TEMAN.

TEMENI, tem'ę-nai or tî'mę-nai (תֵּימְנִי, tēmenī): One of the sons of Asshur (I Ch 4 6). E. E. N.

TEMPER: This term renders (1) bālal, to 'mix,' 'mingle.' It is the technical term for mixing oil with cakes or flour (Ex 29 2; and often in P). (2) rāṣaṣ, to 'moisten' flour with oil, like (1) (Ezk 46 14). (3) mālaḥ, denom. vb., Pual ptcpl., to 'season' (Ex 30 35). (4) συγκεράννυμι, to 'commingle,' well rendered in I Co 12 24 "temper," i.e., to combine into an organic structure. C. S. T.

TEMPEST: This term is used often in figures drawn from the rain- and hard wind-storms of Palestine to express destructive force. It renders (1) zerem, 'rain-' or 'hail-storm,' to typify the Assyr. invasion (Is 28 2); or the destruction of the Assyrians (Is 30 30); or disaster in general (Is 32 2). (2) ṣūphāh, 'storm-wind' (Job 27 20; cf. the same fig. in 21 18). (3) ṣā'ar, vb. 'storm-tossed,' fig. of Jerusalem (Is 54 11); ṣa'ar, 'tempest,' noun (= sa'ar Is 28 2, "flood" AV); fig. of the passion of men (Ps 55 8 [9]); of the wrath of J" (Jer 23 19, 25 32, 30 23, "whirlwind" AV); as the instrument of J" in punishment (Ps 83 15 [16]; cf. Am 1 14; Jon 1 4, 12). (4) ṣe'ārāh (= se'ārāh Job 9 27), 'tempest,' 'storm-wind,' fig. of the wrath of J" (Is 29 6; cf. Nah 1 3). (5) rūaḥ, 'wind' (Ps 11 6 RV). In the O T "temple" is the rendering of hēkhāl (cf. the Accadian egal, 'great house,' 'palace'), and once (II Ch 35 20) of bēth, 'house' (cf. also II K 11 10 f.; I Ch 6 10, 10 10, and II Ch 23 10). In the N T the word renders ἱερόν, 'sacred enclosure,' and ναός, 'the sanctuary building' (in AV also οἶκος, "house," Lk 11 51, "sanctuary" RV, "house" RVmg.). The fundamental conception of the temple suggested by the foregoing terminology is not that of a place convenient for worship, but that of a dwelling-place for God, where, accordingly, He could be found and approached. Worship itself might be offered wherever God had an altar. Temples as abiding-places of the gods were very common among the Semitic and other ancient peoples and lands (e.g., Assyria, Babylonia, Phœnicia, Egypt). They often called for large outlay of means and energy in their construction.

2. Temples Before David's Time.

Among the Hebrews, it was in comparatively later days that the thought of erecting a temple to J" occurred. The Ark of J" (the emblem of His presence among His people) was kept under a tent ("Tabernacle" [q.v.]) down to the reign of David (II S 6 17; I K 1 39, 2 28-30), and according to II S 7 6, this had been the condition of things ever since the days of Moses. And yet from I S 1 9, 3 3 (cf. Jer 7 14), it is to be inferred that there must have been some sort of permanent structure at Shiloh (a stone temple, according to Smend) dedicated to J" There may also have been a temple at Nob (I S ch. 21), though not named explicitly. Micah had a house of gods ("God" mg.) for his ephod (Jg 17 5). But of this and other sacred buildings, such as the "house of Elberith" at Shechem (Jg 9 46), little, if anything, is known. They were remnants of Canaanite cults, and on a par with the house of Dagon at Gaza (Jg 16 29). The word "temple" is in the main applied to three actual successive structures erected on the same spot in Jerusalem and dedicated to J" In addition to these, an ideal temple is described by Ezekiel. The actual temples are those of Solomon, Zerubbabel (the Second Temple), and Herod.

I. THE TEMPLE OF SOLOMON.

3. Site of the Temple.

The site of this structure was the eastern hill in Jerusalem called Zion or Moriah (the identification of Zion with the hill W. of the Tyropœon Valley is purely traditional and lacks historical support). The choice of this site was undoubtedly determined by sacred associations traceable back to a very ancient date. At all events, the place was the scene of a theophany (II S 24 16), while it was used as a threshing-floor by Araunah the Jebusite.

But Zion in the days of David and Solomon was not so much the sacred, as it was the royal hill. On its leveled summit was the enclosure in which Solomon erected a group of buildings, which, with the exception of the Temple, were intended for use by himself and his household. Some of these were designed for administrative purposes, but others were to be used simply as the residence of the king and his harem. The group included the royal palace and harem, the Porch of Pillars and the Throne Porch (Solomon's Porch), and the House of the Forest of Lebanon (see page 482). These were unified and regarded as a complex, but this fact does not warrant the statement occasionally made, that the Temple of Solomon was a chapel royal, designed, like all the structures of the group, for the private use of the king and his household. See also JERUSALEM, §§ 25–30.

The idea of erecting a temple in Jerusalem is traced to David; and it is in harmony with what is otherwise known of the mind of this king. For he certainly saw deeply enough into the true character and mission of the people over whom he was called to rule to realize that only through the cultivation and full development of the worship of J" could Israel accomplish the work assigned it by Providence. But for reasons variously given (II S 7 5 f.; cf. I Ch 17 6), David did not put his idea into execution. What he did toward this end was to accumulate a large mass of material.

5. David's Plan and Preparations.

The Plan of the Temple of Solomon. The Temple area, strictly so called, was enclosed by a wall made of three layers of stone, on which a layer of cedar planks was laid in the form of a gable. The floor of the court was paved. The approach to it was through several gates, i.e.: (1) the upper gate (II K 15 35), said to have been built by Jotham (II Ch 27 3); (2) the Benjamin gate (Jer 28 2); (3) the King's gate (I Ch 9 18), to the E., and the New gate, to the S. (Jer 26 10, 36 10). In addition, mention is made of the Shallecheth gate, on the W. side of the court (I Ch 26 16). But whether it opened into the Temple court or into that of the palace is uncertain. It is supposed to have been connected with a causeway leading from the Tyropœon Valley to the Temple court (identified with Wilson's Arch), but this can not be positively asserted. Neither can the meaning of the name (shallekheth, 'casting out') be literally pressed, making it the avenue for getting rid of the refuse from the Temple. For this purpose other provisions were made on the opposite side of the grounds.

6. The Enclosure and Its Gates.

The Temple structure was in the form of a rectangle with the following dimensions: length, 60 cu., about 104 ft. if the 'sacred cubit' of 21 in. is meant; breadth, 22 cu.; height, 30 cu. The building faced the E., its length extending from E. to W. Whether these measurements represent the inner or outer dimensions is a question of minor importance, but the probable answer is in favor of the former alternative. See cut of ground-plan and plan of the Temple of Amon at Thebes (next page), for purposes of comparison.

7. Form and Dimensions. Ground-Plan.

The inner space of the building was divided into two parts, to which a third is sometimes added by reckoning the porch of the Temple as an integral portion of it. The two parts were respectively called the Holy Place (hēkhāl) or Sanctuary and the Holy of Holies or Most Holy Place (dᵉbhīr, Oracle, lit. the 'innermost' or 'rear'). Of these, the Holy Place was 40 cu. in length (from E. to W.) and 20 cu. in breadth (from N. to S.). The Most Holy Place was 20 cu. in each direction (a perfect cube). This leaves a space in the roof of 20×20×10 cu. unaccounted for. It may have been left entirely unused or reserved for storage purposes. The porch or vestibule was 10 cu. in breadth, and its length was the same as that of the breadth of the main building (20 cu.). The statement in II Ch 3 4 that the height of the porch was 120 cu. is evidently based upon a textual corruption. The description in I K ch. 6, without being explicit, leaves the impression that the height of the porch was the same as that of the rest of the building, viz., 30 cu.

8. Subdivisions.

Of the construction of the house very few details are given. The walls were massive but scarcely as thick as the 6 cu. allowed in Ezek's ideal temple. The roof was flat with possibly the customary parapet (coping?) of Oriental house roofs. It is conjectured from the nature of the case that the roof must have been supported by pillars within, which, of course, could be so arranged as not to mar but rather to add to the beauty of the structure. I K 10 12 may possibly refer to this feature. The floor of marble slabs was covered with boards of fir (I K 6 15, perhaps more correctly cypress, so AVmg.).

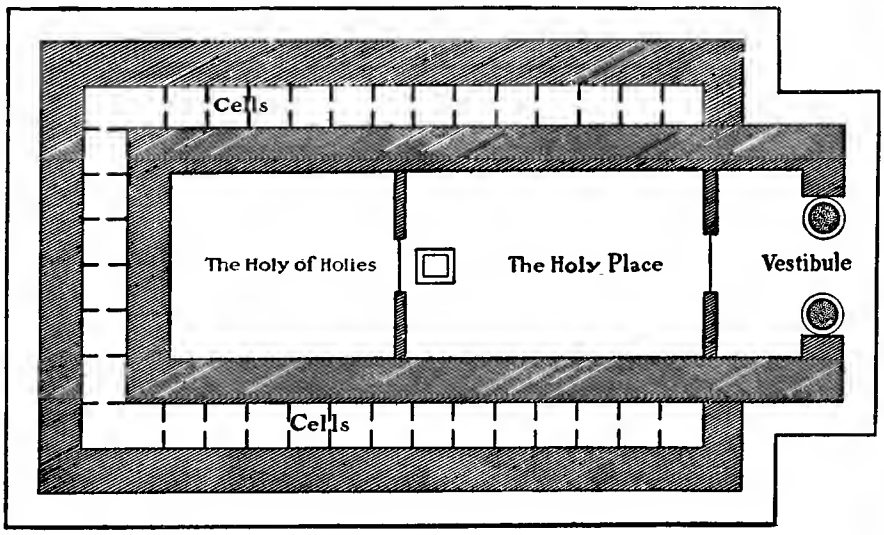
9. Construction.

The material of the walls was stone, which was hewn and prepared in the quarry, so that while the structure was being erected no sound of ax, or hammer, or tool of iron was heard (II K 7 6). The walls, however, were wainscoted with cedar wood. The doors were made of solid olive wood, each consisting of two folding leaves. They were decorated with carvings of cherubim, palm-trees, and open flowers, and overlaid with gold.

10. Materials.

The main building was surrounded on all sides except the E. by a series of so-called "chambers." These were arranged in three stories. One peculiarity in their construction was that in the lowest story their width was 5 cu., in the next 6, and in the third 7, this result being secured by narrowing the thickness of the Temple wall with each story. As far as the wall was concerned, this narrowing would be of the nature of a rebatement (I K 6 6 RV); accordingly the beams of cedar wood on which the floors and roofs of these chambers rested were not built in the Temple wall, but placed on the rebatement, thus preserving the sanctity of the sacred building (see illus., front elevation). The number of the chambers is not given in the account of Solomon's Temple; but from Ezk 41 6, they have been supposed to be thirty. These chambers rose to a height of not more than 20 cu. It was possible to cut windows in the wall over them for the purpose of admitting some light into the interior of the sacred court. The Oracle, however, was totally devoid of windows and must have been lighted, if at all, altogether artificially.

11. The "Chambers Round About."



Ground-Plan of Solomon's Temple.

In the outer or general court of the Temple the most striking object was the altar of burnt offering (brazen altar, I K 8 63; cf. II K 16 10). This is described in II Ch 4 1 as made of brass 20 cu. square and 10 cu. high, the work of the artist Huram Abi (so Heb. cf. II Ch 2 12 RVmg.). Its being made of brass has been regarded a violation of Ex 20 24 f., though Keil held that the brass was simply a shell or cover under which an altar of earth and unhewn stones existed. A more probable explanation is that such an elaborate metallic altar was due to the influence of the more luxurious religious practises of surrounding peoples (see ALTAR, § 2).

Another object of prominence in the court was the "brazen sea" (II K 25 13; I Ch 18 8), called also the molten sea (I K 7 23; II Ch 4 2). This was a large basin of brass or bronze, and stood between the porch and the altar, "on the right side of the house, eastward, toward the south" (I K 7 39), i.e., south of the line between the house and the altar of burnt offering. Its dimensions are given as 5 cu. in height and 10 in diameter. The thickness of the basin was a "handbreadth" and its shape in general that of a lily. Its capacity was 2,000 baths (q.v.). If the shape of the basin were that of a hemisphere, a difficulty would arise, since a hemisphere of the dimensions given could not contain much more than one-half of the quantity mentioned, whereas if the shape of the basin were more nearly that of a cylinder, it might contain three-fourths of the quantity. Accordingly, it is best to assume that the measurements given are those of the rim and possibly the base, but that the middle portion of the vessel bulged out considerably. The middle of the exterior of the basin was decorated with two rows of knops (colocynths), cast when the vessel was cast, and carved into perfect form afterward (I K 7 24). The brazen sea was made to rest on twelve oxen, divided into four groups of three each, and each group so placed as to face one of the cardinal points of the compass. How the water was brought into it, or caused to flow out of it, is not specified. As to the latter, the interesting conjecture has been made that it issued out of the mouths of the oxen. The purpose of the vessel was, according to II Ch 4 6, to furnish water for the priests in their ablutions preparatory to the performance of their service. According to II K 16 17, Ahaz, when in need of funds, used the oxen in payment of tribute, and laid the brazen sea on a plain stone pavement. Later (II K 25 13; Jer 52 17, 20), the Babylonians broke up the basin itself and carried the brass to Babylon.

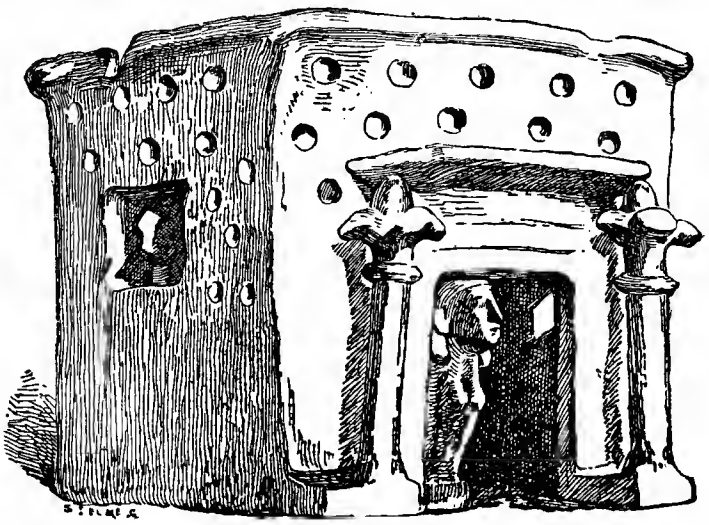
13. The Brazen Sea.



Miniature Clay Model of a Phœnician Temple at Idalion in Cyprus.

Before the Entrance are Two Isolated Pillars with Capitals in the Form of a Lotus Flower. In the Doorway is a Bird with a Woman's Head. The pillars are significant in connection with the mention of the two pillars of Solomon's Temple, which was built by Phœnician workmen.

Immediately before the porch stood the two hollow bronze pillars, called respectively Jachin and Boaz (I K 7 21; II Ch 3 17; Jer 52 21, 22). According to some authorities, these were not connected with the porch, but according to others, they served to support its roof. The first of them stood to the right or N. side of the entrance, and the second, to the left (see illus., front elevation). The height of each was 18 cu., and the circumference 12 cu. Their tops were decorated with carved work (lily work) and also with wreaths of chainwork (I K 7 17). These were the work of Huram, the Phœnician artist. Those who hold that the pillars supported the roof of the porch allege that their existence is sufficiently accounted for by that fact, but according to those who believe that they were detached, their function was simply ornamental. Their names (Boaz, 'strength,' and Jachin, 'firmness,' lit. 'setting right') suggest some primitive symbolical meaning. It is probable that these pillars were attached to the Temple mainly from an architectural point of view. The "pillar" had for long been a common adjunct of Phœnician sanctuaries (see SEMITIC RELIGION, § 30), and Solomon's Phœnician architects planned for their presence in connection with the Temple as a matter of course, without any special reference to the ideas originally symbolized by the pillar. The accompanying cut of a clay model of a Phœnician temple is instructive in this respect. The ornamental capitals of the pillars Boaz and Jachin were in the form of bowls, covered with 400 pomegranates, which were attached to network and arranged in two rows.

14. The Pillars Jachin and Boaz.

Other works of Huram are mentioned, as the ten lavers, shovels and basins, and ten bases on which the lavers rested. Just what these bases and lavers were has been carefully worked out by Nowack (Heb. Arch. 1894) on the ground of a comparison with similar articles used in extra-Biblical Semitic worship. The bases, mᵉkhōnōth, were of very complex construction, the lower portion of each being a framework 4 cu. square and 3 cu. high, fastened at the corners by undersetters, i.e., square pillars whose lower ends projected below the frame. To these projections were attached axles and wheels, thus making the whole a vehicle. The upper part was of the nature of a pedestal in the form of a ring or narrow cylinder raised one-half cu. above the base, and supported by stays, sloping inward. Into this was fitted the laver or basin with a diameter of 4 cu. and capacity of forty baths. The borders and stays were ornamented with embossed figures of lions, oxen, cherubim, and wreathen-work. See illustration, page 853.

15. The Ten Bases and Lavers.

In the Holy Place the principal item of furniture was a table (or a series of ten tables) of showbread. This was made in the form of an altar. Just where it was placed is not stated. A golden altar is also mentioned (I K 7 43), sometimes supposed to be the altar of incense. But as no such feature appears in the description of Ezekiel's Temple, and as in general the use of incense in the worship of J" can not be traced earlier than the exilic period, Stade (GVI, I, 330) and others have identified the golden altar with the table of the showbread. Toward the wall of the Holy Place there were ten lamp-stands (candlesticks), five on each side, together with their lamps.

Base with Laver.

The following smaller articles must have had a place in some part of the hēkhāl or in some other portion of the building, possibly in the "chambers round about": (1) Tongs, or snuffers, melqāhayim (snuff-dishes, Ex 37 23 AV), and mᵉzamrōth, to be used in trimming the candlesticks (I K 7 48-50; cf. also Ex 37 23; Nu 4 9). (2) Censers and firepans (maḥtōth) also, perhaps, for the purpose of carrying off burned portions of wicks (I K 7 50; cf. also Ex 38 17; Nu 4 9). (3) Shovels (yāʿīm), to be used in removing the ashes from the altar (I K 7 40, 45; II K 25 14). (4) Spoons (kappōth), probably shallow bowls, mentioned along with the other articles of the furniture of the table of showbread (Ex 25 29; I K 7 50). (5) Flagons (qᵉsāwōth), in which the wine of libations was kept (Ex 37 16) and bowls (mᵉnaqqīyōth) for the pouring out of the same wine. (6) Flesh-hooks (mizlāgōth, I Ch 28 17), two- or three-pronged forks used for stirring and removing the contents of boiling pots (I S 2 13).

16. Minor Pieces of Furniture.

Between the hēkhāl and the dᵉbhīr stood a wall of cedar wood (I K 6 16) with a door of olive wood inserted. According to II Ch 3 14 (cf. also Mt 27 51), there was a curtain or veil also before this partition. In the dᵉbhīr the only object was the Ark of the Covenant (I K 8 8), overshadowed by two gigantic figures of cherubim, 10 cu. high, each with outstretched wings, so that their tips touched in the center over the Mercy-seat, the free wings extending to the side-walls on each side. The Ark was placed in the middle, yet so that the handles by which it was borne were visible. Within the ark were the two Stone Tables of the Law. It is not likely that the brazen serpent was kept in the dᵉbhīr, or in the Temple. It must be admitted, however, as possible that this was the case, as it was destroyed during Hezekiah's reformation (II K 18 4).

17. Partition or Veil.

II. The Temple of Ezekiel.

In Ezk 40 1–43 27 there is a description of a temple which, on the surface of it, was designed to furnish an ideal. It is not likely that the prophet believed that it was to be exactly reproduced in the restored Jerusalem. In its essential features this ideal is patterned after the Temple of Solomon, and has often been used as legitimate material for the reconstruction of the plan of the older building.

18. Ezekiel's Temple an Ideal Model.

The chief characteristic in Ezekiel's ideal is symmetry. This structure with its appurtenances was to be located on a site 500 cu. square, and walled about (Ezk 40 5-27). It was to be provided with three gates (A), each lengthened out so as to include lodges (guard-chambers AV) on the side, ending in a porch (a) into a gateway 50 cu. in length. Each gateway was to have arches ("colonnade" RVmg., 40 16). These gates were to be located in the middle of each one of the N., E., and S. walls of the enclosure. There was to be no gate on the W side. As the whole area of the court was to be raised above the surrounding territory, each gate was to be approached by a flight of steps. Around the outer wall, which was 6 cu. high and 6 cu. in thickness, and opened into the court, there were to be chambers or cells (1, 2, 3, etc.) for the keeping of the utensils and provisions (40 17 ff.). These were to serve also as priestly residences. The four corners were to be occupied by four small courts separated by partitions in which would be located kitchens (D) for cooking the sacrificial meals (40 21-24, 38-40).

19. Distinctive Features of Ezekiel's Temple.

In this great outer court, or rather upon it, Ezekiel's plan placed an inner raised court (v, w, x, y) (40 28-37), approached, like the outer one, by means of three gates (E) with gateways and steps. The steps, however, were in this case eight instead of seven. The chief structure to stand in this inner court was the great altar (L), in the exact center of the area (a, b, c, d) bounded by the three inner gates and the main Temple building toward the W. The dimensions of this area were exactly 100 cu. square (40 47). Near the N. and S. gates of the inner court there were cells or chambers (J) designed for use by the priests in the performance of sacrifices (40 44-46). In the vestibule of the E. inner gate there were four tables (S), on which the sin- and trespass-offerings were slain, and in the space to the N. and S of this same gateway four (or eight) others of hewn stone (H), some of which were designed for the killing of the sacrificial victims and some for the preparation of the carcasses for sacrifice (40 38-42). In the portions of the inner court, N. and S of the Temple building (K), were rows of chambers (three-storied) for the exclusive use of the priests as the place where they were to eat "the most holy things" (42 1-14). In the space behind the house (K) there was also a building (41 15). The area just next to the house (b, b′, c′, c) was left unoccupied as a holy "separate" place (41 12, etc.). The altar was in the form of four platforms, the lowest (the "base," or bottom) a square of 18 cu. but only 1½ cu. high, and bordered by an edge of a span in width. The next, the lower ledge (43 14, settle AV), was a square of 16 cu., but 2 cu. high. The third was 14 cu. square and 4 cu. high, and the fourth, called Ariel (43 15, "altar-hearth" RVmg.), 12 cu. square and 4 cu. high. The corners of this altar-hearth were adorned with four horns, each 1 cu. in length (see also ALTAR, § 2).

The central structure consisted of a porch 20 cu. by 12 divided into (a) Holy Place, 40 cu. by 20, and (b) Most Holy Place, 20 cu. by 20, placed on a higher platform, reached by ten steps. Its walls were 6 cu. in thickness, and it was surrounded by 30 (LXX. 33) chambers. Access to these chambers was through the N. and S. sides. The arrangement admitted of passageways, obscurely mentioned as galleries (cf. Jos. Ant. 42, 3 5; 'colonnades' according to Stade). The governing idea of Ezekiel's Temple was the absolute separation of the sacred from the profane. No secular building should go upon the holy area, which was to be protected on all sides by the wall and to have no contact with any wall of the city. Its two courts (Solomon's Temple had but one) provided against the mingling of the laity and the priesthood.

21. The Temple Building.

III. THE SECOND TEMPLE.

The Temple erected under the supervision of Zerubbabel, with the encouragement of Haggai and Zechariah, commonly known as the Second Temple, was intended to restore that which had been destroyed by the Babylonians at the beginning of the Exile. It was begun in 537 B.C. by Sheshbazzar (q.v.) and finished in 515 by Zerubbabel. The interest of Cyrus, King of Persia, was enlisted in the case, and his approval secured for the plan; also a decree ordering that the vessels taken by Nebuchadrezzar from Solomon's Temple should be returned; and that a tax should be levied on the provinces W. of the Euphrates to meet the expenses of the Jews who might return to their own country (Ezr 1 7 ff., 5 1 ff., 6 5). The work of building, however, made slow progress, though the altar of burnt offering was set up and the foundation-stones laid. In the second month of the second year the work ceased on account of the opposition of the mixed population of Samaritans. Though the difficulties raised must have disappeared early, the resumption of the work did not take place before 521 B.C. (the second year of Darius), under the stimulus of the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah, Zerubbabel and the priest Jeshua taking the leadership.

22. The Temple Rebuilt by Zerubbabel.

In its general lines the Second Temple was undoubtedly patterned after the First. The fact that Cyrus prescribed that its dimensions might be 60 cu. in height and breadth must be taken as permission which was not used to the full. The court was divided into two parts, an inner for priests only, and, separated from this by a railing of wood (Jos. Ant. XIII, 13 5), an outer court. In the main, the differences between Zerubbabel's Temple and that of Solomon center about the furniture. In the former, an altar of burnt offering made of unhewn stone took the place of the brazen altar in Solomon's Temple. In the hēkhāl, there was but one candlestick (with seven lamps), one table of showbread, also a golden altar of incense and minor vessels. It has been alleged that the walls of the building were overlaid with gold, but this does not seem probable. The d'bhīr was altogether empty, as the Ark of the Covenant was not rescued from the catastrophe of the Exile.

23. Plan of the Building.

The contrast between the magnificence of Solomon's Temple and the comparative poverty of the Second occasioned some sadness on the part of the older returned exiles (Hag 2 3); but it served the purpose of consolidating the Levitical ceremonial. In the days of the Maccabæan persecution, the Syrian king, Antiochus Epiphanes (168–165 B.C.), placed an altar to Jupiter Olympius in it and perpetrated various other acts of sacrilege; but at his downfall it was repaired and rededicated, of which event the Feast of Dedication (cf. Jn 10 22) was the celebration. With other minor embellishments and additions, the Temple continued to the days of the Romans, who plundered it, but did no damage to the building.

24. Later History of the Second Temple.

IV. The Temple of Herod.

The connection between the Temple of Zerubbabel and that of Herod was meant to be one of identity. In deference to the Jews, who, when Herod announced his intention to rebuild the Temple (Jos. Ant. XV, 11; BJ, V, 5), feared that if the old building were demolished a new one might not be erected very soon, Herod devised the reconstruction in such a way that it appeared to be at its different stages a simple process of repairing portions of the old, the services of worship being meanwhile uninterrupted. When the work was completed, however, it was an entirely different structure throughout. It was begun in 19 B.C. and finished between 62 and 64 A.D., under the curatorship of Albinus. At the time of Jesus, it was said to have been forty-six years in building (Jn 2 20), and was still unfinished (Edersheim, The Temple and Its Services in the Time of Christ).

25. Relation to the Second Temple.

The Temple of Herod was characterized by unparalleled external splendor. Being anxious to impart an air of glory to his reign, and to vindicate his place as the champion of all that was distinctively national, and still further to please the Jews by giving them a sanctuary of which they might be proud, Herod spared no expense in adorning the Temple with all manner of architectural lavishness. The plan was in its essentials the same as that of its predecessors, and yet in particulars differences were introduced. The Temple area was enlarged so as to cover the whole surface of the hill Zion (Moriah, now Haram-esh-Sherif). This space, a terraced platform, was made by first enclosing the whole by a wall to the NW. corner, where a part of the area was broken into by the castle of Antonia, the old tower of Baris, which stood on a rock platform higher than the level of the Temple Hill and lower than that of the adjoining suburbs of the city. The tower was built as a fortress by John Hyrcanus II, but enlarged, strengthened, beautified, and transformed into a palace by Herod himself, who also renamed it Antonia after his patron Mark Antony.

26. General Features.

A covered colonnade, usually called Porch (portico, cloister), ran around the inner portion of the wall of the enclosure. The south division of this series of porticoes was especially known as the Royal Porch, and was the most elaborate and imposing. It consisted of 162 gigantic columns arranged in four rows. This naturally gave three corridors, the middle one of which was wider and higher than those on each side. Somewhere along the eastern portico, and on that portion of the area which was artificially built overlooking the Kedron Valley, was a section of the colonnade known as Solomon's Porch (Jn 10 23; Ac 3 11, 5 12), upon the basis of a belief that it had been erected by Solomon and had escaped the various vicissitudes of the city and the sanctuary from Solomon's day. But the name may have been given to it upon other grounds. The outer court (the Court of the Gentiles) was 900 ft. square and approached from without by a series of gates and a bridge (Zion Bridge, Robinson's Arch) spanning the Tyropœan Valley, and connecting the Temple with the western hill.

27. The Court.

Within this general enclosure and reached by an ascent of fourteen (fifteen) steps was the Inner Court, a complex of buildings surrounded by a narrow corridor of 10 cu. in width. Upon this, but reached by an ascent of five steps, was the wall of the Inner Court, rising to the height of 25 cu., and separating the sanctuary proper from the world. Inscriptions warned non-Israelites not to enter this part of the sanctuary on pain of death (see accompanying facsimile inscription discovered by Clermont Ganneau in 1871 and at present in Constantinople. The entrance to this Court was effected through one of nine gates, four respectively on the N. and S., and one on the E. side, the W. being as in previous temples unprovided with a gate. sittings. Another court (the Court of the Priests) rose out of and above the Court of Israel. Within this was located the Altar of Sacrifice. Only priests were allowed access here, except when a layman might appear bringing his offering. In this last court was located the Temple proper, including the original nave of Zerubbabel's Temple; but its width was increased to 100 cu. by the erection of shoulders, and its height like-area (the eastern portion) was divided from the rest, and access to it was allowed to women, whence it was called the Court of Women. Between this section and the Court of Men (the Court of Israel), to the W., accessible only to men, a flight of fifteen steps semicircular in form led to the great gate 40 cu. wide and 50 high. Whether this was the Beautiful Gate (Ac 3 2), or the one that led directly into the Court of Women from the outer court is not absolutely certain. Within the Court of Women was located the Treasury. But the name is applicable either to the colonnade around this court in which the so-called trumpets or trumpet-shaped contribution-boxes were placed, or to that one of the two chambers in which gifts and votive offerings were deposited (Sheqal 5, 6). In the allusion in Jn 8 20, it is undoubtedly the first.

wise raised to 100 cu. The old division of Holy Place and Holy of Holies was naturally maintained, but instead of a solid wall or partition between these two sections the Veil was hung, consisting of two parallel curtains made of rich materials. These two curtains were 3 cu. apart, the one toward the Holy Place being open at its N. end, and the one toward the Holy of Holies at its S. end, so that the high priest, passing into the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement, could do so by walking between them. Another curtain was hung at the door of the Holy Place, instead of a door.

What was meant by the "pinnacle," πτερύγιον (Mt 4 5; Lk 4 9) (nowhere else connected with the Temple), was certainly a height from which a large and impressive outlook on the country about was possible, and at the same time a fall would prove fatal in ordinary circumstances. All the interpretations offered of the expression resolve themselves into two classes, i.e.: (1) those which identify the spot with the summit of some building at the extremity of the Temple area such as Solomon's Porch (Wetstein), or the Royal Porch, or the SE. corner, which looked down into a dizzying precipitous chasm (Meyer); and (2) those which fix it on some point of the roof of the main building, such as that portion of it which was directly over the eastern projection or Porch (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb.; Mt 4 5), or the parapet (Luther), or the gable or ridge (Paulus, Wiener). The latter of these classes of interpretation meets the requirements of the text best. It is not necessary, however, to assume that any special corner, edge, or point on the roof bore the name "pinnacle." The point of the pinnacle from which Jesus was bidden to cast Himself down is to be distinguished from the pinnacle in general.

TEMPLE[2]: An anatomical term (Heb. raqqāh, 'thinness'). The temples are the regions on both sides of the head behind the forehead and eyes, and a severe blow on the temples is often deadly (Jg 4 21, 22, 5 26). They are likened to pomegranates (Song 4 3 =6 7), because of the shape or the varied light and dark red coloring of a slice of the fruit. C. S. T.

TEMPLE[3]: Besides the Temple at Jerusalem, mention is made in the Bible of the temples of heathen gods. As a transl. of bayith (I Ch 10 10, "temple" AV), the RV has "house," i.e., the dwelling-place of the god, in which his idol was placed (cf. Jg 9 4; I S 5 5, 31 9 f.; II K 5 18, 10 21, etc.). In II Ch 36 7, Ezr 5 14 ("palaces" RVmg.), and Jl 3 5 [4 5], "temple" is the transl. of hēkhāl. This word means also 'royal house,' 'palace,' which may be more exact in all three passages (cf. II K 20 18). Some find a reference to the temple of Marduk in II Ch 36 7; Ezr 5 14. In the N T ναός, "temple," is used in reference to the temple of Diana (Ac 19 24), and in metaphor, "as the dwelling-place of God," for the Christian Church (I Co 3 16; II Co 6 16; Eph 2 21), and the bodies of Christians (I Co 6 19). C. S. T.

TEMPLES, ROBBERS OF (ἱερόσυλοι, robbers of churches AV): According to ancient conceptions a sacred place belonged to deity; consequently, violence done to either property or persons within its precincts was regarded as particularly heinous (cf. II Mac 4 42). The fact that the town clerk of Ephesus expressly denied that Paul and his companions were guilty of this offense (Ac 19 37) may imply that this charge had been brought against them by Demetrius or others. J. M. T.

TEMPT, TEMPTATION: The word "tempt" is used in EV as the rendering of nāṣāh, 'test,' 'prove,' and of bāḥan, 'try,' 'examine.' The same two words are also frequently translated "prove" and "try" The latter translations are more accurate. In modern English 'tempt' suggests the idea of constraining a person to do evil, but these words mean merely 'to put character to the test.' Thus God 'tests' men to see whether they will be faithful to Him (Gn 22 1; Ex 16 4, 20 20; Dt 8 2, 13 4 [3]; Jg 2 22, 3 4; Ps 26 2), and men 'test' God to see whether His patience or His promises will hold out (Ex 17 2, 7; Nu 14 22; Dt 6 16; Is 7 12; Ps 78 18, 41, 56, 95 9, 106 14). Similarly the noun maṣṣōth (Dt 4 34, 7 19, 29 3) should be translated with ERVmg. "testings" rather than "temptations" (AV and ERV, "trials" ARV). L. B. P

In the N T the Gr. terms πειράζειν, ἐκπειράζειν, πειρασμός, and ἀπείραστος are used with a meaning ranging from the simple "trial" by suffering, etc. (Ac 20 19; I Co 10 13; Gal 4 14), through 'testing' (Mt 4 1, 7, 6 13; Ac 5 9; He 3 8 f.; Ja. 1 2, etc.) to 'constraining to evil' (Mt 16 1 ff.; I Co 7 5; Ja 1 13, etc.). TERAH, tī'rā (תֶּרַח, terah): I. The father of Abram, Nahor, and Haran (Gn 11 24-28; I Ch 1 26; Lk 3 34). He migrated with his family from Ur of the Chaldees to Haran, where he died 205 years old (Gn 11 31-32), but according to the Samaritan text, 145. In Jos 24 2 it is stated that Terah worshiped gods other than J" (cf. Gn 31 53 RVmg.). II. A station of the Israelites on their way from Sinai to Canaan (Nu 33 27 f.). Not identified. C. S. T.

TERMS OF BLESSING AND REPROACH: Among the Israelites with other peoples of Semitic antiquity much more significance was attached to words or expressions uttered with some show of formality, especially if an invocation to deity (either God or some inferior spirit) was implied. A blessing was thought to have efficacy, particularly if uttered by a dying father or leader (cf. the blessings of Isaac, Gn ch. 27; of Jacob, Gn 47 7, 48 9 ff., 49 1-28; of Moses, Dt ch. 33). The formula of a blessing was considered important, and on the choice of the right terms it was thought that much of the efficacy depended. God's blessing on creation (Gn 1 28), on the Sabbath (2 3), on Noah (9 1 ff.), on Abraham (12 2 f.), etc., are all carefully noted. The nations of the earth were to be so impressed by the Divine blessing on Israel that they were to 'bless themselves' in Abraham, i.e., they were to use his name in invoking blessing on themselves (see Gn 12 3; cf. 48 20; Is 65 16; Jer 4 2 for an illustration of what is meant). In this connection the great recital of blessings and curses on Mts. Gerizim and Ebal should be noted (Dt ch. 27 f.). The blessing pronounced on Rebekah (Gn 24 60) is an example of a blessing on an individual, and the story of Balaam (Nu chs. 22–24) illustrates the significance attached to a blessing (or curse) pronounced by a seer. In the Psalms there are many examples of formulated blessings, and in the N T the beatitudes are but a collection of a few of the many blessings pronounced by Jesus.

On the other hand, words of insult, jeer, reproach, or curse were felt to be of more than passing significance. Once uttered, they were thought to have a baneful effect which was likely to follow one as a sinister fate and surely overtake one some day. See also BYWORD; CURSE; REBUKE; REPROACH.

E. E. N.

TERTIUS, tẹr'shi-ŭs (Τέρτιος): One of the persons named in the postscript of Ro ch. 16 (vs. 21-23). He is represented as having written the Epistle "in the Lord" (so RVmg.). Elsewhere in the Pauline Epistles the amanuensis is not expressly mentioned, although Paul's salutation in his own hand generally implies that the letter was written by some one else (cf. I Co 16 21; Col 4 18; II Th 3 17). J. M. T.

TERTULLUS, tẹr-tŭl'ŭs (Τέρτυλλος): A professional Roman advocate employed, as was often done by provincials unacquainted with Roman law, by the deputation of the Sanhedrin to plead their case against Paul at the court of Felix (Ac 24 1 ff.). Skilfully but falsely flattering Felix as pacifier of the province, he accused Paul of inciting Jews to disorder and of profaning the Temple. R. A. F.

TESTAMENT: The rendering of διαθήκη, primarily a 'disposition of property by will'; but the word even in classic Greek (Aristph. Av. 439) has the secondary sense of a 'convention' or 'arrangement between two parties' (i.e., a covenant). It is upon this rarer and secondary sense that the Alexandrian translators of the O T fixed when they sought for an equivalent to the Heb. bᵉrīth ('covenant'). Accordingly, in the LXX. 'testament' and 'covenant' are identified (Is 28 15; I S 18 3). This gives to the meaning of the term in the N T a variable element; for side by side with the secondary sense of the word adopted by the LXX. the original meaning of disposition of property by will is held in mind. "Testament" is made equivalent to "covenant" in Gal 4 24 AVmg. ("covenants" in both AV and RV texts). This is manifestly also the case in the accounts of the institution of the Lord's Supper (cf., however, Mt 26 28; Mk 14 24; Lk 22 20; I Co 11 25; II Co 3 6, 14, "covenant" RV). On the other hand, in He 7 22, 9 16 ff. (cf. also RVmg.), the primitive significance of the Greek word is preserved, since the author has in mind an aspect of the Gospel which is best illustrated by a last will and testament in the modern sense. A. C. Z.

TESTIMONY: The Heb. words so rendered are all derived from the vb. 'ūdh (in Hiph'il), 'to bear witness,' 'to testify.' (1) 'ēdhāh (in pl.) when rendered "testimonies" always refers to Divine commands, either those of the Deuteronomic Code and its basis, the Decalogue (Dt 4 45, 6 17 f.), or the larger body of Law (and possibly Prophecy also, in some cases) known to the psalmists (Ps 25 10, 78 56, etc., especially Ps 119, passim). (2) 'ēdhūth. In the 'priestly' portion of the Hexateuch this term always refers to the Ark as containing the two tables of the "testimony," i.e., the Decalogue, or to the Tabernacle as the shelter of the Ark (Ex 25 16 ff., 27 21; Nu 1 50, etc.). In the historical books and Psalms the term is synonymous with 'ēdhāh. (3) tᵉ'ūdhāh in Ru 4 7 means legal evidence, i.e., a token or sign required by law; in Is 8 16, 20 it refers to the prophetic word as a Divinely sanctioned witness to the truth. In the N T the three Gr. terms μαρτυρεῖν, μαρτυρία, μαρτύριον are adequately rendered by "testimony" or "give testimony," and should present no difficulties to the reader. E. E. N.

TETRARCH, tet'rārc or tī'trārc: This word means literally a ruler over one of four provinces of a country (as in Thessaly). But the original meaning of the title finally became so obscured that the Romans gave it to a ruler over part of a divided kingdom, or to a dynast below the rank of king; hence when after the death of Herod, Palestine was subdivided. not into four, but into three parts, the ruler of each was called a "tetrarch." TEXT OF THE BIBLE. See OLD TESTAMENT TEXT and NEW TESTAMENT TEXT.

THADDÆUS, thăd-dī'ŭs (Θαδδαῖος): One of the Twelve Apostles (Mk 3 18; Mt 10 3). It is to be noted, however, that this name does not occur in Lk 6 16 and Ac 1 13, and that D and the Western Text generally substitute "Lebbæus" (probably the same as Levi [Λευεῖν; cf. Orig. Contra Cel. 1, 62, Λέβης], for whom a place is thus made among the Apostles). On the other hand, the name "Judas, son of Alphæus," found in Lk 6 16; Ac 1 13, does not occur in the lists in Mk and Mt. There is no sufficient reason for identifying Judas, the son of Alphæus, with T., since (1) the last name can hardly be a corruption of the first as held by Allen (EB, art. Thaddæus); and (2) other names are substituted for "Judas" in the versions (thus: Syr. Cur. has "Judas Thomas"; Syr. Sin., simply "Thomas"). The occurrence of different names in different traditions is to be explained rather as due to the fact that there were more who "heard and saw the Lord" than could be included in a single list of Apostles. Hence the substitution of names. Of T. nothing further is said in the N T, which may account for the early substitution of other names. According to the Syriac legend of Abgar, translated by Eusebius (HE, I, 13), T. was sent to Edessa by Judas (Thomas). In the Greek Acts of Thaddæus (ed. Lipsius-Bonnet, I, 271), he is identified with Lebbæus, and represented as evangelizing Syrians and Armenians.

THEATER (θέατρον, 'a place for seeing,' from θεᾶσθαι, 'to look upon'): In classical times usually a natural concavity in a hillside, supplemented by masonry, furnished with marble seats and stage, and open to the air. Among the Greeks, it was employed sometimes for municipal and religious assemblies, as well as dramatic performances. The theater at Ephesus (Ac 19 29, 31), on the slope of Mt. Coressus, facing the harbor, was exceptionally large (seating perhaps 24,000 people). Excavations have revealed many inscriptions illustrating Ac ch. 19. The present condition of the excavations is shown in the cut attached to the article EPHESUS. S. D.

THEBES, thî'bez. See NO, NO-AMMON.

THEBEZ, thî'bez (תֵּבֵץ, tēbhēts): A city near Shechem. Eusebius and Jerome mention a Thebes 13 m. from Neapolis on the road to Scythopolis, probably the modern Ṭûbâs 10 m. N. of Nâblus. Map III, G 3. It is a large village in a fertile valley, with old cisterns, caves, and graves. C. S. T.

THELASSAR, thę-lê'sȧr. See TELASSAR.

THEOPHILUS, thę-ŏf'i-lŭs (Θεόφιλος): The name of the person to whom the Third Gospel (Lk 1 3) and the Book of Acts (Ac 1 1) are dedicated. The meaning of the name ('friend of God,' not 'lover of God,' which would be "Philotheus," Φιλόθεος) has led some to suppose that it was not that of a real individual, but of an ideal or typical convert to Christianity from among the educated classes of Gentiles. But the ground for this theory, as well as for others built upon the mere name (cf. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, p. 388), is not sufficient. The only certainty in the case is that Theophilus, whether an ideal or an actual personage, represents the intelligent, possibly literary, Gentile convert or student of Christianity. A. C. Z.

ANALYSIS OF CONTENTS

1. Situation Disclosed by I Thessalonians
2. Contents of I Thessalonians
3. Situation and Contents of II Thessalonians
4. Characteristics of the Epistles
5. Genuineness of the Epistles

On the occasion of his second missionary journey Paul, accompanied by Silas and (probably) Timothy, visited Thessalonica, a busy seaport at the head of the Thermaic Gulf, and there carried on active missionary work, at first among the Jewish, and afterward among the Gentile, inhabitants of the town (Ac 17 1 ff.; I Th 1 9, 2 14). The work, especially among the latter, was very successful, and the foundations were laid of a church soon to be widely known for its faith and active work (I Th 1 7 f.). Owing, however, to the determined hostility of a section of the population, the Apostle was obliged to leave Thessalonica just at the time when his young converts most needed his guidance, and, finding it impossible to revisit them in person (2 18), he despatched Timothy from Athens (3 1 f.), to assure them of his continued affection and to bring him a report of their state. The report which Timothy brought back to Paul, who had meanwhile gone on to Corinth (Ac 18 5), was evidently in the main highly satisfactory. At the same time, he had to tell the anxious Apostle of certain difficulties, both doctrinal and practical, which were besetting the Thessalonians' faith. And it was with the view of meeting these, and of giving expression to his heartfelt joy at the "glad tidings" he had just heard, that Paul despatched this First Epistle to the Thessalonians from Corinth. Its exact date will depend upon the view taken of the Pauline chronology (see PAUL), but it must be placed between 49 and 53 A.D.

1. Situation Disclosed by I Thessalonians.

Beginning with a greeting, which happily combines the new watchword of "grace" with the old Hebraic salutation of "peace" (1 1), the writers (for the manner in which Paul associates Silas and Timothy with himself not only in the opening greeting, but throughout both Epistles, is one of their characteristic features) give thanks for the spiritual state of the Thessalonians (1 2-10), and then proceed at once to refute certain calumnies which, as they have been informed, are in course of being circulated against themselves. Their apologia takes, naturally, the form of a historical narrative of their ministry at Thessalonica, and is marked by frequent appeals to the Thessalonians' own knowledge of what its character had been (2 1-12); while it gives also the Apostles the opportunity of emphasizing the Thessalonians' own ready acceptance of the word of God, and their consequent brave endurance under persecution (2 13-16). It is little wonder, therefore, they continue, that they are longing so exceedingly to see again those who are proving such a "crown of glorying," and to complete the good work that has been so happily begun (2 17–3 13).

2. Contents of I Thessalonians.

A second and more didactic part of the letter follows, in which the Apostles furnish fresh guidance for their converts in their Christian life, warning them in particular against the unchastity which was so marked a feature of Greek city life (4 1-8), and, while gladly recognizing their love of the brethren, summoning all to diligence in their own work, that so they may preserve an honorable spirit of independence and gain the respect of their heathen neighbors (4 9-12). From these more practical points the writers next turn aside to comfort those who are mourning the loss of friends with the assurance that, so far from these being shut out from Christ's glory at His Return, they will rather be the first to share in it (4 13-18). And then, the suddenness of that Return, of which the Thessalonians had already been so fully warned, is made the basis of an urgent appeal to watchfulness and sobriety (5 1-11). Certain exhortations follow, still addressed to the community as a whole, with reference to their attitude to their leaders and to their own more feeble brethren, along with some general rules of Christian living (5 12-24). And finally, the letter is brought to a close with a salutation and benediction (5 25-28).

We are nowhere told definitely the result of the First Epistle, but that it led to increased efforts on the Thessalonians' part is evident from the still stronger terms of praise employed in a second letter, which apparently followed the first after a very short interval (II Th 1 3-11). On the other hand, the writers are constrained to admit that the idleness and even disorder caused by the belief in the speedy return of Christ, and of which they had already had cause to complain, had by no means disappeared. On the contrary, this 'business which was no business' (3 11) would seem rather to have been fomented by certain spiritual utterances and sayings, and even a letter—all purporting to come from the Apostles, but for which they were in no way responsible (2 2). Let the Thessalonians see to it, they therefore urge, that they be not led astray, but rather remember that, sudden and unexpected though the actual coming of the Day of the Lord will be, it will nevertheless be preceded by certain clearly defined signs, and, above all, by the appearance of the "man of sin (or lawlessness)," the full and crowning manifestation of the power of evil already working in their midst. For the present, this manifestation is being held in check—apparently by the power of the Roman state—but how long this restraining power will last no one can tell (2 1-12). In any case, the Thessalonians' duty is clear—to stand firm and hold fast the traditions they have already been taught, in humble dependence upon the power of God (2 13-17). To the same God let them also pray on the Apostles' behalf (3 1-5). And, meanwhile, in conformity with the Apostles' own example, let them go about their daily work and duty in quietness, shunning all disorderly brethren, and at all times and in all ways seeking that peace which is the peculiar property of the Lord of peace (3 6-16). Finally, the letter is confirmed by an autographic salutation and benediction in Paul's own handwriting (3 17 f.).

From the foregoing survey it has already been made clear (1) that the Thessalonian Epistles are in no sense literary documents, still less dogmatic treatises, but genuine letters, written to meet pressing needs, and with no thought of any wider audience than that to which they were in the first instance addressed. Of all the Pauline Epistles which have come down to us, they represent perhaps most fully the Apostle's 'normal' style in his more familiar intercourse with his friends, and which in its vivid, living character has been well described as a "stenographed conversation" (Rénan). Greatly, however, as this contributes to the personal charm and interest of the letters, it adds materially to their difficulty. For they so abound in allusions to what the Thessalonians already knew, and perhaps have themselves been saying in letters on their own part to the Apostle (cf. Rendel Harris in The Expositor, vol. viii, 1898, pp. 161 ff.), that it is hardly too much to say that the more familiar the subjects with which they deal were to the Thessalonians the more veiled they are from us. (2) It is a great mistake, however, to suppose that, because these Epistles are thus 'occasional' writings, in the strict sense of the word, they are marked by that poverty of doctrinal subject sometimes urged against them (e.g., by Baur). On the contrary, if the more distinctive Pauline doctrines are wanting because the occasion for them had not yet arisen, all the essential elements of Christian truth are presented, and that in such a way as to afford the best evidence we have (along with the speeches in Ac) of the character of Paul's direct missionary teaching. It is impossible here to draw out this teaching at length, but, as we learn from I Th 1 9 f., it revolved around two main points: (a) The proclamation of the one living and true God, as distinguished from the vain idols of heathendom, and (b) the expectation of the glorious Parousia of His Son, the Lord Jesus, from heaven. So prominent, indeed, is this latter truth in both Epistles that there is a sense in which their main teaching may be fairly described "not as the gospel of the Cross of Christ, but of the coming of Christ" (Jowett). (3) Apart, moreover, from their deeper aspects, the Thessalonian Epistles must always have a special interest from the light they throw upon both their writers and their readers. Nowhere does the real Paul stand out more clearly before us, alike in the intensity of his affection for his converts, in the confident assertion of the purity of his own motives, and in the fierceness of his indignation against those who are hindering the progress of Christ's work. Very noteworthy, too, is the tact which the Apostle displays, praising with the utmost generosity where praise is due, but only as a means to continued progress. When, too, he sees cause for blame, he is not afraid to say so, and this with all the authority belonging to a fully accredited Apostle of Christ. At the same time, as regards the Thessalonians, it is of interest to notice that this is the fullest picture we possess of a young Christian community in all the freshness of its first love, not yet wholly separated, it is true, even from the more glaring pagan vices, but possessed of a faith and a love and a hope which have already borne practical fruits in the Thessalonians' own lives, and made them the honored means of commending the truth to others.

4. Characteristics of the Epistles.

We have hitherto been assuming the authenticity of our Epistles, and it will be admitted that, if the view taken of their general circumstances and contents is correct, these fall in so admirably with the traditional belief in their Pauline authorship as in themselves to constitute a strong argument in their favor. In the case of the First Epistle, its authenticity, which no one even thought of challenging before the 19th cent., is now so generally recognized by critics of all schools, except those who reject the Pauline writings altogether, that it is not necessary to discuss it further here. The same can not be said, however, of the Second Epistle. Though the external evidence in its favor is even stronger than in the case of I Th, it has, more particularly in recent years, been seriously objected to on internal grounds. The attack has, as a rule, followed three main lines, but in no case do the difficulties raised seem to be insuperable. (1) As regards language: apart from a by no means large list of words peculiar to the Epistle among N T writings, and a few deviations from ordinary Pauline practise in the use of particular words and phrases, its general phraseology and style leave upon the mind of any unbiased reader the impression of a genuinely Pauline work. (2) As a matter of fact, it is the amount of resemblance to

5. Genuineness of the Epistles.

I Th that proves the second and more serious objection to the authenticity of our Epistle. This resemblance is certainly very striking, and when combined with certain other peculiarities which the Epistle displays, lends a prima facie support to the idea that we have here the work of a late imitator, or even forger, who, in order to gain credence for certain views, encased them in a framework drawn from a genuine Pauline Epistle. On the other hand, it may be fairly urged that the general resemblance of circumstances under which the two Epistles were written would naturally lead to a general resemblance of language. Nor must it be forgotten that the actual parallelisms frequently occur in such different connections as to suggest, not so much the slavish copying by one man of another, as rather the free handling by the same writer of certain familiar words and phrases. (3) So marked indeed is this independence in the sphere of the doctrinal contents of the Epistle, that it, in its turn, has been made an objection to the Pauline authorship, but again, we think, without good reason. For, while there is nothing in the teaching regarding the Parousia in I Th to exclude the prior coming of the "man of lawlessness," which is the distinctive message of II Th, there is equally nothing in this coming as depicted in II Th to delay unduly the expected parousia of I Th. All that is said is that Christ will not come just yet. Nor does the fact that Paul does not again recur in his extant Epistles to the signs preceding the end afford sufficient ground for maintaining that he can never have shared what we know to have been a widely spread belief of his time (see ANTICHRIST). On the whole, then, without any desire to minimize the undoubted difficulties surrounding this remarkable Epistle, they can hardly be said to be sufficient to overthrow the belief in its genuineness, especially in the absence of any other adequate explanation of its origin, and the place it has so long enjoyed in the esteem of the Church.

LITERATURE: The fullest commentary on the Thessalonian Epistles is that of Bornemann in the Meyer Kommentar (1894). It has never been translated. There are commentaries in English by Ellicott, Eadie, Lightfoot (Notes on the Epp. pp. 1–136), and Findlay (Camb. Gk. Test.). For a fuller statement of the foregoing positions the writer may be permitted to refer to his own commentary (1908).

THESSALONICA, thes″a-lo-nai′ca (Θεσσαλονική): A city of Macedonia, the modern Salonici. Its original name was Thermæ, but when it was rebuilt by Cassander (315 B.C.), it was renamed after his wife, Thessalonica, the sister of Alexander the Great. It was strongly fortified, and, situated as it was on the Thermaic Gulf, it soon became the most important harbor of Macedonia, being in Roman times the capital of the second of the four divisions of the province and the residence of a Roman governor and questor. It was made a Roman colony about 250 B.C., and played a great rôle as a frontier town. After 148 B.C. it became the midway commercial and military station on the Via Egnatia, connecting Dyrrhachium and Byzantium, which still traverses the city. Its most flourishing period was before the rise of Constantinople. The presence of a Jewish community in the city led to the founding of a Christian church by Paul on his second missionary journey (Ac 17 1-9), which, in spite of persecution, soon grew into one of the Apostle's important European churches (I Th 1 4-8). Its present population is about 120,000, made up of Jews, Turks, Greeks, Slavs, and Franks.

THEUDAS, thiū′das (Θευδᾶς, a contract form of Θεοδᾶς [Θεόδωρος]): A Jewish revolutionist in the reign of Augustus who instigated a political uprising in Palestine that came to an inglorious end (Ac 5 36). In the Ac narrative, the time of his activity is fixed prior to the insurrection under Judas, the Galilean, which took place in the days of the taxing (i.e., in 6 B.C., or 6 A.D., under Quirinius, q.v.). No other reference is made to T. in the N T, but, according to Josephus (Ant. XX, 5 1), an insurrection under the leadership of one Theudas took place while Fadus was procurator (i.e., between 44 and 46 A.D.). That both Luke and Josephus refer to the same event is evident from the similar language used of the person in question (cf. λέγων εἶναί τινα ἑαυτόν, Ac 5 36, with ἔλεγεν εἶναι προφήτης, Ant. XX, 5 1). Josephus is not likely to have made a mistake of many years with reference to events happening within his own lifetime and in his own country. On the other hand, the general accuracy of Luke's history does not require that he be exact with reference to every detail, particularly a detail so incidental as the one in question (cf. Schmiedel, EB, art. Theudas; also Zahn, *Einl.*², II, 418 f.).

THOMAS (Θωμᾶς; Aram. t'uma'; cf. the Phœnician תאם, CISem. I, No. 46): The name of one of Jesus' disciples. This is the only name given to him in the Synoptics (Mt 10 3; Mk 3 18; Lk 6 15; cf. Ac 1 13). But in Jn the interpretation "Didymus," 'twin' (cf. Heb. tō'ām, 'twin,' Gn 38 27), as well as the name, is given (Jn 11 16, 20 24, 21 2). Throughout this Gospel T. plays a more important rôle than in the Synoptics. He always appears as a doubter, which may account for the reading δίψυχος, 'double-minded,' instead of δίδυμος, in some of the versions. In Jn 14 22, Syr. Sin. reads "Thoma" instead of "Juda," showing that at an early date Thomas was identified with "Judas of James," but not in Ac 1 13, Lk 6 16, where both names occur. The same identification was made in the Syriac source from which Eusebius translated the story of King Abgar and Thaddæus (Ἰούδας ὁ καὶ Θωμᾶς), also in the Acts of Thomas (ed. Lipsius-Bonnet, II, 2, p. 100, Ἰούδας Θωμᾶς).

THORNS AND THISTLES: Symbolically, thorns or thistles, or both, are often used to denote the judgment of God on Israel—the fact that the uncultivated land bore only such worthless shrubs symbolizing the extremity of distress and desolation (cf. Is 7 23-25; Hos 9 6, 10 8, etc.). On the species and varieties designated by these terms, see PALESTINE, § 21. The dried thorn-bushes often served as fuel (Ps 58 9; Ec 7 6). Hedges of thorn seem to have been very common (Pr 15 19; Hos 2 6; Mic 7 4). The thorn also easily served as a cruel instrument of punishment (Jg 8 7, 16; Mk 15 17; Jn 19 2 ff.). On II Ch 33 11 (AV) cf. RV. See also Hooks.

E. E. N.

THOUSAND: In the O T this term signifies a political unit of ancient Israel. It is the translation of 'eleph, which is often the equivalent of mishpāhāh, 'clan.' After the Israelites had settled in cities and villages, and clan- if not tribe-distinctions could not be easily maintained, more or less arbitrary subdivisions were made of the tribe (cf. Ex 18 21, 25; Nu 1 16 "families" RVmg.; Jos 22 14, 21, 30; I S 10 19, 23 23 "families" RVmg.; Jg 6 15, "family," "thousand" RVmg.). Of these the 'eleph, 'thousand' or 'family,' was the largest, and was ideally a company of 1,000 united under one head (ṣar). The 'clan,' a subdivision of a tribe, and made up of bēth-'ābhōth, 'fathers' houses,' was of no definite numerical size, and accordingly, it is probable that the 'eleph only rarely, if ever, numbered 1,000, and was usually a much smaller number. The 'eleph is also used similarly as a military term (Nu 10 4, 31 5, 14, 48; I S 8 12, 17 18, 18 13; II S 18 1; II K 1 9, 11 4, etc.).

THRONE: The Heb. kiṣṣē', 'seat' (Aram. korṣe'), is used of an ordinary seat (Jg 3 20; I S 1 9, etc.), but frequently of the royal chair of state, when it is rendered "throne." In many cases the expression is to be taken literally, the actual seat or chair being intended and no more (I K 2 12, 19, etc.; cf. especially Solomon's magnificent throne, I K 10 18); but generally, it is not merely the throne itself, but what it symbolized—the royal authority, dominion, power (Gn 41 40; I K 1 37, etc.). The supreme authority and sway of God are also often succinctly expressed by speaking of His "throne." In the vision of Micaiah (I K 22 19) and of Isaiah (Is 6 1) J" was seen sitting on His heavenly throne surrounded by His attendant ministers. In the religio-political sense the "throne of David" came to signify the union of the two ideas—God's supremacy over all kingdoms of the earth, and the Davidic throne as the one kingdom in which God's supremacy was actually illustrated or embodied (Is 9 7). The "throne of David" was thus an ideal expression which came to mean much to the prophets and psalmists.

In the N T these O T conceptions are found reproduced. Jesus the Messiah is the true Davidic king, and His "throne," i.e., His power, etc.—sometimes His seat at the right hand of the Father—is the realized ideal of the Davidic throne of the O T (Mt 19 28; Lk 1 32; Ac 2 30; He 1 8, 8 1, 12 2; Rev, often). Naturally, at times in the N T the throne of God alone is often spoken of with no reference to the Messiah (Mt 5 34, 23 22, etc.). In Ac 12 21 the Gr. is βῆμα, 'judgment-seat,' rather than 'throne.'

THUMMIM, thum'im. See Urim and Thummim.

THUNDER: Thunder (ra'am; Gr. βροντή) is a frequent phenomenon in Palestine during the winter rainy season, but never occurs in summer (I S 12 17). By the primitive Hebrews, as by all other Semites, the thunder-storm and everything connected with it were worshiped as Divine (see Semitic Religion, §§ 9, 31). Among the later Hebrews the thunder-cloud became the cherub or chariot on which J" rode (see Cherub); the lightnings, the seraphim, or 'fiery serpents,' that attended Him (see Seraphim) or the arrows that He shot out of His bow; and the thunder was His "voice" (Job 37 4; Ps 18 13 [14]; Ps 29, 104 7; Am 1 2; Is 30 30 f.; Ac 10 13). Hence qōl, 'voice,' is frequently used as a synonym of 'thunder' (Ex 9 23-34, 19 16, 20 13; I S 7 10, 12 17 f.; Job 28 26, 38 25), and in such cases is regularly translated "thunder." As the 'voice of Yāhweh' the thunder served to discomfit His enemies (I S 7 10; Ps 77 18, 81 7; Sir 46 17), or as a sign to His people (Ex 19 16, 20 18; I S 12 17 f.; Jn 12 28 f.).

THYATIRA, thai"a-tai'ra (Θυάτειρα): A city of Lydia, NW. of Sardis, on the river Lycus, a tributary of the Hyllus, the modern Akhissar. Teira probably means 'the town,' Thyateira, 'the town of Thya.' Its original name was Pelopia (and Semiramis). In the 3d cent. B.C. a Macedonian colony was settled at Pelopia by the Seleucid kings, and named Thyatira. This soon became an important place because of its numerous industries. It was most famous for its dyed garments (see Laodicea), called "purple" (Turkey red, cardinal red), of which goods the Lydia mentioned in Ac 16 14 was a seller. Many other industries flourished at Thyatira, each gild being governed by a president, called ἐπιστάτης (the gild of bronze-smiths is doubtless referred to in Rev 2 18, "and his feet are like bright bronze"). A strong Jewish colony existed at Thyatira, and here, as elsewhere (Ac 13 6, 19 13), they were given over to superstitious and magical rites, a mixture of Judaism and paganism, stigmatized by the Apostle as "fornication" (Rev 2 20 f.), "adultery" (ver. 22), "the deep things of Satan" (ver. 24). But the presence of this Jewish colony made possible the establishment of a Christian community at an early period. At present, T. has 12,000 inhabitants, half being Greeks and Armenians, some Jews. It is nestled amid luxuriant gardens, but is malarious in summer owing to a large marsh. The city still produces dyestuffs and excellent cotton. It possesses considerable ruins.

TIBERIAS, tai-bî'ri-as (Τιβεριάς): A city on the W shore of the Sea of Galilee, founded by Herod Antipas about 20 A.D., and named in honor of the reigning emperor (see Tiberius). It became the capital of Galilee and gave its name to the lake (cf. Jn 6 1, 21 1); but was avoided by the better class of Jews on account of its foreign and disreputable population, and also because the new city had been built over the ancient cemetery of Hammath (q.v.). It is mentioned in the N T only once (Jn 6 23).

After the fall of Jerusalem, however, T. became the seat of the Sanhedrin and the chief center of Jewish learning. Here were published the Mishna, the Palestinian Talmud, and the "Western" pointing of the Hebrew Scriptures, which is now universally employed.

The modern Ṭabarîyeh is a town of about 4,000 inhabitants, mostly Jews, and is noted as the most filthy and unhealthful place in all Palestine.

TIBERIUS, tai-bî'ri-us (Τιβέριος): The "Cæsar" of the Gospels (exc. Lk 2 1, which refers to Augustus), though mentioned by name only in Lk 3 1. T. was entrusted by his step-father Augustus with the military government of the provinces in 12 A.D. and at his death in 14 A.D. succeeded him as emperor of Rome. He possessed much military skill and administrative ability, so that his reign of twenty-three years was beneficial to the empire as a whole; but within the circle of his personal acquaintance he was a suspicious, ruthless, and unprincipled tyrant, the last decade of whose life was spent in unspeakable debauchery upon the Island of Capri. The city of Tiberias (q.v.) was named in his honor. For a discussion of the date indicated in Lk 3 1, see Plummer, Int. Crit. Com., ad loc.; also CHRONOLOGY. L. G. L.

TIBHATH, tib'hath. See TEBAH.

TIBNI, tib'nai (תִּבְנִי, tibhnī): Son of Ginath (I K 16 21 f.) and rival of Omri in the contest for the throne of N. Israel. The struggle was probably longer and more severe than the brief notice in I K indicates (cf. the LXX. text). Tibni's death, apparently a natural one, closed the conflict. E. E. N.

TIDAL, tai'dal (תִּדְעָל, tidh'āl): A king of "Goiim" (Gn 14 1, 9, "nations" RVmg.). He was one of the five kings who made war with the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah. Neither his name nor his people are elsewhere mentioned. C. S. T.

TIGLATH-PILESER, tig'lath-pi-lî'zẽr (תִּגְלַת פִּלְאֶסֶר, tiglath pil'eṣer = Assyr. tukulti-apalesharra, erroneously written "Tilgath-pilneser" [I Ch 5 6, 26; II Ch 28 20]), 'my support is son of Esharra,' i.e., the god Ninip: The name of several kings of Assyria. Tiglath-pileser III ruled Assyria 745–727 B.C., and is to be identified with the Pul of II K 15 19 (his name on the Babylonian Chronicle). He usurped the throne in 745 as Pulu, and doubtless assumed the name of the great Tiglath-pileser of the 12th cent. B.C. His first active operation in the 'Westland' began in 743 B.C. The cities of Arpad, Tyre, and Damascus at first paid him tribute, but later revolted. Arpad was besieged, but held out until 740 (Is 10 9, 36 19, 37 13). In 739 T. clashed with Azriyau of Jaudi—either a N. Syrian ruler, or Azariah (Uzziah) of Judah. He plundered Kullani, probably the Kalno of Isaiah (10 9; cf. Am 6 2). In 738 tribute was received, among others, from Menahem of Samaria (II K 15 19 ff.), Rezin of Damascus, Hiram of Tyre, and Panammu of Sam'al. Conditions in this coastland brought him back in 734, when he came to the help of Ahaz of Judah against Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Damascus. Rezin was defeated and took refuge in his capital, where he was besieged. T. raided the districts of Syria and N. Israel, E. and W of the Jordan (I Ch 5 26), carrying off large numbers of captives. Philistia, particularly Gaza, Ashdod, and Ekron, were conquered and plundered. Moab, Ammon, Edom, and the Arabians paid him tribute. Damascus fell before his besiegers in 732 B.C., and among his subjects assembled in court at that place we find Ahaz of Judah (II K 16 10 ff.). The collapse of the Syro-Israelitic combination was followed by the assassination of Pekah of Israel in 733 by Hoshea, which T. seems to have instigated, for he placed the murderer on the throne of Israel as a vassal king. In 727 T. died, having been the founder of the second dynasty of Assyria, and the establisher of a new policy of provincial rulership that began a new era for Assyria. I. M. P.

TIGRIS, tai'gris (חִדֶּקֶל, ḥiddeqel = Assyr. idiklat, diklat, Old Persian tigrā, Gr. Τίγρις): The twin stream of Babylonia with the Euphrates. It is designated the "Hiddekel" in a description of the streams of Paradise (Gn 2 14), and also once in Daniel (10 4). This stream rises a little S. of Harput, in close proximity to one of the sources of the Euphrates, flows southward to Diarbekr, nearly 150 m. distant, whence, after forming a junction with the eastern Tigris, a shorter stream, it flows through precipitous ravines and gorges, until it breaks out into the plains of Mesopotamia, N. of the site of old Nineveh. Thence, enlarged by its affluents, the Greater and Lesser Zab, and the Diyalah on the E. and a few small streams from the W., it rushes on to the Persian Gulf. Anciently, it emptied into the waters of the Gulf through its own mouth, but to-day it combines with the Euphrates and forms one great overflowing stream. On the upper E. bank of the Tigris, opposite the city of Mosul, stood old Nineveh. S of this were Resen and Calah, and, a little below the latter on the W bank, was the ancient Ashur, the modern Kalah Sherghat. The entire length of the river is about 1,150 m. Only the lower portions of the river are safe and that but for small, strong crafts. I. M. P.

TIKVAH, tik'vā (תִּקְוָה, tiqwāh), 'hope': 1. The father-in-law of Huldah, the prophetess (II K 22 14, called also Tokhath (Tikvath AV in II Ch 34 22). 2. The father of Jahzeiah (Ezr 10 15). E. E. N.

TILE, TILING: In Ezk 4 1 the word rendered 'tile' is lebhēnāh, 'brick,' i.e., a large soft clay brick on which Ezekiel could easily draw a plan of the city. Unbaked bricks were often used for such purposes and then, if permanency was desired, baked or burned in a kiln so as to render them almost imperishable. In Lk 5 19 the reference is to the clay roofing-tiles with which the roof was supposed by Luke to have been covered. The ‖ in Mk (2 4) gives a slightly divergent but not contradictory account, since the term ἐξορυξαντες ("broken it up" RV) may refer to the whole process of removing the roofing. E. E. N.

TILE-TREE. See PALESTINE, § 21.

TILGATH-PILNESER, til'gath-pil-nî'zẹr. See TIGLATH-PILESER.

TILON, tai'lọn (טִילֹן, thīlōn): The son of Shimon, a Judahite (I Ch 4 20). E. E. N.

TIMÆUS, tai-mî'us (Τιμαῖος): The father of Bartimæus (Mk 10 46). This word (perhaps a gloss) was evidently added in order to explain the name "Bartimæus" (q.v.) in the same verse. Both are omitted in Mt 20 29; Lk 18 35 J. M. T.

TIMBREL. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 3 (1).

TIME: Modes of measuring time in the Bible include: (1) a general and rather indefinite way of marking it, (2) the Hebrew (O T), and (3) the Roman (N T) systems.

The last of these appears only as it affects the divisions of the day into smaller periods. The hour, as the 24th part of the day (Jn 11 9), is not an exclusively Roman measure of time; but the method of reckoning the hours in the Fourth Gospel is that of the Romans, i.e., beginning to count them at midnight. Wherever hours are mentioned elsewhere, they conform to the Jewish method of computing, i.e., from morning to evening and from evening to morning (Mt 27 45; Mk 15 34; Lk 23 44; cf. Jn 19 14). In the O T no mention of hours is made (except in the Aramaic of Dn 3 6, 15, 4 19 AV, 33, 5 5). The night was more usually divided into watches. In early times the Hebrews reckoned three watches (cf. Jg 7 19; Ex 14 24; I S 11 11; La 2 19). In late times the Romans reckoned four (Mk 13 35), i.e.: (1) evening, (2) midnight, (3) cock-crowing, (4) morning. Cock-crowing as the third watch was between 12 and 3 A.M. The day as a twenty-four hour period began with sunset. The phrase "between the two evenings" (Ex 16 12, 29 39 AV, RVmg.) is probably the interval between sunset and the end of the twilight, or the complete setting in of the darkness. This is also called "the cool [Heb. 'wind'] of the day" (Gn 3 8), and is evidently distinguished from the "heat of the day" (Gn 18 1, etc.), which is midday.

1. The Day.

Next to the day as a division of time comes the week. Whether its basis was the lunar month or not, in historical time the phases of the moon do not appear to have had any connection with the seven-day period (cf. SABBATH). There was no attempt to make the month commence and end with the beginning of the week. In the N T, the week itself is called a Sabbath (σάββατα, Mt 28 1; Jn 20 1). The day before the seventh is the "preparation" (παρασκευή, Mt 27 62; Lk 23 54; Jn 19 31, 42; προσάββατον, Mk 15 42). The other days of the week are simply distinguished by ordinary numerals ("first day," etc.).

2. The Week.

In the earliest times, the division of the year into months was based upon the revolution of the sun. This is evinced by the four names which have survived of months of this period, namely, Abib, month of earing-corn (Ex 13 4); Zif (Ziv), month of flowers (I K 6 37); Ethanim, month of perennial streams (I K 8 2), and Bul, the rainy month (I K 6 38). Of these, the last two occur also in Phœnician and Cypriot inscriptions. All are evidently survivals of early Canaanitic usage. In the post-exilic period, the Assyro-Babylonian calendar seems to have been introduced with its ordinal numbers for the months of the year. In addition to these, proper names were given to the months, making up the following list:

3. The Month.

(1) Nisan, March-April (Nu 2 1; Est 3 7), the same as Abib.

(2) Iyyar, April–May (not mentioned in the Bible, but cf. Jos. Ant. VIII, 3 1), the same as Zif.

(3) Sivan, May–June (Est 8 9).

(4) Tammuz, June–July (in Ezk 8 14, but not as the name of the month).

(5) Ab, July–August (not named in the Bible, but cf. Jos. Ant. IV, 4 7).

(6) Elul, August–September (Neh 6 15).

(7) Tishri, September–October (not named in the Bible, but cf. Jos. Ant. 4 1), the same as Ethanim.

(8) Marchesvan, October–November (not named in the Bible), the same as Bul.

(9) Chislev, Chisleu AV, November–December (Zec 7 1; Neh 1 1).

(10) Tebeth, December-January (Est 2 16).

(11) Shebat, Sebat AV (Zec 1 7).

(12) Adar, February–March (Est 3 7; Ezr 6 15).

To maintain the relation of the lunar months to the solar year, it was necessary periodically to intercalate a thirteenth month, which was called Second Adar ('after Adar').

4. The Year.

The Hebrew year was solar; but according to P (Gn 7 11, 8 14), in the earliest ages it must have been lunar; for the duration of the Flood, given by tradition as 365 days, is made by this document to include one year and eleven days. The beginning of the year of the old Hebrew calendar before the Exile was reckoned with the autumn, a natural and convenient season, since the whole product of the fields and vineyards was gathered in; but after the Exile, the spring equinox was substituted, following the Babylonian custom, along with the adoption of the names of the months as above given. The practise of the earlier period, however, did not completely die out, but was continued in the observance of the religious festivals (Ezk 40 1; Lv 25 9; Nu 29 1). Thus arose the observance of two days marking the change of year—one in the spring, as the civil new-year's day (1st of Nisan), and one in the autumn, as the ecclesiastical new-year's day (10th of Tishri, later 1st of Tishri). The subdivision of the year into seasons did not go beyond the recognition of summer (qayitz) and winter (hōref, lit. 'harvest-time,' Ps 74 17; Zec 14 8). Barley-harvest is mentioned as a definite time in the year (Ru 1 22; II S 21 9), but varies for the different parts of the land. The same vagueness attaches to the terms earing, seed-time, sowing-time, and harvest (Ex 34 21; Gn 8 22; Lv 26 5), though they seem to be alluded to as clearly marked seasons.

Of larger periods, the Hebrews observed the Sabbatical period of seven years (Dt 15 1 ff.) and the Jubilee, or fifty-year period, of seven Sabbatical periods (Lv 25 10 ff.); but it does not appear that they made extensive use of these or of generations (as in Mt 1 17). Of eras, as fixed points of time, generally and uniformly used, there is no mention. Great and well-known events, however, like the Exodus (I K 6 1), the Babylonian Exile (Ezk 33 21, 40 1), the building of the Temple (I K 9 10), the earthquake (Am 1 1), were often used as fixed points for indicating the relative time of other events. For later Judaism (the Maccabæan age), the year 312 B.C., the beginning of the Seleucid era, became a starting-point and continued to be used until very late. An effort to begin a national Jewish era with the year of the accession of Simon the high priest (I Mac 14 27, 13 40) succeeded only for a short time. See also CHRONOLOGY.

TIMNAH, tim'nā, TIMNITE, tim'nait (תִּמְנָה, timnāh, Timnath AV), 'portion'?: 1. A place in the hill-country of Judah (Gn 38 12, 13, 14), where Judah pastured his sheep. It is mentioned (Jos 15 57) with cities lying S. of Hebron. 2. A town on the N. border of Judah, W of Beth-shemesh (Jos 15 10), called a city of Dan (Jos 19 43, Thimnathah AV). It was the home of Samson's wife and inhabited by Philistines (Jg 14 1, 2, 5, 15 6, Timnite), and, under Ahaz, retaken by them (II Ch 28 18). It is the modern Tibneh, W of 'Ain Shems (Beth-shemesh). Map II, D 1. C. S. T.

TIMNATH-SERAH, -sî'rā (תִּמְנַת סֶרַח, timnath serah; in Jg 2 9 written Timnath-heres): The inheritance of Joshua, in the border of which he was buried (Jos 19 50, 24 30). Jewish and Samaritan traditions locate Timnath-serah 9 m. SW of Shechem at Kefr Ḥâris, where there are three sacred places which seem to represent the tombs of Joshua, Caleb, and Nun. Ancient Christian tradition, however (followed by most modern scholars), identifies T. with Tibneh, a tell with many ruins, 10 m. NW of Bethel. Map III, E 4. In the hill (? Gaash) to the S. of Tibneh are remarkable rock-tombs, the largest of which Guérin (Samarie, ii, 84–104) believes to be the burial-place of Joshua. See SWP, II, 284, 374–378, with plans. L. G. TIMON, tai'mǫn (Τίμων): One of the "Seven" chosen to care for "the daily ministration" in the early Church (Ac 6 5). Nothing further is known of him. E. E. N.

TIMOTHY, tim'o-thi (Τιμόθεος), 'honored of God,' Timotheus AV (at times): Paul's beloved disciple and efficient fellow worker, the son of a Greek father and a Jewish mother (Eunice), was born apparently in Lystra, where he was converted on the Apostle's first missionary journey (Ac 16 1; I Co 4 15-17). On the second journey, Paul took Timothy by Divine direction to be his companion in the work of the gospel (I Ti 1 18; II Ti 1 6), and, in order to avoid unnecessary antagonism on the part of the Jews, had him circumcised (Ac 16 1-3). He was left in Berœa with Silas when Paul went to Athens; after joining the Apostle there, he was sent back to establish the church of Thessalonica (I Th 3 1-6); was found with Paul in Corinth (II Co 1 19) and in Ephesus (Ac 19 22); and was employed to compose the distressing troubles of the Corinthian Church, but seems to have been unequal to the task (I Co 4 17, 16 10 f.; II Co 7 6, 12 18). He was associated with the Apostle in writing II Co, and was with him again in Corinth (Ro 16 21) and in Troas (Ac 20 4 f.). During Paul's Roman captivity, Timothy still served him "in the furtherance of the gospel, as a child serves a father" (Ph 2 19-24). His later work seems to have been chiefly in Ephesus and its neighborhood (see TIMOTHY, FIRST AND SECOND EPISTLES TO, § 3 f.), though the author of Hebrews, apparently a friend, gives us our last glimpse of him, as he informs his readers that Timothy has just been set at liberty (He 13 23). R. A. F.

TIMOTHY, FIRST AND SECOND EPISTLES TO: The NT writings which, together with the Epistle to Titus, are usually called the Pastoral Epistles. Unlike Paul's other Epistles, except Philemon, they are addressed to private persons, and, unlike Philemon, they are concerned with the life of churches.

1. Analysis. The contents of the first Epistle may be analyzed as follows:

- Greeting (1 1, 2).
- False teaching and the gospel, ch. 1.
  - Characteristics of false teaching (1 3-11).
  - The gospel which saved Paul, the greatest of sinners, the only source of power (1 12-17).
  - This gospel solemnly committed to Timothy (1 18-20).
- The Church, the household of God, a bulwark against error, chs. 2, 3.
  - Public prayer to be made for all men to God, who wills the salvation of all (2 1-7).
  - The conduct of men and women in public worship (2 8-15).
  - The character and moral qualifications required of those who hold office in the Church, which supports the truth in the world (3 1-16).
- Particular advice to Timothy, chs. 4, 5, 6.
  - As against the errorists (4 1-5), he is to manifest personal godliness and zeal in his ministry (4 6-16).
  - He must regulate the discipline of the Church in regard to old and young, widows, elders, and slaves (5 1-6 2).
  - Miscellaneous exhortations: (a) against errorists, (b) on right use of wealth, (c) against false knowledge (6 3-21).

The contents of the second Epistle may be analyzed as follows:

- Greeting (1 1, 2).
- A personal appeal for loyalty to the gospel (1 3-2 13).
  - Thanksgiving for Timothy's past, and exhortation that he may be zealous and willing, like Paul, to suffer for the gospel of power (1 3-14).
  - Deserters and loyal friends (1 15-18).
  - Renewed appeal to transmit to others the gospel of the risen Christ, even if at the cost of suffering (2 1-13).
- The minister of God and false teachers (2 14-4 5).
  - He must shun profane babblings, which destroy the Church's life (2 14-18); for the holy Church of God can not be overthrown, but is served by the pure (2 19-21).
  - In the coming days of error, he must abide by the gospel revealed in the Scriptures and taught by Paul (2 22-3 17).
  - Charge by the missionary emeritus to Timothy to fulfil his ministry (4 1-8).
- Requests and personal details (4 9-22).

As regards the occasion of the first letter, it is evidently directed against an injurious type of teaching which had invaded the churches in Ephesus and its neighborhood, over which Timothy seems to have held a temporary charge. While concerned primarily with his responsibilities, it was doubtless also meant to uphold his authority among these churches. The burden of its thought is that the pure Apostolic gospel, embodied in the healthy moral life of a well-organized Christian church, is the truth to save the world. Timothy was, therefore, enjoined to see that men of the highest character were appointed as elders and deacons to rule the household of God, and that every grade of service in the Church was worthy of the gospel. Disputation was to be avoided, false teachers were to be silenced, and error was to be devitalized by the purification of the moral atmosphere of the Church.

2. Purpose.

The second letter is more personal than the first. The race of the Apostle had been run. He was a prisoner in Rome, and, lest his son in the faith should not arrive before his death, he wrote this letter solemnly exhorting him to be faithful in the work of the gospel. A masterful personality never can, without deep anxiety, entrust to others the work into which he has poured his own life. In this case, however, Paul felt the need of making the fullest testimony to the power of his gospel, because he was aware that Timothy was faced, not only by false teachers, but by the certainty of being called to suffer for the gospel; and, knowing his disposition, he feared lest his courage and faith should waver.

It is impossible to fit these Epistles, in their present form, into the life of Paul as it is recorded in Acts. Not only are the movements of his assistants, as given in II Ti 4 9-21, inexplicable, but the condition of these churches involves an interval between the Pastorals and the Epistles of the first imprisonment. The first was written probably from Macedonia, the second, from prison. If they came from the Apostle's hand as they are, a place must be found for them after the close of Ac. But the question of Paul's second imprisonment is independent of that of their authenticity. Harnack, who denies the authenticity, believes that the second imprisonment is an assured fact. Notwithstanding Ac 20 25, 38, it is a reasonable inference from Ac 28 30 f. that Paul was not martyred at that time. From Ph 1 25, 2 24; Phm ver. 22, we see that the Apostle expected to be acquitted on his appeal to Cæsar, and the Pastoral Epistles themselves, even if they are not genuine, seem to involve such a tradition. Further, the words of Clement of Rome, that Paul was martyred after "having taught the whole world righteousness, and having gone to the boundary of the West, and having borne witness before rulers" (5 5-7), are most naturally interpreted as meaning that the Apostle, in fulfilment of his wish (Ro 15 23 f.), visited Spain. This is stated in the Muratorian Fragment (c. 200), is assumed in the apocryphal Acts of Peter (160–170 A.D.), and is affirmed by Eusebius (HE, ii, 22 2), relying on tradition.

3. The Historic Situation.

Allowing for differences in locality, the error described in each of the Pastoral Epistles seems to be of the same kind. Vague it may be as a whole, but certain features are clear. The false teachers, by using the freedom of public exhortation and by private intercourse, are spreading errors that eat like a cancer into the healthy life of the Church (II Ti 2 17, 3 5 f.), and are only a premonition of worse evils to follow (I Ti 4 1; II Ti 3 1). They claim to be teachers of the Law (I Ti 1 7), but prate of Jewish fables and genealogies (I Ti 1 4; Tit 1 14, 3 9), and stir up strife with meaningless words, fit only for credulous old women (I Ti 4 7, 6 4). Conscienceless, frivolous, irreligious, mercenary, and spurning authority (I Ti 1 19, 4 2; II Ti 2 16, 3 2-5), they are also sensual, though they preach an unnatural asceticism based on false ideas of the relation between the spiritual and the material (I Ti 4 1-5; Tit 1 10-16); while some claim that the Resurrection is already past (II Ti 2 18), meaning probably the rising into new life at baptism (see HYMENÆUS). This revolt from the pure gospel and Apostolic authority was led by avaricious men within the Church, who were introducing current non-Christian ideas. The error reveals affinities with the Colossian heresy, but has also quite different phases. It was evidently for the most part Jewish, and the materials for such teaching were to be found in the dispersion, though probably no one type is known which corresponded precisely with every detail. In these Epistles rabbinical speculation, combined with magical tendencies, falsely ascetic and practically immoral, is the main type of error. These errorists probably grafted legendary and puerile tales, like the Jewish haggadoth ("fables"), upon the narratives of Scripture and diverted their hearers from the realities of the gospel and a godly life. See JUBILEES, BOOK OF, and FABLES.

4. The False Teachers.

Paul always kept the churches of his own founding under his supervision, but delegated his assistants to extend his work, and in his name to secure permanent results by organization and discipline. Timothy and Titus were his representatives, commissioned, it would seem, with the temporary charge of directing the older churches near Ephesus and the younger communities of Crete into self-government under men of character, and of establishing them by wholesome instruction in the truths of the gospel. These Apostolic deputies did not create any new office, but were to see that leaders of sound doctrine and piety were chosen for the positions of elder and deacon. In the Pastoral Epistles the elder and the bishop are to be identified (I Ti 3 1-7, 5 17-19; Tit 1 5-7), the term "elder" denoting the office, while the term "bishop" indicates the function of the elder who has oversight of the congregation. The second order—deacons, who performed subordinate services—is mentioned only in I Ti. If there were not deaconesses (I Ti 3 11), there was at least in Ephesus a ministry of women.

5. Organization.

It can not be said that the difficulties attending the origin of the Epistles to Timothy and Titus have yet been satisfactorily solved. The chief objections urged against the Pauline authorship are the following: (1) The false teachers are thought to be Gnostics of the 2d cent. Undoubtedly, some of the descriptions might apply to their speculations, but scholars do not unanimously connect them with any one Gnostic school, and, as we have seen, there were types of Jewish life within the Apostolic Age which were closely akin to the various features of the false doctrine of these Epistles. (2) The ecclesiastical tone is said to reflect the 2d cent. It is held that the earlier freedom of the Spirit is yielding to an episcopal succession for the protection of the faith as a deposit of doctrine (I Ti 6 20; II Ti 1 6, 13 f., 3 14 ff.), that the sacraments are being invested with magical efficacy (Tit 3 5), that there are liturgical and confessional developments (I Ti 3 16, 6 12 f.; II Ti 2 8), and that a higher standard of morality is being demanded of the clergy (I Ti 3 1 ff.; Tit 1 5 ff.). But, as we have already seen, there is nothing either of the diocesan or the monarchical bishop in the functions of Timothy and Titus. Stress is laid on the character of the official rather than on his office, and the organization is similar to that in Ph 1 1; Ac 14 23, 20 28. It is true that the charismatic ministry is passing away, but even in the earliest Epistle of Paul there is evidence that he desired his churches to be organized under the moral leadership of office-bearers whose functions are not unlike those of the elder (I Th 5 11-15). The interpretation of the words "husband of one wife" (I Ti 3 2) is difficult. Their most obvious sense may be the real meaning, i.e., the bishops of the Church must live a married life that is above reproach. But if their meaning be that the bishop who has lost his wife must remain unmarried, they do not involve much advance upon I Co 7 8. On inscriptions of the Augustan Age the word virginius is found applied to a man who had been married but once. The advice in I Ti 5 14 also is in accord with I Co 7 39 f., and is quite contrary to the views of the Church in the 2d cent. There are not two standards of morality; indeed, an adverse critic admits that in these Epistles "there still blows a fresh breeze from the Gospels." Nor is the doctrine of the Church and the Sacraments more fully developed than in Eph 4 4-16, 5 14, 23-27. (3) Far more serious is the objection that the doctrine of these Epistles is post-Pauline. It is said that the old intensity has disappeared; that Paul's distinctive doctrine of the mystical union with Christ, of righteousness by faith alone, of the removal of the curse of sin by the Cross, and of the Parousia, is being replaced by emphasis on works, "piety" (I Ti 5 4), and the necessity of "healthy doctrine" (I Ti 1 10); that "faith is changed to orthodoxy" and becomes one virtue among others. But this is an overstatement; for even by comparison with the Epistles of the Judaistic controversy, which are often unjustifiably assumed to contain the sum of original Pauline thought, the Pastorals show much that is indubitably Pauline (cf. I Ti 1 12-16, 2 7; II Ti 1 8-12, 2 8-13; Tit 2 11-14, 3 1-7); while Ephesians and Philippians afford parallels with many of the alleged un-Pauline ideas of the Pastorals (Eph 2 9 f., 16-18, 5 25-27; Ph 2 12 f., 4 8 f.). (4) The language and style present the gravest difficulties. Some of Paul's most distinctive words and particles are absent, and a number of new words involving a change of idea occur, while the energy, sustained periods, and broken construction of the earlier Epistles have given way to a more regular style and stereotyped expressions. The undoubted Pauline coloring of sections of these Epistles has led some scholars to believe that they can discover fragments of the Apostle's letters embedded in them (see McGiffert, Apost. Age, pp. 405–414); but the difficulty of conceiving the process by which, out of a vast correspondence, such fragments were preserved and wrought into our Epistles, as well as their homogeneity, invalidates such partition theories. Nor can interpolation be more than a very partial solution. The most reasonable conclusion is that these Epistles represent the mind of Paul, but the change of emphasis in doctrine and the peculiarities of the language constitute a problem not yet solved. Possibly Luke, who was with the Apostle (II Ti 4 11), and whose language and thought in Ac afford striking parallels, had a hand in their shaping.

6. Authenticity.

The external evidence for I and II Timothy and Titus is by no means weak, quotations from them being found very probably in Ignatius and Polycarp, perhaps also in Clement of Rome. Indeed, they are better attested in the Apostolic Fathers than are I and II Th, Gal, or Ph.

TINKLING ORNAMENTS. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § II, 2.

TIPHSAH, tif'sā (תִּפְסַח, tiphṣaḥ), 'ford': 1. A city on the W. bank of the Euphrates and on the extreme NE. boundary of Solomon's kingdom (I K 4 24 [5 4]). It is commonly identified with Thapsacus on the Euphrates, above the mouth of the Belik. It was the most important crossing-place of the Middle Euphrates, and was the head of navigation on the river, being on one of the great commercial routes from E. to W. 2. A town near Tirzah in the Northern Kingdom, destroyed by Menahem, after he had killed Shallum (II K 15 16). No place corresponding to this name has been found. Thenius suggests that it was a copyist's mistake for Tappuah (q.v.) on the border between Ephraim and Manasseh.

C. S. T.

TIRAS, tai'ras (תִּירָס, tīrāṣ): A 'son' of Japhet (Gn 10 2). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

E. E. N.

TIRATHITES, tai'rath-aits (הַתִּרְעָתִים, tir'āthīm): A family of "scribes" (i.e., learned men) living at Jabez (somewhere in Judah). The notice (I Ch 2 55) is obscure, but probably reflects post-exilic conditions. E. E. N.

TIRE. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8.

TIRHAKAH, tẹr-hê'kā or tẹr'ha-kā (תִּרְהָקָה [= Egyptn. Tahruḳ], tirhāqāh): An Ethiopian prince, son of Piankhi, who was one of the great monarchs of the Nubian kingdom, with its capital at Napata. Many sculptures, including one executed by Esarhaddon at Senjirli, represent him with unmistakable negroid features. While he was acting in the Delta as regent for Shabaka, the Ethiopian king, he led forth the Egyptian army to check the advance of Sennacherib in 701 B.C. (II K 19 9; Is 37 9. In these passages the title "king" is an anachronism). The two armies met at Altaqu, and Tirhakah was defeated. His regency probably continued under Shabataka, the successor of Shabaka, until 691 B.C., when he ascended the throne of Egypt as the third monarch of the 25th dynasty. Twice he met the Assyrian invaders under Esarhaddon; in the first engagement he was successful (673); in the second (670), he was completely routed and driven from Memphis, which he never recovered. After this defeat, Esarhaddon had scarcely withdrawn when the petty kings of the Delta began to plot the restoration of Tirhakah. On the march to restore order the Assyrian monarch died, but Asshurbanipal, his son, led his forces as far south as Thebes, from which he expelled Tirhakah (668). The latter maintained himself in Upper Egypt until his death, in 663. He erected minor buildings at Tanis, Memphis, and Thebes. J. A. K.

TIRHANAH, tẹr-hê'nā or tẹr'ha-nā (תִּרְחָנָה, tirḥānāh): A Calebite family (I Ch 2 48). E. E. N.

TIRIA, tir'i-a (תִּירְיָא, tīryā'): A son of Jehallelel, a Judahite (I Ch 4 16). E. E. N.

TIRSHATHA, tẹr-shê'tha (הַתִּרְשָׁתָא, hattirshāthā', always with the art.; a Persian loan-word = 'his honor,' 'his excellency'): The title occurs in its foreign form in Ezr 2 63; Neh 7 65, 70, 10 1 AV, but is rendered in these passages "the governor" by AVmg. and RV. The conjecture that it was attached to a specific office is not sufficiently supported. It was probably an honorific given to a special royal agent, who had a task to perform and whose official life closed with the performance of that task. In Neh 7 65 it is given to Sheshbazzar. A. C. Z.

TIRZAH, tẹr'zā (תִּרְצָה, tirtsāh), 'pleasure': I. A town of Mt. Ephraim, captured by Joshua (Jos 12 24), and subsequently the capital of the kings of Israel from Jeroboam to Omri (I K 14 17, 15 21, 33, 16 6, 8, 9, 15, 17, 23), and the basis of Menahem's revolt (II K 15 14, 16). Robinson, Van de Velde, and G. A. Smith identify with Tallûzâ, a little N. of Mt. Ebal; Conder, with Teyâṣîr, 11 m. N. of Shechem; and Buhl, with eṭ-Ṭîreh. II. A "daughter" of Zelophehad, one of the clans of Manasseh (Nu 26 33, 27 1; Jos 17 3, all from P), perhaps the same as I. L. B. P.

TISHBITE, tish'bait (הַתִּשְׁבִּי, tishbī): Elijah is called "the Tishbite, who was of the sojourners of Gilead" (I K 17 1). The place which gave rise to this name has been identified, with some probability, with the modern el-Ishtib (also called Mar Elias), a little to the W. of Mahanaim. E. E. N.

TITHE: The rendering of the Heb. ma'ăsēr and the Gr. δεκάτη, "the tenth." That there was a very ancient practise of offering a tenth of one's gain to the sanctuary appears from Gn 14 20; He 7 8. With agricultural peoples, this practise naturally tended to settle down to the giving of the tenth of the annual produce. Jacob, however, makes the conditional offer of the tenth of the increase of his flocks (Gn 28 22). In the Mosaic legislation, the law of tithes is given in successive forms. (1) Provision is made (Dt 14 22-29) for the paying of tithes to the sanctuary, there to be eaten by the offerer and the Levite. But for those who lived at a great distance from the sanctuary, the gift might be commuted into money to be spent in a sacrificial banquet. Every third year the tithe was to be distributed to Levites, strangers, and the fatherless. The difference between tithes and first-fruits is not clearly marked, except that the first-fruits were offered to the priests (Dt 26 11). (2) Tithes are prescribed as a means of support for Levites (in Nu 18 21 ff. [P]), i.e., apparently as remuneration for services, in lieu of a share in the land ("for an inheritance"). But the Levites themselves are required to give of this tithe to the priests (Nu 18 26-28). Both these forms are pure land taxes, and do not include a tithe from the flock or herd. (3) Hence such a tithe is introduced in a third form (Lv 27 32-33 and II Ch 31 5, 6). In later Judaism these forms were combined, yielding two tithes, or an aggregate of one-fifth (20 per cent.) of the product of both soil and cattle. The Pharisees, with characteristic insistence on the literal observance of the Law, tithed even garden herbs (Mt 23 23). A. C. Z.

TITLE ON THE CROSS. See SUPERSCRIPTION.

TITTLE: This word (from the late Latin titulus, one of whose meanings was that of a pen-mark over a letter to distinguish it from another one similar in form) represents the Gr. κεραία, 'little horn,' applied by the Greek grammarians sometimes to the accents and other marks. Among the Hebrew scribes, the term signified the small points or lines of certain letters which serve to distinguish them from others of nearly the same form, as ר and ד, כ and ך, ה and ח. Thus a "jot" (i.e., yōdḥ, י, the smallest letter of the Heb. alphabet) and a "tittle" indicate together the smallest requirements of the Law, which Jesus indicated must stand as valid "till all be fulfilled" (Mt 5 18; Lk 16 17); cf. Edersheim, LJM, I, p. 537 f. E. E. N.

TITUS, tai'tus (Τίτος): One of Paul's most trusted assistants, of Greek parentage, but of otherwise unknown origin. He was converted probably under the Apostle (Tit 1 4). He was taken by Paul to the Jerusalem Council (Gal 2 1-5; Ac ch. 15), evidently in order that the demand of the Jewish Christians for the circumcision of the Gentiles might be resisted and settled by appeal to his concrete case.

He seems to have been a man of much strength of character. He organized the collection in Achaia for the Church of Jerusalem (II Co 8 6 ff.), and, when grave difficulties arose in the Church of Corinth, Paul sent him in the place of Timothy to handle the delicate situation, which he did with success (II Co 7 6 ff.). He is not mentioned in Ac, and except what may be inferred from the Epistle to Titus (q.v.), nothing more is known of him. R. A. F

TITUS, EPISTLE TO: One of the group of N T writings known as the Pastoral Epistles. The following is an analysis of its contents:

1. Analysis.

Greeting, based on the gospel 1 1-4.
The character required in the elders to be appointed in Crete (vs. 5-9), especially in view of false teachers, who are described in vs. 10-16.
(a) Within the Church there must be a well-regulated social order, springing from the saving grace of God revealed in Christ, 2 1-15; (b) and to the outside world, both rulers and others, the regenerated Christian character must be displayed, 3 1-8.
Advice to Titus in his dealing with false teachers, vs. 9-11.
Personal details, vs. 12-14.
Conclusion, ver. 15.

2. Historical Situation and Purpose. Paul had visited Crete, and had left Titus to complete the organization of the churches (1 5) (see CRETE). His task is so nearly done that in this letter, carried probably by Zenas, the lawyer, and Apollos (3 13), Paul announces his hope of soon relieving him, and begs Titus to prepare to join him at Nicopolis (3 12), q.v. Though the letter is personal, its contents were probably communicated to the churches; for Titus would need all the Apostle's authority behind him in the difficult task of restraining evil teachers and placing the church life under the oversight of men of the highest moral character. Elders are the only officials mentioned in the letter, and in them there is required "a hold on Christian principles of at least morality or religion, such as would enable them to give hortatory instruction of a salutary kind to all, and likewise to give competent answers to gainsayers" (Hort). The religious environment of the Cretan churches is very similar to that described in I and II Ti, with an increased emphasis on the Jewish character of the false teaching.

3. Authenticity. The same general characteristics as those of I and II Ti have cast suspicion on the Pauline authorship of Titus, though with less reason than in the case of I Ti. For a discussion of these, see also the article TIMOTHY, FIRST AND SECOND EPISTLES TO, §§ 3–6. R. A. F.

TITUS JUSTUS (Τίτιος Ἰοῦστος): A Roman citizen of Corinth who, favorably impressed by Paul's preaching, offered his house as a place where Paul could preach and teach after his trouble with the Jewish synagogue (Ac 18 7). His name is given variously in MSS. as "Justus" only, or as "Titius Justus," or as "Titus Justus." E. E. N.

TIZITE, tai'zait (הַתִּיצִי, hattītsī): The designation of Joha, one of David's heroes (I Ch 11 45). The place which gave rise to the name is unknown. E. E. N.

TOAH, tō'ā. See NAHATH.

TOB, tob or tōb (טוֹב, ṭōbh): A district of Syria. See ARAM, § 4 (5). E. E. N.

TOB-ADONIJAH, tob"-ad"o-nai'jā (טוֹבַאדֹנִיָּה, ṭōbh 'ădhōniyāh), 'the Lord J" is good': One of the Levites appointed by Jehoshaphat to teach Israel (II Ch 17 8). E. E. N.

TOBIAH, to-bai'ā, TOBIJAH, to-bai'jā (טוֹבִיָּה[הוּ], ṭōbhiyyāh[ū]): 1. One of the Levites sent by King Jehoshaphat to teach the Law in the cities of Judah (II Ch 17 8). 2. The name of a family which could not trace its descent, that went up with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem (Ezr 2 60; Neh 7 62). 3. An Ammonite, half Jew, and an adherent of Sanballat in his attempt to hinder Nehemiah in repairing Jerusalem (Neh 2 10, 19). By marriage, he was connected with prominent families of Jerusalem (Neh 6 17 ff.). He was dispossessed by Nehemiah of a room in the Temple which had been prepared for him by Eliashib the priest (Neh 13 4 ff.). 4. One of a company of exiles who came to Jerusalem, bringing gold and silver, the offerings of exiles remaining in Babylon, from which Zechariah in a vision was instructed to make a crown (Heb. "crowns") for Joshua, the high priest (Zec 6 10 ff.; so the text, but some moderns would substitute "Zerubbabel," the secular head of the community, for "Joshua," while others, because of the plural "crowns" and the mention of two persons in ver. 13b, would add "Zerubbabel"). TOBIT, tō'bit, BOOK OF: One of the books of the O T Apocrypha, which takes its name from Tobit, the leading character of its story. It has come to us in a number of versions, Greek, Latin, Syriac, Aramaic, Hebrew, which, while bearing witness to its wide popularity, also complicate the question as to its original form.

1. The Narrative. The story opens in Nineveh, where T. is with his wife Anna and his son Tobias, in exile. Good fortune attended him there as long as Shalmaneser was king, but all changed when Sennacherib came to the throne. Because T. mercifully buried those of his countrymen whom the king had slain, he was compelled to flee the city, and his property was confiscated. Upon Esarhaddon's accession, T. was permitted to return only to meet another terrible affliction—blindness. In his despair he prayed that he might die. At the same time that T. was thus praying, far away in the city of Ecbatana one Sara, the daughter of Raguel, was making the same prayer. Seven times she had been married, and each time, on the wedding-night, an evil spirit, Asmodeus, had killed her husband. God had willed that both suppliants should know of His goodness, and the angel Raphael was sent to accomplish the Divine purpose. When T. was in favor at court, he had committed to Gabael in Rages, a Median city, ten talents of silver. To secure them for his son, he planned to send him to Rages. Raphael so managed that he was chosen as guide, and, as they came to the river Tigris, a fish was captured from which was taken, at Raphael's command, the heart, liver, and gall. When they were approaching Ecbatana, Raphael told Tobias that he should marry Sara, and gave him directions how he should drive away the evil spirit by burning the fish's heart and liver in its presence. Soon after their arrival Tobias told his desire to Raguel. The father warned the young man of his danger, yet granted his request. No one expected to see him come alive from the fatal room, but the charm had banished the evil spirit, and there was, therefore, great rejoicing during the days of the wedding-feast. Raphael, meanwhile, had gone on to Rages to secure the money, and upon his return all three set out upon the journey home. T. and Anna had become very anxious over the long absence of Tobias, when one day the glad news of his coming filled their hearts with joy. Upon reaching the city, Raphael bade Tobias put some of the fish's gall upon his father's blind eyes. Immediately sight was restored. Thus did God reward the piety of both Tobit and Sara, and T. wrote a prayer of rejoicing and thanksgiving. At last, after years of benevolence and sincere, reverent piety, he came to a ripe age, and urged his sons and grandsons to leave Nineveh for Media. They went after his death, and there Tobias lived to become an old man, hearing just before his death the glad news of the destruction of Nineveh.

So many of the noble ways and teachings of true piety are set forth in this short story that it is not strange that opinion varies as to which

2. The Aim of the Story. is the controlling motive of the whole. Grätz and Neubauer see in it the inculcation of the duty of burying the dead; others the commendation of prayer or almsgiving. The lessons of the book center in the character of T. and Sara, whose piety, constant through suffering and misfortune, conquers, and is wonderfully blessed of God. God's signal care of those who are faithful to Him and His Law is prominently set forth.

Varying with the conceptions of the character of the book and the chief lessons it sets forth, have been the dates to which it has been assigned.

3. Date and Place of Composition. Those who have looked upon the book as an authentic history have placed its date in the 7th cent. B.C. The evidence that T. is a romance is, however, so clear that this early date has found little acceptance among scholars. In seeking a time for it in later days, various conclusions have been reached. Grätz puts it in the time of Hadrian (130 A.D.), Kohut still later in the time of Ardeshir (250 A.D.). As has been repeatedly shown, the mention of the Book of Tobit by Clement of Alexandria and by Polycarp precludes such a late origin. The most probable date is that of the 2d cent. B.C. In II Mac 5 10 Antiochus Epiphanes is said to have "cast out a multitude unburied." This may have given ground for the teaching about burying the dead (chs. 1 ff.). The reference in 14 5 fits this time, as before the beginning of Herod's Temple; so do the general religious conceptions of the book regarding the future. There is no Messianic hope expressed. The author was a Jew, but it can not be definitely decided where the book was written or what was its original language. There is good reason to believe that the story is composite. Elements originally quite distinct, like the story of Aḥiḳar, and also the interpolations of moral teachings, have been added to an older and simpler narrative concerning Tobit.

Though used by the early Fathers, the book was not generally considered canonical. The Councils of Carthage (397 A.D.), of Florence (1439), and of Trent (1546) gave it canonical rank. The English Church has made use of it to a limited extent, but not as a part of the Canon. See also APOCRYPHA, § 4.

TOLA, tō'la (תּוֹלָע, tōlā'), 'crimson-worm': 1. The ancestral head of the Tolaites, a clan of Issachar (Gn 46 13; Nu 26 23; I Ch 7 1 f.). A kindred clan was that of Puah. 2. One of the 'minor' judges (Jg 10 1 f.), designated as "Tola, son of Puah, a man of Issachar." It is remarkable (1) that the two names occur here as those of 'son' and 'father,' while in Gn 46 13, they are 'brothers,' and (2) that both names refer to colors. Very little is said of Tola's 'judgeship.' Like the other 'judges,' he was probably little more than a local hero. E. E. N.

TONGS. See TABERNACLE, § 3 (3), and TEMPLE, § 16.

TONGUES, CONFUSION OF: The result of a primitive interference by Jehovah with the human race whereby its unity was broken, its members failed to understand one another's speech, were "scattered abroad upon the face of all the earth," and, by implication, the one race was subdivided into the existing varieties of men speaking different languages (Gn 11 1-11). The story of the confusion of tongues is associated with that of the building of the Tower of Babel. Its main outline is to the effect that at a date very soon after the Flood, when as yet the whole human species was a single tribe moving from place to place, in the course of its nomadic wanderings it came to Babylonia (the "land of Shinar"). Here a most suitable site for permanent residence was found. It was determined that the tribe should abandon its hitherto nomadic way of life and build a city and a tower. J" (anthropomorphically conceived) came down to view the structure, disapproved the audacity of the scheme, saw the possibility of indefinite development of arrogance on the part of mankind, and prevented the accomplishment of the plan of building by sending the spirit of confusion and misunderstanding into the midst of the builders. These, now finding further cooperation impossible, scattered and divided into groups and began to speak the several languages since known upon earth.

The aim of the story is manifestly to give an explanation of the origin of so many tongues and nations of men. Just how the legend originated it is not possible to ascertain. It has no parallels in Babylonian lore (against Stade, ZATW, 1895, p. 137, and Gunkel, Schöpfung, p. 149). In fact, Babylonia seems to be treated in it as a strange country. Some gigantic towerlike building in it, perhaps either unfinished or disused and in partially ruined condition, possibly that near the temple of Belmarduk [see TOWER OF BABEL], excited by its unfamiliarity the sentiments, wonder, and questionings as to its origin. To this the question of how the languages arose was appended, and the legend was thus made to answer the twofold query. But in whatsoever way and wheresoever it may have originated, it was, like all other folk-lore when taken up by the Hebrew people, made the vehicle of religious and spiritual lessons. The chief one of these lies on the very surface. It is the sovereign supremacy of J″ involving the irresistibility of His will and the impossibility of thwarting Him. The very disaster which the primitive tribe is represented as desiring to avert, i.e., that of being scattered and subdivided, is visited on its members as a result of Divine judgment for folly and arrogance. The anthropomorphisms of the story are patent. It is exaggerating them, however, to say (Cheyne, EB, art. Babel) that they include the elements of J″'s grudging man the strength which comes from union or of the fear of human ambition.

So far as the legend is a vehicle of historical teaching, its kernel consists in the fact of the original unity of the human race and its language. This is a fact reached independently as a scientific conclusion by comparative philologists. Both the stock of vocables (roots) and the aggregate of modes of grouping words together to form articulated sentences (linguistic morphology) are found by philological study to indicate an original unity from which they are deducible as variations. Yet to attempt to classify the multitudes of separate types of speech either actually used or once used and now extinct, is regarded as a futile as well as an impossible task. That all language, however, must have had one primitive source is a view which may well have presented itself in the very earliest periods of human history, and could not have required more than a superficial study of a few dialects of the same general language with their characteristic similarities.

TONGUES, GIFT OF. See CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, § 7.

TONGUES, SPEAKING WITH: An experience of Apostolic times resulting in the use of other forms of speech than the vernacular of the speaker. Two variant accounts of the phenomenon, or more probably two distinct types of it, are given, the one found in the Epistles of Paul (for which see CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, § 7), the other in the record of Pentecost (Ac 2 3-13). Exactly what happened on the day of Pentecost seems difficult to ascertain, not, however, because the author of Ac, not being an eye-witness of the events, has misunderstood and misrepresented them (see McGiffert, Apostolic Age, 1897, p. 52, note), but precisely because it seems necessary to compare the account in Ac with the gift of tongues as known to and spoken of by Paul and bring the two representations into some sort of relationship with each other. Much of the difficulty will be removed if the two representations are not assumed to be portraitures of the same thing. That the author of Ac had a knowledge of the gift of tongues in the Pauline sense is evident from 10 46, 19 6. He must therefore in 2 3 ff. have had in mind a phenomenon of the same class, but of different specific characteristics. Some have thought that this was nothing less than the supernatural endowment of the speakers at Pentecost with the power of expressing themselves in languages unknown to them before, an endowment of which no trace appears later, therefore a transitory one. Others interpret the passage as meaning that the language spoken was one, but that each listener was enabled to understand what was said as if the speaker were using the listener's own native tongue. This might occur either by an endowment of the listener with the power to understand the speaker's language, or by an actual transformation of that language into the one he was familiar with from childhood. For these explanations there is no sufficient support in the text of the passage. It is more reasonable to look upon the case as involving a simpler process. The differences overcome by the extraordinary endowment depicted in the account were dialectic. They did not amount to differences of language. The list of countries from which the hearers were drawn (vs. 9-11) is long, but does not compel the assumption of as many different languages. Moreover, the word "dialect" (διάλεκτος) as distinguished from language (γλῶσσα) is introduced at the outset, and set over against the Galilean derivation of the speakers (ver. 8); and although "tongues" is later used instead of it (ver. 11), it is evidently as an absolute synonym of "dialect" in order to avoid the repetition of the same term. Further, according to the plan of Ac, the preaching of the gospel to pure Gentiles ignorant of the generic language of the Jews (Aramaic) would be premature at this early stage in the history. The audience at the day of Pentecost must, therefore, be supposed to consist altogether of Jews from Jerusalem, Judæa, and the Dispersion. If so, they all spoke the common Aramaic, but in dialects. A spiritual excitation, similar to that which resulted in the gift of tongues of the Pauline Epistles, empowered the speakers, on the one hand, to overcome the natural dialectic differences, and the listeners, on the other, to understand what was said by the Apostles.

TOPHEL, tō'fel (תֹּפֶל, tōphel): A station on the route of the wanderings of Israel (Dt 1 1). Site unknown.

E. L. N.

TOPHETH, tō'feth (תֹּפֶת, tōpheth, Tophet AV, except in II K 23 10). The etymology of the word is obscure. It has been suggested that it comes from tōph, 'drum,' upon the assumption that drums were beaten in the place so called, to drown the cries of those consigned to suffering there. There is, however, nothing to support such a view. Another suggestion connecting the word with pāthaḥ, 'to open' (Pi'el, 'to persuade'), appears equally groundless. It is translated in Job 17 6 RV, in harmony with the context, "spit in the face" ("tabret" AV). This points to a connection with the root tūph, 'to spit out,' one of whose secondary meanings is 'to treat with contempt,' 'to regard with loathing.'

1. The Name.

The proper meaning of the word "Topheth" is, then, that of 'a place of loathing,' from the constant expressions of disgust with reference to what was being done in it. When the practise of human sacrifice (making sons and daughters "pass through the fire to Molech") came to be recognized as an abomination in Israel, the places where this was done were called "Topheth" as expressing abhorrence of such practices. One such place, located in the Valley of Hinnom, was especially conspicuous in this respect (Jer 7 31, 19 14; II K 23 10).

2. Topheth, the Place.

From the scattered allusions to Topheth, it is reasonable to infer that it was of the nature of a high place with an altar, constructed, perhaps, in a peculiar way, adapted to the slaughtering of human victims. Accordingly, Jeremiah predicts that the place where Topheth was located should in the future be called "The Valley of Slaughter." The disrepute in which the Topheth in the Valley of Hinnom was held was intensified by Josiah's treatment of it. This king deliberately defiled the place by pulling down the altar, razing the knoll, and pouring all the filth of Jerusalem upon it.

3. Character of Topheth.

The word "Topheth" does not occur in the N T. But in later Christian thought, the distinction between it and the Valley of Hinnom was lost sight of, and it became a most expressive emblem of eternal torment. A. C. Z.

TOWER OF BABEL: A huge ziggurat, or tower-temple, called Etemenaki ('house of the foundation of heaven and earth'), that stood near Esagila, the temple of Bel-Marduk at Babylon (Heb. Babel). It was begun by a prehistoric Sumerian king, whose name was unknown even to his Babylonian successors; but was left unfinished, probably on account of political disturbances incident to the entrance of the Semites into Babylonia. For thousands of years its ruins were one of the wonders of the world. Knowledge of it was carried to the Hebrews, and in the J narrative of Gn 11 1-9 we are told how the men of Shinar purposed to build a tower whose top might reach unto heaven, but how J" frustrated them by confusing their tongues, i.e., by mixing the population of Babylonia. Sennacherib endeavored to obliterate it when he destroyed Babylon, but its massive foundations resisted his efforts. Esarhaddon and Asshurbanipal attempted to complete it, but were unsuccessful. Nabopolassar continued the work, but died before he had finished it. Nebuchadrezzar had the glory of being the first king of Babylon to bring it to completion. In his inscriptions he gives an accurate account of its appearance. The bottom stage was 300 ft. in length and breadth, and about 120 ft. in height; and above this were six other stages that diminished continually in size. Since the decline of Babylon, its ruins have served for centuries as a brick quarry for all the surrounding country, so that now all that is left of the tower is a hole 300 ft. square where the foundations once stood.

TOWN CLERK (γραμματεύς): An official of varied power and functions at different periods and in different parts of the Greek world, and recognized by the Romans in their colonial government. In imperial times, the Ephesian clerk ranked next to the highest native official, the boularch (president of the boulē, the city 'council,' or 'senate'), and was called, with apparent indifference, the city (town) clerk (γραμματεὺς τῆς πόλεως), the people's clerk (γραμματεὺς τοῦ δήμου), and the senate clerk (γραμματεὺς τῆς βουλῆς). He audited the accounts of the Bank of Ephesus in the Artemisium, and, in virtue of his important official position, though a native, not a Roman, official, came into close contact with the proconsul of Asia, whose residence at that time was Ephesus. He is referred to but once in the NT, in connection with the riot in Ephesus brought about by Demetrius the silversmith (Ac 19 35). He succeeded in quieting the tumult, and, in a speech which shows a clear understanding of his own responsibility and the legal procedure possible for the complainants (vs. 35-40), dismissed the assembly. Since the clerk was accountable to the proconsul, it is to his regularly constituted court that he suggested recourse be had (ver. 38. The plural "there are proconsuls" ["deputies" AV] is purely general, referring to the official as a class). J. R. S. S.

TRACHONITIS, trac″o-nai′tis (Τραχωνῖτις, from τραχύς, 'rough,' the rendering of the Arab. wa'ar, 'waste region' = Heb. ya'ar, 'thicket,' 'jungle'): A rugged and inaccessible region 370 sq. m. in extent, lying S. of Damascus and between the Antilebanon range on the W and the mountains of Batanæa on the E.—the modern Lejā, which is really the lava-field formed in prehistoric times from the craters of the mountains of Hauran on the S. and SE.

J. R. S. S.

TRADE AND COMMERCE: The Israelites were not, originally, a trading people. As nomads, they were able to provide, for the most part, for all their necessities, and were not dependent on other people. It is not likely that they carried on any extensive trading operations, until they had become welded into one nation in the Kingdom period. When Israel entered Canaan, it found there a people long accustomed to trade, and, as this naturally centered in the Canaanite cities, it was not until these cities had passed into Israelite control and their population had become absorbed into Israel that the Israelites themselves became interested in trade. By the time of the establishment of the Kingdom, this process was about completed.

1. Introductory.

In this period, however, several factors conspired to give trade a more important place in Israel's life. In the first place, city life now developed more rapidly Jerusalem, and later Samaria, as capital cities, became centers of commercial activity. These and other cities, as they grew in population, became markets for the exchange of commodities. Cities containing sanctuaries were particularly likely to become markets. They were places where the countrymen could bring the products of their farms, their flocks, and their looms, and exchange these for articles manufactured in the cities or brought there for sale from other countries. An additional factor was the closer relations with other nations, especially Syria, Phœnicia, and the Assyrian Empire. From about 900 to 734 B.C. Damascus was the chief city of a large and flourishing Aramæan kingdom which, with other Aramæan states to the NW. and N., was largely interested in trade. Assyria attained to the height of her power in the 8th and 7th cents. B.C. These political consolidations gave a great impetus to trade all through SW Asia, and Israel was by no means unaffected by them. In the third place, kings interested themselves in trade, probably as much for their own personal gain as for any national advantage. Solomon seems to have given great attention to commerce. He equipped a trading fleet at Ezion-geber on the Red Sea, manned it with Phœnician sailors, loaded it, presumably, with suitable articles of exchange, and sent it once in three years to Ophir (q.v.), whence it brought back gold, almug-trees, and precious stones (I K 9 26 ff., 10 11 f.), also silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks (10 22, navy of Tarshish = 'a fleet of large vessels, such as the Phœnicians used in their trade with Tarshish'). The visit of the queen of Sheba (SW Arabia) was also probably not without commercial considerations. The reference (I K 10 15) to "the traffic of the merchants" as a source of revenue implies the levying of toll on traveling traders. The traffic in horses and chariots (I K 10 28 f.) has reference to the importation of horses from Mutsri and Kue (Cappadocia and Cilicia, so Winckler in *KAT*³, p. 238 f.), probably for the king's own use, though possibly also to sell to other countries, as Egypt. I K 10 28 should read "and the export of horses for King Solomon was from Mutsri and Kue. The king's traders procured them from Kue at a price." When Omri, the ablest of the kings of N. Israel, was compelled to give Syrian traders bazaar quarters in Samaria (I K 20 34), he probably sought to offset this disadvantage by cementing a marriage alliance with the royal house of Phœnicia, the great trading nation. This gave him an opportunity to market the immense tribute of wool he received from the subject Moabites (cf. II K 3 4). Ahab, the son of Omri, was quick to take advantage of a victory over Benhadad to secure trading quarters for Israelite merchants in Damascus (I K 20 34). Jehoshaphat made an (unsuccessful) attempt to reopen the trade on the Red Sea (I K 22 48). Such incidental references in the brief record in I and II K show that the kings of Israel took an active part in the commercial operations of their day. While the Jews were in exile, they lived in the midst of a flourishing commercial environment, and doubtless many became closely identified with it. At the Return the majority of these probably preferred to remain in the East, and the colony of returned exiles was made up mostly of agriculturists. Nevertheless, in the century between the Return (586) and Nehemiah (444) a considerable commercial life had developed in Jerusalem, as such passages as Neh 3 8, 11, 31, 5 1 ff., 13 15 ff. abundantly testify. The great system of roads constructed by the Persians was conducive to a further development of commerce throughout their empire, and the introduction of Greek civilization, with its many Greek cities or colonies, scattered here and there throughout SW. Asia, was most closely connected with the pursuit of trade. Under the Roman dominion the commerce of the East attained to vast proportions.

At the same time, Israel in Palestine, especially that part of it occupying Judæa, never became distinctively a trading people. Down to the fall of the Jewish state they retained much of their early simple predominantly agricultural (or pastoral) type of life. The Canaanites and Aramæans to a large extent, and the Phœnicians almost altogether, gained their living from trade; Israel did not. This is the reason, probably, why references to trade are, comparatively, so few and vague in the O T. Even the Law contains but a few enactments touching the subject, and these are of the simplest character. The prophets, who lived so close to the life of their times, touch upon it only incidentally, though such passages as Is 2 7, 3 16 ff., 5 8; Am 2 6, 4 1, 8 4 f.; Mic 2 1 f.; Hos 12 7, show that much of it was present before their eyes, while such descriptions of foreign commerce (see TYRE) as we find in Is ch. 23 and in Ezk ch. 26 f. show how wide-spread was the knowledge of this in Israel. While the prophets were, on the whole, in favor of the more simple and less luxurious type of life, they did not condemn trade as such, but only the greed, selfishness, oppression, and dishonesty so often manifested in connection with it.

2. Trade-Routes. Palestine is so situated that the trade between Egypt and Arabia on the one hand, and Syria, Mesopotamia, and the farther East on the other, must touch its borders very closely, though it need not pass directly through the country. The great trade-routes of antiquity, consequently, were vitally related to Israel. (1) From Damascus, where the routes from the East converged, a road led past Mt. Hermon and the sources of the Jordan to Tyre. Thence it ran S. along the coast to Acco, where it divided, one branch following the coast closely, the other crossing the E. part of Mt. Carmel and running along the E. edge of the coast plain. At Ashdod, these roads united, and continued along the coast via Gaza to Egypt. (2) Another route from Damascus crossed the Jordan S. of Lake Ḥuleh, touched the NW shore of the Sea of Galilee, thence passed SW. across Galilee via Nazareth and the Plain of Esdraelon, and on via Megiddo to its junction with route (1), at a point about 10 m. E. of Cæsarea. (3) From Damascus toward W. Arabia a great road ran along the E. border of Palestine and Moab to Ma'an and Elath (on the Red Sea, Gulf of Akaba) and thence to the various cities of SW Arabia. (4) From the E. Jordan regions (Gilead, etc.; cf. Gn 37 25) a route crossed the Jordan near Bethshan, and, passing through this city, led up the Valley of Jezreel and through the E. end of the Plain of Esdraelon and thence through the Plain of Dothan to its junction with the coast road to Egypt. (5) From SW. Arabia several routes (one via Elath, another via Ma'an and Petra) traversed the region S. of Palestine and converged at Gaza, where they met the great seacoast route between SW Asia and Egypt. With the exception of routes (2) and (4), none of these roads traverses the territory actually occupied by the Israelites, who, dwelling for the most part on the highlands, were somewhat isolated. The more advantageous position of Zebulun and Issachar, who dwelt in the Plain of Esdraelon, where routes (2) and (4) were joined by several cross-country roads, is reflected in Dt 33 18 f. The main routes were, however, easily accessible from the highlands. An important road ran along the crest of the central range. From Hebron, where several roads from W., S. and E. converged, it ran N. to Jerusalem, Bethel, Shechem, and on to Bethshan, and from each of these places roads diverged E. and W to the different parts of the land. Jericho also was a meeting-point of roads leading up and down and across the Jordan to the highlands on either side.

3. Terms for Trade in the O T. Although Israel was not a trading nation, there was a great deal of traffic of the simpler sort carried on within the nation between city and country, between individuals, etc., and the terms connected with such traffic are quite numerous. Terms signifying buy are kārāh (Dt 2 6; Hos 3 2), lāqaḥ, 'to get' or 'to take' (Neh 5 3, 10 31), qānāh, 'to acquire,' the most-used term (Gn 33 19; Lv 25 13 ff., etc.), shābhar (Qal.), used especially of grain purchase (Gn 41 57, etc.), and in the N T, ἀγοράζειν (passim), ὠνεῖσθαι (Ac 7 16), and ἐμπορεύεσθαι (Ja 4 13, "trade" RV). For sell the common word is mākar (Gn 25 31, etc.), while shābhar (Hiph.) is used of grain (Gn 42 6, etc.). In the N T ἀποδιδόναι, πιπράσκειν, and πωλεῖν occur. For trade and traffic we have nāthan, 'to give' (Ezk 27 12 ff.), ṣāḥar (Gn 34 10, 21), ἐργάζεσθαι (Mt 25 16; Rev 18 17), and ἐμπορεύεσθαι (Ja 4 13). Ṣāḥar, 'to go about here and there,' in the participle form ṣōḥēr, is often rendered merchant, and its derivative noun, ṣaḥar, merchandise, indicates that the "merchant" was originally a pedler. The proper noun kᵉna'an and the adj. kᵉna'ănī meaning "Canaanite" (including the Phœnicians) is often used in the sense of 'merchant,' or 'trader,' indicating that nearly everything outside of ordinary domestic barter was originally in the hands of the Canaanites and Phœnicians (Job 41 6; Pr 41 24, etc.). In I K 10 15 and II Ch 9 14 we have 'anshē ha-tārīm, 'men who spy out,' like ṣōḥēr, for itinerant traders (chapmen in II Ch 9 14 AV). Each of the Eng. words wealth, riches, goods, substance, merchandise, wares, and price has behind it a great variety of Heb. and Gr. terms, one of which, miqneh (e.g., Job 1 3), means also 'cattle,' indicating that once cattle were the chief item of wealth. The terms for caravan, sometimes called company, are related to terms meaning 'path,' or 'to go,' or 'to wander' (Gn 37 25; Job 6 18 f.; Is 21 13). For tribute there are five different terms, none of which is especially significant. For both lending and borrowing, the most-used term was lāwāh (Ex 22 25; Dt 28 12; cf. esp. Neh 5 4). Nāshā', nāshāh, and nāshak, 'to bite,' were used especially of loaning on interest (māshshā' and mashshā'āh), which was not viewed favorably by many (Dt 24 11; Neh 5 3 ff.; Ps 15 3; Ex 22 25 f., etc.). Neshek, usury, which was perhaps originally not considered the same as interest (cf. Nowack, Arch. I, p. 354), was severely condemned (Lv 25 36; Dt 23 19, etc.). From the verb nāshāh we have nōshēh (participle), 'creditor' (II K 4 1), and from the same root come the words for debt. In the N T δανειστής is creditor, while δάνειον (Mt 18 27), ὀφειλή (Mt 18 32), ὀφειλόμενον (Mt 18 30), and χρεωφειλέτης (Lk 7 41) stand for debtor. For mortgage (vb.) we have 'ārabh, 'pledge' (Neh 5 3; cf. Eph 1 14, ἀρραβών), and for pledge or 'security' ḥābhal, ḥăbhōl, and ḥăbhōlāh (Ex 22 26; Ezk 33 15, 18 7). To pay is nāthan, 'to give' (Nu 20 19), shālam (Ex 21 36), shāqal, 'to weigh' (Ex 22 17) and, in the N T, ἀποδιδόναι (Mt 5 26). In the N T for changer of money we have κολλυβιστής (Jn 2 15), from κόλλυβος, (1) 'a small coin,' and then (2), 'rate of exchange,' and κερματιστής (Jn 2 14), from κερματίζειν, 'to make small change' (cf. κέρμα, 'a small coin,' ver. 15), also τραπεζίτης (Mt 25 27, from τράπεζα, 'table'), a 'money broker,' or 'banker.' The word τράπεζα is rendered bank in Lk 19 23. In Lk 16 6 f. we have γράμμα, 'writing,' rendered bond (RV), or bill (AV), meaning a note, or acknowledgment of debt, signed by the debtor (see Edersheim, LTM, II, p. 272 f.).

4. Articles for Trade.

While in ordinary years, with careful cultivation, Palestine always yielded more than sufficient for home consumption, the surplus for export was never very great. In favorable years, grain and olive-oil could be exported (I K 5 11; cf. Ac 12 20). Balm (q.v.), tragacanth gum, myrrh, or ladanum, pistachio-nuts, and almonds (Gn 37 25, 43 11) were also exported, especially from Gilead. Wool and linen, and probably other products of the loom, could be marketed (cf. Pr 31 13 ff., 24). Pottery also was made in great quantities, and salt (from the Dead Sea) was an important item of trade. In N T times the export of cured fish from the Sea of Galilee was very large. Imports would be metals, precious stones, curiosities, and articles of luxury, such as incense, ointments, and perfumes, things made of ivory and precious woods, silks (cf. Am 3 12), and fine linen, such articles as are mentioned in Is 3 16 ff., dates from the desert, timber from Lebanon, weapons, horses, etc. Slaves also were bought and sold in great numbers (cf. Am 1 6, 9). For the trade of Tyre see Ezk ch. 27.

5. Business Methods.

The earliest business methods of the Israelites were, doubtless, very simple, such as mere barter and exchange of commodities. With the increase in the use of money, methods became more complex. Goods were transported mainly by beasts of burden, the ass, the mule, and the camel. With ships and ship-commerce the Israelites had almost nothing to do. The only harbor on that part of the coast controlled by them, Joppa, did not come into their possession until the Maccabæan period, and the Israelites never were a seafaring people.

The trader peddled his wares from house to house (cf. Pr 31 24), or hawked them through the streets (cf. Neh 13 16). In larger cities, such as Samaria, there were "streets,"—i.e., bazaar quarters,—where foreign merchants exhibited their goods (I K 20 34, etc.). In process of time, gilds and gild-quarters were to be found in the principal cities (cf. Neh 3 8, 11, 31; also I Ch 2 55, 4 21, where the same fact is evidenced). On all foreign trade custom, or toll, was demanded, perhaps also for the use of the highways in crossing Palestine from one country to another. Loans, mortgages, and leases were common. Money was placed on deposit to draw interest (Lk 19 23). In ancient Babylon, interest rates were from 10 to 20 per cent., in Greece from 12 to 20 per cent.; in Roman times they were somewhat lower. These more highly developed commercial transactions were probably not common in Israel until after the Exile.

TRADITION (παράδοσις, 'a giving over'): This word signifies the action of transmitting the account of an event, or the teaching of a matter, then the thing itself that is transmitted. All religions have their traditions. Judaism in the days of Jesus made much of tradition (Mt 15 2 f.; Mk 7 3 f.). The Sadducees denied the authority of mere traditional interpretations of the Law; but the Pharisees claimed that the only difference between the written body of the Law and the traditional precepts attached to it was one of form (Berakh. 5a). Some even went to the extent of claiming that oral tradition was of superior authority to written law, since the latter depended, after all, on the oral teaching of Moses. The earlier traditions were legal or prescriptive; they were called Hălākhāh[-khōth] ('that which is custom'). So far as they were narrative (legendary), they made up the Haggādhāh ('what is narrated'). As a reiteration of the Law, they were called Mishnāh ('repetition'). As a series of questionings or investigations into the meaning of the Law, they were called Midhrash ('search'), and as a means of teaching, or body of what is taught, they took the name of Talmud. Jesus and His disciples minimized the authority and value of these traditions, bringing them in every case to the ethical standards of a true love of God.

TRANCE. See REVELATION, IDEA OF, § 9, and DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5 (8).

TRANSFIGURATION: The glorified manifestation of Jesus to His three most intimate disciples on a "high mountain" (Mt 17 1–8 and ∥; cf. II P 1 17 f.). The time of the event is fixed by its connection with the visit of Jesus to Cæsarea Philippi and the disciples' confession of Him there as the Messiah (Mt 16 13 ff.). The place has been made the subject of various conjectures. In ancient times there were those who thought the Transfiguration occurred on the Mt. of Olives. But nothing that precedes the account indicates a journey to Jerusalem by Jesus and His disciples so soon after the events of Cæsarea Philippi. Another ancient view supported by Jerome (Ep. xxvii. Epitaph. Paul.) identifies Mt. Tabor near Nazareth as the Mount of Transfiguration. This belief underlies also the annual celebration of the event by the Greek Church under the name of Thaborion (Θαβώριον); but the distance from Cæsarea Philippi and Jesus' appearance immediately after the Transfiguration in Capernaum (Mk 9 30) show this view to be improbable. And the fact that there was at the time a village on the summit of Tabor (Jos. BJ, IV 1 8; II. 20 1), rendering impossible the solitude in search of which Jesus went upon the mountain, positively excludes its historicity. Accordingly, the general consensus of recent investigators has fixed upon the Mt. Hermon region in general as the place best corresponding to the conditions, though it leaves undetermined the special summit of the range, which probably served as the scene of the occurrence.

Just what took place in the Transfiguration it is perhaps impossible to define in more precise terms than those given in the Gospel narrative. Here the affair is given as a vision (ὅραμα), and undoubtedly as an objective one. The physical appearance of Jesus was changed in such a way as to impress those with Him of a heavenly quality. He was further seen to converse with Moses and Elijah. The minds of the witnesses were so overwhelmed by the experience that Peter, as their representative and spokesman, uttered words which the narrator explicitly describes with the suggestion that they lacked in coherency and reason.

Of greater importance is the significance of the event both for Jesus and the disciples. For Him, it was in the nature of a preparation for the strenuous task which awaited Him. For them, it was a means of assurance that whatever might befall, their Master had a mission from God, and the events of His subsequent life must be interpreted consistently with this fact. This was further the general purport of a declaration through a voice which they recognized to be that of God Himself (Lk 9 35). A. C. Z.

TRANSGRESS: This word and its derivatives (transgressor, transgression) represent that aspect of sin according to which it is viewed either as: (1) 'Disloyalty' or 'treachery,' bāghadh (Ps 59 5; Pr 13 15; I S 14 33, "dealt treacherously" RV; cf. Ps 25 3; Hab 2 5). (2) A trespass, or interference with the rights of J" in matters devoted to His service (mā'al, I Ch 2 7, "trespass" RV; cf. I Ch 5 25, 26 16, 28 19, 36 14; Ezr 10 10; Neh 1 8; but Pr 16 10, "transgress"). (3) A passing over a line and stepping upon forbidden ground ('ābhar, Nu 14 41; Jg 2 20). This is exactly reproduced in the N T words παραβαίνειν, παραβάτης, and παράβασις (Mt 15 2 f.; Gal 2 18; Ja 2 9; Ro 4 15). (4) A 'rebellion,' or 'revolt' (pesha', I K 8 50; Ezr 10 13; applied by the Prophets in matters of religion, Is 43 25; Ezk 18 22 ff., etc.). (5) A 'violation of law' (ἀνομία, I Jn 3 4; but "lawlessness" RV; cf. the citation from the LXX. in the narrative of the Crucifixion, Mk 15 28 and ‖). A. C. Z.

TRANSLATION: This term renders in the O T the Heb. word ha'ăbhīr, Hiph. of 'ābhar (II S 3 10) in its primitive sense of transferring. In the N T, it denotes (1) figuratively, the passage of the believer from the kingdom of darkness into that of light (μετάστασις, Col 1 13), and (2) specifically, the exceptional passage of Enoch from the earthly to the heavenly life without experiencing death (μετάθεσις, He 11 5). A. C. Z.

TREAD: In the phrase "tread out the corn" (I Co 9 9; I Ti 5 18) the word is used as the equivalent of 'thresh.' See AGRICULTURE and illustration on p. 18 f. See also VINES AND VINTAGE, § 1. E. E. N.

TREASURE: (1) In the O T this term is usually the rendering of 'ōtsār, 'something laid up or away,' and is used of royal treasures, gold, silver, and similar things (I K 14 26, 15 18, etc.), of the treasures of the sanctuary (I K 7 51, 15 18, etc.), and of goods or wealth in general (Pr 8 21, 15 16, 21 6; Jer 49 4, etc.). It is also used somewhat figuratively of the resources of nature which are at the disposal of God (Dt 28 12; Job 38 22). (2) ginzīn (Aram.) is used of the royal treasures of Persia (Ezr 5 17, 6 1, 7 20). (3) ḥōsen (from ḥāṣan, 'to preserve') is twice rendered "treasure" (Pr 15 6; Ezk 22 25). (4) maṭmōn, something 'hidden' (Gn 43 23; Job 3 21; Pr 2 4; Jer 41 8 AV). (5) mikmannīm (Dn 11 43). (6) miṣkᵉnōth (pl.), from perhaps Assyr. šakânu, 'to place' (goods); only in the combination 'ārē miṣkᵉnōth, 'cities of storing,' i.e., magazine cities (Ex 1 11). (7) 'āthūdh (variant for 'āthīdh, 'ready,' 'prepared'; Is 10 13; cf. Est 8 13). (8) sāphūn (pres. ptcpl.), 'hidden' things (Dt 33 19). (9) θησαυρός, θησαυρίζειν, the N T equivalent of (1), above (Mt 2 11, 6 19, etc.). (10) γάζα, a Persian word (Ac 8 27). E. E. N.

TREASURER: This term, as used in the EVV, properly renders only the Heb. gizbar (from the Pers. ganjvar), the title of Mithredath, a Persian official (Ezr 1 8; cf. also 7 21 and the Aramaic variant gᵉdhābhᵉrayyā', Dn 3 2 f.). In Is 22 15 the title given to Shebnah is ṣōkhēn, of which "treasurer" is a somewhat too specific rendering, since ṣōkhēn means 'steward' or 'caretaker' in general. In Neh 13 13, the expression "I made treasurers" is the rendering of but one word, a verb, in the Heb. and is not of technical significance. Its meaning is explained at the end of the verse. The Gr. title of Erastus (Ro 16 23, "chamberlain" AV) is οἰκονόμος, 'steward.' The duties of the οἰκονόμος of a city included the management of its finances, and "treasure" RV is an adequate rendering. A. C. Z.

TREASURY. See TEMPLE, § 32.

TREE: This is the rendering of the Heb. עֵץ, 'ēts, and of the Gr. δένδρον or ξύλον. In the Arabian desert trees grow only in watered oases; consequently, they shared the sanctity of springs in the esteem of the primitive Semites (see SEMITIC RELIGION, §§ 8, 10). Among the Canaanites and Hebrews, tree-worship lasted down to late times (Gn 12 6 f., 13 18, 21 33, 23 17, 35 4, 8; Ex 3 2; Dt 12 2, 16 21; Jos 24 26; Jg 4 5, 6 11, 19, 24, 9 37; I S 14 2, 22 6, 31 13; II S 5 24; I K 6 29, 32, 35, 14 23; II K 16 4, 17 10; Ps 52 8, 92 13; Is 57 5, 65 3, 66 17; Jer 2 20, 3 6, 13, 17 2; Ezk 6 13, 20 28). Even when this cult was abolished, a memory of it survived in poetry (Ps 104 16, 148 9; Is 44 23, 55 12). Trees were also cultivated for their fruit (Gn 1 11; Dt 6 11; Ec 2 5 f.), and one of the first efforts of an enemy was to cut them down (Dt 20 20; II K 3 19, 25; Jer 6 6). A blighting of the fruit crop was regarded as a sure sign of the anger of J" (Ex 9 25, 10 15; Lv 26 20; Dt 28 42; Jer 7 20; Jl 1 12, 19; Hag 2 9; Rev 7 1, 3, 8 7), and, on the other hand, a plentiful harvest was a token of His favor (Lv 26 4; Ezk 34 27, 36 30, 47 7; Jl 2 22). To propitiate Him, the fruit of trees was not eaten for the first four years (Lv 19 23), and first-fruits were offered (Ex 22 29). For other uses of trees see Gn 18 4, 8; Ex 15 25; Jg 9 48; I K 5 10; Is 40 20, 44 14 f.; Jer 10 3. In Heb. the word 'ēts is used also for 'wood' or 'beam,' hence to "hang on a tree" (Gn 40 19; Dt 21 22 f.; Jos 8 29, 10 26 f.; Est 2 23; Ac 5 30, 10 39, 13 29, etc.) means to suspend on a gallows or cross.

Trees were favorite subjects for parables among the Hebrews (Jg 9 8-15; I K 4 33; Mt 3 10, 7 17 f., 12 33). In poetry they stand as a figure of longevity (Is 65 22), or of strength and pride. Their felling is a symbol of the sudden destruction that overtakes the arrogant (Is 2 13, 10 34 f.; Ezk 17 22 f., 31 3-14; Job 19 10, 24 20; Ec 11 3). The forest fire is also used frequently as a symbol of national disaster (Is 9 18, 10 17-19; Ezk 20 47). The righteous is compared to a fruitful, well-watered tree (Jer 17 8; Ps 1 3; Pr 3 18, 11 30, 13 12, 15 4; Mt 3 10, 7 17, 12 33), which, even when it is cut down, sends up new shoots from the roots (Is 4 2, 6 13, 11 1). For the different kinds of trees in the Bible see PALESTINE, § 21. L. B. P.

TRIAL OF JESUS. See JESUS CHRIST, § 16.

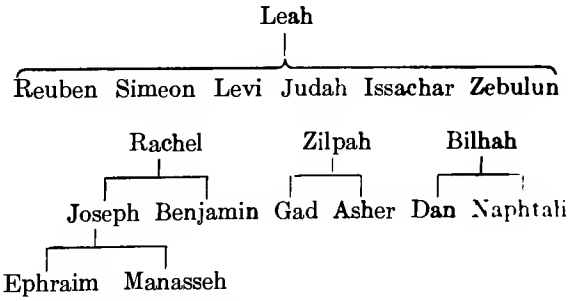
TRIBE, TRIBES: In the O T these terms are the translation of two Hebrew words, shēbheṭ and maṭṭeh; in the N T they render φυλή. With two exceptions (Is 19 13, "tribes" = 'nomes' of Egypt, and Mt 24 30, in a general sense), these words are always applied to the twelve tribes of Israel. Until the monarchy effaced it, the tribal form of social organization prevailed in Israel. Even then the people clung to it as an ideal, and it still appears in the Apocalypse of the N T (Rev ch. 7).

Our knowledge of tribal customs and laws among the Hebrews is supplemented and confirmed by what has been learned of similar institutions in ancient Arabia. The fundamental unit was the clan, and a tribe was constituted by the union of several clans. In the O T there are two words for "clan," mishpāḥāh, translated "family," and 'eleph, a community or association (EV "thousand"). The clan was further subdivided into "houses" or "father's houses," but the sept, recognizing the individual rather than the family group, was the basis of tribal organization. The leaders of the tribes are termed "princes" or rulers (Ex 34 31), heads (Nu 1 16), or chiefs (Gn 36 15 ff., dukes AV), though their common title is "elders," which corresponds exactly to the Arabic sheik. The council of the elders would answer to the divan among the Arabs. Tribal brotherhood was based upon blood relationship, real or assumed, and participation in a tribal cult. Traces of tribal religion in the form of totemism and ancestor-worship are supposed to be found in the O T. "Simeon," according to the etymology of Gn (29 33), is derived from shāma', 'to hear'; but many scholars consider it an animal name, synonymous with the Arabic sim'u, which denotes a cross between a wolf and a hyena. In addition Leah ('wild cow'?), Levi (as if gentilic from "Leah"), and Rachel ('ewe') have been used as props for this theory. Philologically, this view has a shaky foundation. In support of the theory of primitive ancestor-worship, the mourning customs, the tombs of the patriarchs, and especially the pillar at Rachel's grave (Gn 35 20) have been advanced, but without sufficient reason. Gad is the name of an ancient Semitic god of fortune (Is 65 11; and cf. Aramaic inscriptions), but there is no adequate reason for asserting that he was the tribal deity of the Israelitic tribe of the same name. If the Hebrew clans ever had tribal cults, the religion of J" effectually obliterated them. The forms of idolatry against which the prophets thundered were borrowed from their neighbors. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 5.

1. Tribal Organization.

According to the O T, the twelve sons of Jacob were the founders of the Israelitic tribes. The number twelve has caused some interpreters unnecessary difficulty; according to Cheyne, it is due to a hieratic theory, Winckler prefers to refer it to mythological influences, while Stade thinks it is based upon the prefectures of Solomon. Rejecting these conjectures, we ask why could Jacob not have had twelve sons as well as any other number? The real problem lies in the general principles which are assumed by the interpreter. Without any adequate proof it has been laid down as an axiom that "New nations never originate through the rapid increase of a tribe; new tribes never through derivation from a family propagating itself abundantly through several generations." But the O T narrative, although regarding the twelve sons of Jacob as tribal ancestors, does not imply that the tribes of Israel grew entirely by the propagation of a single family. There was the mixed multitude (Ex 12 38; Nu 11 4), there were accretions from without in the form of slaves, concubines, and above all natural growth was accelerated by the accession of foreign clans, e.g., the Kenites (Jg 1 16) and Calebites (Jg 1 12 ff.; cf. I Ch 2 9, 18, 42). The genealogy of the Hebrew tribes may be put in the form of a tree:

2. The Genealogical System.



Thus the twelve tribes go back to one father, Jacob-Israel, and to four mothers, Leah and Rachel being full wives, while Bilhah and Zilpah were concubines.

Let us look at the modern hermeneutical principles laid down for the tribal interpretation of the patriarchal narratives. (1) The name of the father is really the designation of a tribe; (2) a wife or mother is a smaller tribe which is absorbed by a stronger, e.g., Leah by Jacob; (3) a marriage denotes the amalgamation of two different tribes, a concubine signifying a less important tribe; (4) the birth of a child denotes the origin of a new tribe. Such a theory of the patriarchal narratives, although pretentious and apparently scientific, is extremely problematic. Even in a brief criticism several weak points in the theory may be noted. It disregards the personal elements of the narratives, which are exceedingly true to life, e.g., the strife and jealousy between Leah and Rachel, or the family life of Judah; it asserts or assumes many general principles without any real proof. If the genealogical grouping is a reflex of political and geographical conditions, the relation of the tribes as revealed in the later history ought to correspond to it. Here is where the theory completely breaks down, for certain tribes, closely connected in the genealogical scheme, are without close political relations, and are far removed from one another geographically, e.g., Gad and Asher; Judah, Issachar, and Naphtali; and although conjectural theories abound which from the nature of the case can not be established, yet it remains a fact that no positive proofs have been advanced against the accuracy in all essentials of the O T account of the origin of the Hebrew tribes. In Scripture the tribes are grouped in many different orders, according to various principles of arrangement: (1) According to their relationship to Jacob, his wives, and concubines (Gn chs. 29–35, 46 and 49; Ex ch. 1; Nu chs. 1, 2, 7, 11, 13, and 26; I Ch chs. 2 and 27). (2) Geographical position (Nu ch. 34; Dt ch. 33; Jos chs. 13 ff.; Jg ch. 5; I Ch ch. 12; Rev ch. 7). (3) Geography modified by tradition (the more important tribes blessing, and the lesser cursing, in Dt ch. 27). (4) An ideal grouping (Ezk ch. 48).

3. The Tribal Ancestors.

Of the personal life of most of the sons of Jacob nothing is known; they are mere names. Of some, a few facts have been preserved. Simeon and Levi are associated together in a treacherous attack on the inhabitants of Shechem to avenge the rape of their sister Dinah (Gn ch. 34) after a settlement had been effected. For this crime both are severely rebuked in the Blessing of Jacob, and their posterity is destined to be scattered in Israel (Gn 49 6, 7). Rachel died in giving birth to Benjamin near Ephratah; she named him Benoni ('son of my sorrow'), which Jacob changed to "Benjamin" ('son of the right hand,' Gn 35 16-18). He is represented as the darling of his father, who reluctantly permitted him to go down to Egypt with his brethren (Gn chs. 42 ff.). Judah ('praised') was the fourth son of Jacob by Leah (Gn 29 35), but he acts as a leader among his brethren, and soon appears with the rights of the first-born. Reuben, the eldest, and Judah both act as representatives of the brothers in the history of Joseph. Judah is the leader in Gn 37 26, 43 3, 44 16, 46 28 (J), Reuben in Gn 37 22, 42 37 (E). Judah is not portrayed in a favorable light in Gn ch. 38. He married a Canaanite wife who bore him three sons, Er, Onan, and Shelah. Er died childless, and Onan refused to perform his duty according to the law of levirate marriage. The widow of his elder brother, disguising herself as a Temple prostitute (qᵉdhēshāh), enticed Judah, who by her became the father of Perez and Zerah. Judah's actions are not to be judged exclusively by the standards of our day; in general, he acted honorably according to the ideals of his time. Many modern writers interpret this story as a naive method of stating tribal relations. Tamar was thus a Canaanite clan which united with the Israelite tribe of Judah. If such were really the case, the narrative could scarcely have taken on such a form, throwing serious reflections on the character of the founder of the tribe to which David belonged (ch. 38 is assigned to J, the Judaic document). Reuben ('behold a son') is the first-born of Jacob and Leah (Gn 29 32). As a boy of seven or eight, he gathers mandrakes for his mother (Gn 30 14). His character has both a darker and a brighter side. He commits incest with his father's concubine Bilhah (35 22); and in the Blessing of Jacob (Gn 49 3, 4) he is said to have lost his rights as first-born in consequence of this crime (cf. I Ch 5 1). On the other hand, in the story of Joseph he appears as a noble character, above the little and mean jealousies of his brothers: he saves Joseph's life (Gn 37 21, 22, 29), acts as spokesman for the others (Gn 42 22 ff.), and pledges his two sons to Jacob as surety for the return of Benjamin from Egypt (42 37).

In this article the history of the separate tribes will not be followed later than the era of the Judges. For subsequent conditions, see Israel.

4. Tribal History.

During the desert march the tribes, according to P, were divided into four groups. Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun encamped on the E. of the sanctuary and formed the van in the march; they were followed by Reuben, Simeon, and Gad to the S. of the Tabernacle. After them came, in two divisions, Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin, followed by Dan, Asher, and Naphtali, the former pitching their tents to the W. and the latter to the N. of the tent of meeting (Nu ch. 2). A list of the clans of the various tribes may be found in Gn ch. 46 and Nu ch. 26. We have also a detailed census both at the Exodus (Nu 1 2) and thirty-eight years later, at the close of the wanderings (Nu ch. 26). The tribes of Judah and Ephraim played the most important part in the history of the nation, and there was a constant duel between the two for the hegemony of Israel.

Judah's position in the van of the desert march indicated the preeminence of this tribe, which numbered 76,500 at the second census (Nu 26 22). By the admission of a Kenite element (Jg 1 16) and two Kenizzite clans, Caleb and Othniel (Jg 1 12-16, 20; Jos 14 6-15, 15 13-19), this tribe was materially increased. Judah absorbed Simeon also, which had dwindled during the desert wanderings from 59,300 (Nu 1 23) to 22,000 (Nu 26 12 ff.). Simeon is mentioned neither in the Blessing of Moses (Dt ch. 33) nor in the Song of Deborah (Jg ch. 5). These omissions clearly indicate that as early as the period of the Judges this tribe had lost its identity, and there is ample evidence for its absorption by Judah. In the conquest it acted with Judah (Jg 1 3). The territory allotted to Simeon (Jos 19 1-9) really belonged to Judah (cf. Jos 15 26-32, 42), and after the Exile only Judahites are mentioned as inhabiting these cities (Neh 11 26 ff.). The territory of Judah naturally falls into four parts: (1) The hill-country (Jos 15 48 ff.); (2) the wilderness, running from the central range to the shores of the Dead Sea (Jos 15 61 ff.); (3) the Shephelah, lying between the Maritime plain and the higher hills (Jos 15 33 ff.); (4) the Negeb or 'South' on the extreme south (Jos 15 21 ff.). The S. boundary of Judah ran from the lower end of the Dead Sea by way of Kadesh-barnea to Wâdy el-ʿArīsh; the N. border extended in an irregular line from Kiriathjearim, in the Shephelah, to En-rogel, in the vicinity of Jerusalem, and then passed on to the Jordan (Jos 18 11-20). Judah is not mentioned in the Song of Deborah (Jg ch. 5), and was evidently at that early period working out its own destiny, quite independently of the other tribes.

Immediately to the N., separating Judah from its chief rival, lay the territory of the small but heroic tribe of Benjamin. History verifies the poetic oracle, "Benjamin is a wolf that raveneth" (Gn 49 27); for the tribe was martial, being famous for its archers and slingers (Jg 20 16; I Ch 8 40, 12 2), and among its warriors it numbered Ehud, Saul, and Jonathan. It took part with the Northern tribes in the campaign against Sisera (5 14). The line separating its territory from that of Ephraim ran from the Jordan near Jericho by the way of Bethel (counted to Benjamin in Jos 18 13, to Ephraim in I Ch 7 28) to Bethhoron the lower. Ephraim occupied the middle portion of the land north of Benjamin, and ideally at least, its territory extended from the Jordan down to the seacoast (Jos 16 6 ff., 17 7 ff.). In two poetic oracles (Gn 49 22-26; Dt 33 13-17) the closely related tribes Ephraim and Manasseh are promised a fertile soil and indomitable military courage. The former was unable fully to conquer its allotment; for Gezer remained in the hands of the Canaanites until the reign of Solomon, but is said to have captured Aijalon and Shaalbim, both originally Danite territory (Jg 1 35 ff.). Ephraim absorbed Canaanite elements, especially at Shechem (Jg 9 1 ff.). In consequence of haughty demeanor as chief tribe, there was considerable friction between it and leaders from other parts of Israel, e.g., Gideon and Jephthah. Among its tribal heroes we find Joshua, Samuel, and Jeroboam I. After the disruption of the monarchy, Ephraim became a designation of the Northern Kingdom.

Before proceeding further N. let us turn to the valleys of Aijalon and Sorek, which lie to the NW. of Jerusalem. In the original allotment of the land, these fell to Dan (Jos 19 40-48). The taunt of Deborah (Jg 5 17), "And Dan, why did he remain in ships?" indicates that at one time its territory extended down to the seacoast. It may have occupied Joppa (Jg 1 34 ff.). A majority of this tribe, unable to maintain their position and hemmed in by Amorites and Philistines, were forced to migrate to the extreme N., and conquered the city Laish (Jg 18 7, 27 ff.). Samson belonged to the portion of the tribe that remained behind in their original quarters. In the Blessing of Jacob, Dan is likened to "a serpent in the way, an adder in the path, that biteth the horse's heels" (Gn 49 16, 17); in the Blessing of Moses, to "a lion's whelp, that leapeth forth from Bashan" (Dt 33 22). Both similes characterize the tribe as lurking in ambush and suddenly darting forth to attack the foe. This poetic description agrees with the narrative of Jg ch. 18, which tells of the sudden descent of 600 warriors of this tribe upon the peaceful and defenseless inhabitants of Laish (thereafter named Dan).

Directly N. of Ephraim lay the territory of the western branch of the tribe Manasseh. Its allotment stretched westward to the brook Kanah and included cities along the southern edge of the plain of Esdraelon. Here also the conquest was only partial, and important points such as Bethshan, Dor, Endor, Taanach, and Megiddo (Jg 1 27 ff.; cf. Jos 17 11 ff.) remained in the possession of the Canaanites. It is surprising that Manasseh is not mentioned in the Song of Deborah (Jg ch. 5), as its territory was close to the battle-field where Sisera was vanquished. [It may be referred to, however, under the term "Machir," a leading clan, in ver. 14. —EDS.] Of Israel's early heroes, Gideon belonged to this tribe. The southern and eastern part of the plain of Esdraelon and the range of Gilboa fell to the lot of Issachar (Jos 19 17-23). The famous Via Maris passed through this territory and was a source of great wealth (Dt 33 19). The poetic characterization of Gn 49 14-15 makes Issachar a strong tribe which succumbed to the enticements of a favorable situation, and was subjugated by the Canaanites (cf. Jg 1 27-33). The men of Issachar ardently espoused the cause of the tribes in the campaign against Sisera (Jg 5 15). In the age of the Judges Naphtali was a brave and patriotic tribe, producing Barak (Jg 5 18), and taking part in Gideon's war of liberation from the Midianites (Jg 7 33). Its territory lay to the E. of Asher and Zebulun, and directly W of the Sea of Galilee, stretching northward to the waters of Merom and the sources of the Jordan. The fertility of this region is proverbial; Josephus spoke of it as a terrestrial paradise, and modern travelers have vied with one another in exhausting their vocabulary to describe the richness and the productivity of the soil —qualities which were noted by ancient Hebrew poets (Gn 49 21; Dt 33 23). The region of which Naphtali's territory was a part later bore the name Galilee, and has been hallowed as no other portion of Palestine, except Jerusalem, by the footsteps of our Lord in His earthly life and ministry. Another tribe which threw itself energetically into the struggle with Sisera was Zebulun (Jg 5 18), but in later periods it played a very unimportant part in the history of Israel. The situation of its territory was especially favorable. According to the limits as given in Jos 19 10-16, it was entirely inland, being bounded on the S. by Issachar, on the W. by Asher, and on the E. and N. by Naphtali. These boundaries included the plain of Asochis. The Blessing of Joseph (Gn 49 13) speaks of this territory in terms which imply an outlet to the sea: "Zebulun shall dwell at the haven of the sea; And he shall be for a haven of ships; And his border shall be upon Zidon." It is possible that the boundaries of the tribe varied at different periods of history, and at one time it had an outlet to the sea, as Josephus states. Zebulun was associated with Issachar as growing rich from maritime commerce: "For they shall suck the abundance of the seas" (Dt 33 19). Zebulun's territory was also a part of that larger section later known as Galilee, and the landscape was "richly diversified with sylvan vale, fruitful plain, and breezy height." Asher received as its portion a strip of coastland, stretching from Mt. Carmel to Phœnicia (Jos 19 24-31). It was very fertile and especially adapted to the culture of the olive (Dt 33 24). From this section food was exported for the royal table (Gn 49 20). This tribe only partially conquered its territory; for among the cities allotted to it were Acco, Tyre, and Sidon, which never became Israelitic; it was gradually amalgamated with the Canaanites (Jg 1 31), and did not join the tribes to throw off the yoke of Sisera (Jg 5 17). In the inscriptions of Seti I and Rameses II, Asher ('-s-ru) is the designation of the Phœnician interior highland, and hence some maintain that originally Asher was a geographical term.

Moses gave permission to Reuben, Gad, and half-Manasseh to settle E. of the Jordan, provided that they took part in the conquest of the territory assigned to the other tribes (Nu ch. 32). Poetry and history agree in representing Gad as a brave and martial tribe: "Gad, a troop shall press upon him; but he shall press upon their heel" (Gn 49 19; cf. Dt 33 20). Its environment induced such a character, for the Ammonites, Moabites, and other desert tribes frequently raided its territory (Jg ch. 11). Some of David's bravest warriors, "whose faces were like the faces of lions, and they were as swift as the roes upon the mountains," were Gadites (I Ch 12 8). According to Nu 32 34-36, the territory of Gad lay E. and NE. of the Dead Sea. The cities of this list were situated between the Jabbok and the Arnon. The allotment of Joshua (13 24-28) assigned territory to Gad which stretched from the Sea of Galilee southward to the land of the Ammonites. No doubt the fortunes of war made the boundaries vary at different periods. The inscription of Mesha (q.v.) corroborates the statements of Scripture: "and the men of Gad dwelt in the land of Aṭaroth from of old" (line 11), and several other Gadite cities are mentioned in the inscription. Reuben was an important tribe in the age of the Judges, for it is severely upbraided for not taking any part in the common defense during the great crisis when the Northern tribes defeated Sisera (Jg 5 15-17). The Reubenites must have suffered greatly at the hands of the Moabites, whose territory adjoined, for their numbers dwindle and they are not heard of in later history. The list of their towns is given in Jos 13 15-23, and they were so situated as to form an enclave within the territory of Gad (Nu 32 37, 38). As Judah absorbed Simeon, so Gad swallowed up Reuben. The character of the land and its effects on tribal history are put in his inimitable style by G. A. Smith: "These high, fresh moors, the dust of whose paths still bear no footmark save those of sheep and cattle, had attracted two tribes, which, not crossing the Jordan, failed, like the others, to rise from the pastoral to the agricultural stage of life." Reuben produced no great national hero. After the defeat of Og, the trans-Jordanic portion of the tribe of Manasseh occupied the land E. of the Jordan as far S. as the Jabbok. Their territory extended northward to the lower slopes of Hermon, and to the NE., including a large portion of the Hauran. The villages of Jair were allotted to Manasseh (Dt 3 14). The eastern clans of this tribe held to their pastoral mode of life, and had difficulty in maintaining their position against the nomads of the desert and the Ammonites.

Of Levi as a secular tribe little is known. The meaning of the name is uncertain; the view that "Levi" is not a tribal name, but a professional title (cf. lawi'u, 'priest,' on Minean Inscriptions), is only a conjecture. The fact that Moses was a member of this tribe, as well as its devotion to the cause of Jehovah (Ex 32 25 ff.), gained it the privileges of priestly rank. Early in the history of Israel the Levites became custodians of the sanctuary and its furniture (Nu 3 5). As the priestly tribe, it had no definite territory, but forty-eight cities were allotted to it (Nu 35 1-4); cf. also PRIESTHOOD, §§ 2 (c), 4, 9.

TRIBUTE. See TAX.

TROAS, trō'as. See ALEXANDRIA TROAS.

TROGYLLIUM, tro-jil'i-um (Τρωγύλλιον): The promontory at the foot of Mt. Mycale, in the province of Caria, nearly opposite the island of Samos and not far to the NW of Miletus. It was here, according to the AV of Ac 20 15, that Paul's ship tarried for part of a day on its voyage along the Asian coast, being detained, probably, by contrary winds. The place of anchorage is still called St. Paul's port. In the channel between Trogyllium and Samos the Greeks destroyed the Persian fleet in 479 B.C. J. R. S. S.

TROOP: Apart from its strict military sense, this term appears in AV for: (1) gadh, the name for the god of 'fortune' (Gn 30 11, "fortunate" RV = Heb. 'with fortune'). In Is 65 11 (RV "fortune"), it is the name of the Phœnician and Aramaic god. See FORTUNE and SEMITIC RELIGION, § 22. (2) 'ōraḥ (Job 6 19, "caravan" RV). C. S. T.

TROPHIMUS, trof'i-mus (Τρόφιμος): A native of Ephesus (Ac 20 4, 21 29) who, with Tychicus, represented the churches of the province of Asia in the presentation of the Gentile gifts to the church in Jerusalem. The Gentile origin of T. is further attested by the tumult occasioned by the suspicion that Paul had taken him into the Temple (Ac 21 29). In II Ti 4 20 T. is said to have been left behind at Miletus, on the occasion of Paul's final journey to Rome. J. M. T.

TRUCE-BREAKERS: The AV rendering of the Gr. ἄσπονδοι, found only in II Ti 3 3. The original term means, literally, 'without a libation,' i.e., 'without treaty,' the sealing of which was signified by a libation (cf. Thuc. 1, 37). It was thus used to denote unwillingness to enter into a covenant, i.e., in the sense of 'implacable' (so in the AV of Ro 1 31 as the rendering of the Textus Receptus, and in the RV of II Ti 3 3; cf. Dem. De Corona, 314 16). J. M. T.

TRUMPET. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 3 (2).

TRUMPETS, FEAST OF. See FASTS AND FEASTS, § 2.

TRUTH: The rendering of two Heb. words, 'Ĕmeth, 'Ĕmūnāh, whose primary idea is that of stability or firmness. From this sense to that of constancy, the transition is imperceptible. That which is stable is to be depended upon; consequently, even to running water is ascribed the property of truth (Is 33 16, "sure"). In the next stage, the idea is developed into conscious fidelity (loyalty, honesty) to that which is known to be good, and the conception of truth as a moral quality in a person comes into view. Truth in this sense is primarily the attribute of God Himself—perfect consistency with Himself (Ex 34 6; Ps 25 5, 43 3, etc.).

1. O T Terms.

God's truth, however, is most of all emphasized in His relation to His covenant people. It is this quality in Him which encourages His own to trust Him. Therefore, it becomes the ground of their hope that their prayers to Him are heard, and that their taking refuge in Him in time of trouble is effective. His truth is, therefore, preeminently combined with His mercy (Ps 25 10, 26 3, 40 10, 85 10, 89 14, 108 5). But it is also combined with His righteousness (Ps 45 4, 111 8). God's truth is the ground of His righteous judgment (Neh 9 33). This leads to the definition of truth as the truthfulness of God, in the sense that what He says corresponds to His own being and, therefore, to reality in all particulars. All that proceeds from His mouth is truth (Is 45 23)—the uncorrupted, unadulterated expression of His own being and will. (For the N T reproduction of this general idea, cf. such passages as Ro 3 7 [ἀλήθεια], 3 3 [πίστις]; I Co 1 9; I Th 5 24; He 10 23; I P 4 19; I Jn 1 9 [πιστός] as applied to Christ; cf. He 2 17 [ἐλεήμων καὶ πιστός]; Rev 5 [πιστός], 3 14, 19 11 [πιστὸς καὶ ἀληθινός]; also § 4, below.)

2. God's Truth.

What is an excellence in God is viewed as equally an excellence in man. The king, as exercising prerogatives of sovereignty, must be especially characterized by the same truth which distinguishes God (Ps 45 4; Pr 20 28). As constancy is to be measured, first of all, by conformity to outward reality in man, the characteristic of always conforming to fact comes to be recognized as truth; so that veracity in speech is, above all other things, truth. The man of truth is he whose words can be trusted, because his utterances are exact representations of outward realities. And this sort of truth, or truthfulness, is an accompaniment of the fear of God (Ex 18 21; Ps 15 2). The duty of truthfulness in social relations thus becomes one of the most important obligations, and its opposite is a grievous evil (Ps 101 7; Pr 12 17). A philosophical conception of truth does not appear in the O T. Expressions like "buy the truth" (Pr 23 23) refer, not to truth in the abstract or, in general, objectively viewed, but to truth as an inner equipment of character.

3. Truth in Man.

The content of the N T term (ἀλήθεια) is partly derived from the O T through the mediation of the LXX. and the Apocrypha. In the LXX. the O T conception is frequently rendered by "faithfulness" (πίστις and derivatives; cf., e.g., as regards the Divine character and conduct Ro 3 3; I Co 1 9, 10, 13; I Th 5 24; II Th 3 3; He 10 23, 11 11; I P 4 19; I Jn 1 9; He 2 17; Rev 1 5, 3 14); but it is also rendered by the more classical term (as in the N T), with the emphasis on the objective side of reality and consistency with reality. This combination of the two notions is carried through the Apocrypha (cf. To 3 2; Sir 27 9 and To 7 10; Jth 5 5; IV Mac 5 10). Accordingly, the progress of the N T thought is from the original etymological conception of ἀλήθεια, as reality, to that of conformity to reality; then to the expression of that conformity, i.e., veracity, and, lastly, to moral or spiritual reality, especially as embodied in the words and person of Jesus Christ.

4. N T Conception.

In the individual portions of the N T the following shades of meaning appear: (1) In the Synoptic Gospels and Acts the truth is plain reality. In the phrase "of a truth" (Lk 22 59; Ac 4 27) there is a manifest effort to lay emphasis on the actuality of what is asserted, though it might appear unexpected or surprising. Otherwise, truth is correspondence to the reality in speech or representation (Mk 5 33). (2) In Ja, I and II P and He, the truth is the body of Christian teaching which believers accept and present to the world (Ja 1 18, 3 14; I P 1 22; II P 2 2; He 10 26). (3) In the Pauline writings, there is an occasional reversion to the O T sense of the Divine faithfulness (Ro 3 7 [cf. also 3 3, πίστις], 15 8), and occasional equivalency with human veracity (I Co 5 8; II Co 7 14); but, in the main, the truth is the body of thought which God has revealed to men for the purpose of drawing them out of sin to the love of Himself. It is not exactly identical, but generally synonymous, with Paul's favorite term, "the gospel" (Eph 1 13; cf. also Gal 2 5, 14, 5 7; I Ti 3 15; Ro 2 8). (4) In the Johannine literature the primary conception of simple reality emerges occasionally (I Jn 3 18; II Jn ver. 1, III Jn ver. 1), and with it the sense of accord with reality, as in the phrase "to speak the truth" (Jn 8 46, 16 7); but predominantly, the truth is a view of eternal moral and spiritual reality hypostatically conceived. Consequently, we find such terms as "to witness to the truth" (Jn 5 33, 18 37), "the truth makes free" (Jn 8 32), it "sanctifies" (Jn 17 19). In its highest and most significant sense, it is embodied in the person of the Incarnate Logos (Jn 14 6). A. C. Z.

5. Special N T Developments.

TRYPHÆNA, trī-fī'na, AND TRYPHOSA, trī-fō'sa (Τρύφαινα, Τρυφῶσα): Two Christian women mentioned in Ro 16 12. Both names occur in inscriptions (cf. Lightfoot, Com. on Philippians, p. 175 f.). For the story concerning "Queen Tryphæna" see Acts of Paul and Thecla. Whether she is to be identified with the queen of Pontus mentioned on coins is uncertain. See Ramsay The Church and the Roman Empire, p. 382. J. M. T.

TRYPHOSA. See TRYPHÆNA AND TRYPHOSA.

TUBAL, tū'bal. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

TUBAL-CAIN, tū'bal-kān' (תּוּבַל קַיִן tūbhal-qayin): The son of Lamech and Zillah, and the "father of all who do smith's work" (Gn 4 22). The word qayin is understood by some to mean "of Cain" (the tribe); while others think it should probably be translated "smith," and not be taken as part of a double name. He was perhaps the eponymous ancestor of Tubal (= the Tibarenians) SE. of the Black Sea (Gn 10 2; Ezk 27 13; Is 66 19). C. S. T.

TWIN BROTHERS (Διόσκουροι, i.e., Castor and Pollux): These were two deities, regarded as the tutelary gods of sailors (Ac 28 11). The ship on which the Apostle Paul sailed either had an inscription indicating that it was dedicated to these deities, or figures of them ornamented its prow. See also GREEK AND ROMAN RELIGION, § 6, and SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2. E. E. N.

TYCHICUS, tik'i-cus (Τυχικός): A disciple of Paul, and the bearer of the Colossian letter, who in addition conveyed oral information concerning Paul's state (Col 4 7 f.). Almost exactly the same words are found in Eph 6 21 f., which, on the assumption of the independence of the passages, shows T. to have been also the bearer of the circular letter known as Ephesians. In the Pastorals T. is represented as sent to Ephesus (II Ti 4 12) and to Crete (Tit 3 12). His constant association with churches in the province of Asia confirms his designation in Ac 20 4 as an Ἀσιανός, 'a native of Asia.' J. M. T.

TYPE: This word does not occur in EVV The Gr. τύπος means, primarily, 'the mark made by a blow,' 'the print left on a substance by the impact of another'; and so 'the impression of a seal on wax.' The original in such a case is the antitype. But usage is not perfectly consistent and uniform, the original being also called the type, of which the copy is an imitation, or antitype (I Th 1 7; Tit 2 7; I P 5 3). In Biblical interpretation a type is usually understood to be a person, or thing, prefiguring a future person, or thing. Adam was a type of Christ (Ro 5 14). The idea has been elaborated in great detail, involving especially the discovery of correspondences between the different rites of the sacrificial ritual and the parts of Christ's work. The science which treats of the principles and results of such correlation is called typology (cf. Fairbairn's Typology). A. C. Z.

TYRANNUS, tai-ran'us (Τύραννος): The head of a certain "school" in Ephesus, where Paul carried on his work after his withdrawal from the synagogue (Ac 19 9). The word τινος (AV "one" Tyrannus) is omitted in the best MSS. (ℵ AB), which would indicate that T. was not altogether unknown. That his school was one of considerable influence is implied by the fact that from it the entire province was reached with the gospel. According to D (also Syr. P marg.), Paul discoursed regularly in this place, ἀπὸ ὥρας έ[πέμπτης] ἕως δεκάτης, "from the fifth to the tenth hour," after the fashion of the philosophers of the time. It is probable, therefore, that T. was a regular teacher of some sort, with a following more or less large. He may have been also an adherent of the synagogue, where he was favorably affected by Paul's preaching. The use of his influence in securing an opening for the gospel would not be contrary to Paul's method (cf. Ac 17 16 f.). J. M. T.

TYRE, tair (צֹר, tsōr, 'rock' = Assyr.-Babyl. zuru, zurri): The best-known and most famous of the ancient cities of Phœnicia, located on the E. coast of the Mediterranean, just N. of the boundaries of Israel (Jos 19 29; I S 24 7), and in close proximity to Sidon. Many extra-Biblical references define the city's limits. Asshurbanipal, King of Assyria, says: "In my third campaign I marched against Ba'al, King of Tyre, who dwelt in the midst of the sea." In the Anastasi I Papyrus, T. is spoken of as a city in the sea, to which water is brought in ships, where fish are more plentiful than sand (Müller, Asien und Europa, p. 185). This is paralleled by the Biblical references in Ezk 26 17 ("in the sea") and 27 32 ("in the midst of the sea"). This city "in the sea" was located on an island containing about 142 acres. The island was distant about 1,800 ft. from the mainland, on which stood, on the testimony of ancient authors, a much larger and, in fact, a much older, city called Old Tyre.

The beginnings of T. were very ancient (Is 23 7). Herodotus tells us (II, 44) that the priests of Melkarth told him that it was founded 2,300 years before his visit, that is, about 2750 B.C. Traditions unite to locate the first city on the mainland. Safety from siege, facility in dealing with shipping, and, probably, monopoly of trade, led to the building of the city on the island. Early in Israel's history, it appears to have been a place of importance (Jos 19 29), and to have been well fortified (II S 24 7). It established numerous manufactories, both within its own walls, and on the coasts of the Mediterranean Sea, where it produced world-famous goods, such as purple dyes, metal-work, and glassware. It established trade relations with the known world, not only with the countries of the Mediterranean, but with those of every water adjacent thereto, including Egypt, the Black Sea region, and even Great Britain (Ezk ch. 27). Tradition says its sailors rounded the Cape of Good Hope. It established colonies in N. Africa and in Spain, and was so powerful in the world of his day that Isaiah (23 8) designates it as "the bestower of crowns, whose merchants are princes, whose traffickers are the honorable of the earth."

T. was in its prime in the days of David and Solomon, and played an important part in the material, commercial, political, and religious history of Israel. The friendship established between Hiram of Tyre (II S 5 11; I K 5 1 ff.) and David and Solomon became of mutual advantage to the two kingdoms, especially in the matter of the construction of Solomon's Temple, and of long sea voyages to Ophir and to Tarshish. Doubtless Israel's close relations with T. continued for several centuries, as may be inferred from the marriage of Ahab and Jezebel. Shalmaneser IV (727–722 B.C.) included T. in the same category with Samaria in 724, for he simultaneously besieged both of them. He died, however, in 722, and the siege was raised. Sennacherib, however, according to Josephus (Ant. IX, 14 2), endeavored, from 701 to 696, to reduce it; but, after plundering the coast-towns, he gave up the task, as also Esarhaddon and Asshurbanipal were compelled to do. Nebuchadrezzar likewise besieged it for thirteen years, but, finally, left it uncaptured. Ezekiel draws a most graphic picture of this important city and its relation to the trade of his day (chs. 26–28). While its activity was much checked by the numerous attacks of jealous neighbors and nations, and its wealth and glory were reduced, it did not cease to be an important commercial center (Neh 13 16). Its first humiliating capture was that by Alexander the Great in 332. In seven months, he built from the mainland a causeway 1,800 ft. long and 180 ft. wide, assaulted and captured the city, and put its inhabitants to the sword, or enrolled them as slaves. The city was repeopled and newly built. In the Greek period, it had a checkered fate, and in 198 came under the sway of the Seleucids. Pompey allowed it full autonomy in 65, which Augustus very much delimited. At the time of Christ the territory belonging to it reached down into Palestine as far as Carmel (Mt 15 21-31; Mk 7 24-31). It became a Christian center (Ac 21 3-6), and was influential in the early Church. The Crusaders captured it June 27, 1124 A.D., but lost it again to the Saracens in March, 1291 A.D. Since that day it has been a Mohammedan city. It is no longer on an island. Its mole, built by Alexander, has become so enlarged by accretions of sand that the original island is at present merely a promontory of the mainland. The modern city now contains about 4,000 inhabitants, and has none of the marine importance attached to it in Biblical times.

U

UCAL, yū'cal (אֻכָל, 'ūkhāl): An obscure word in Pr 30 1, taken as a proper noun by many interpreters. Others regard it as a verb, and would render it "[and] I am faint," or similarly. E. E. N.

UEL, yū'el (אוּאֵל, 'ū'ēl): One of those who married foreign wives (Ezr 10 34). E. E. N.

ULAI, yū'lai (אוּלַי, 'ūlay): A river near Susa (Shushan) in Persia (Dn 8 2, 16), called "Ulai" also in the Assyr. inscriptions, and known to classical writers as Eulæus. Herodotus and Strabo place Susa on the Choaspes (= modern Kercha); Pliny locates it on the Eulæus (=modern Karūn), also called the Pasitigris. According to Nöldeke, the two names are for the same river, as similar statements are made about both names. Delitzsch places the Ulai E. of Susa, and locates the city on the Choaspes. The rivers have so changed their channels that it is difficult to make any sure identifications. C. S. T.

ULAM, yū'lam (אוּלָם, 'ūlām): 1. The son of Sheresh, a Manassite (I Ch 7 16 f.). 2. A Benjamite, father of a family of noted archers (I Ch 8 39 f.). E. E. N.

ULLA, ul'la (עֻלָּא, 'ullā'): The ancestor of a family of Asher (I Ch 7 39). E. E. N.

UMMAH, um'mā (עַמָּה, 'ummāh): A city of Asher (Jos 19 30). Probably a scribal mistake for "Acco." E. E. N.

UNGODLY: This term is the translation of: (1) beliyya'al, 'worthlessness' in AV in II S 22 5; Ps 18 4 ("ungodliness" RV) and in Pr 16 27, 19 28 ("worthless" RV). (2) lo' ḥāsīdh, 'unkind' (Ps 43 1). (3) 'āwīl, 'unjust.' (4) rāshā', 'wicked' (II Ch 19 2; Job 34 18; Ps 1 1, 4, 5, 6, 3 7, 73 12). In the N T it is used as a translation of ἀσεβής, 'impious' (Ro 4 5, 5 6; I Ti 1 9; I P 4 18; II P 2 5, 3 7; Jude vs. 4, 15 L. B. P

UNICORN. See Palestine, § 24.

UNKNOWN GOD: Because of the multitude of gods, the Greeks always feared that some god might be offended by unintentional neglect in prayer or sacrifice; so that altars to anonymous gods were not uncommon (cf. Pausanias, Philostratus), to appease deities that might otherwise have been overlooked. On an altar in Athens was the inscription, ΑΓΝΩΣΤΩ ΘΕΩ, 'To an [not the] unknown god.' This was noticed by Paul and used by him as a significant, as well as convenient, text with which to begin the defense of himself before the Areopagus (Ac 17 23). The phrase "too superstitious" (ver. 22 AV) should read "somewhat religious," or "religious beyond others" ("very religious" RV). See also Religion. J. R. S. S.

UNLEARNED: This word is used to render (1) ἀγράμματος in the sense of 'totally illiterate' (Ac 4 13); (2) ἀμαθής, an 'ignorant' or 'uninstructed' person (II P 3 16, "ignorant" RV); (3) ἀπαίδευτος, an 'uneducated' person (II Ti 2 23, "ignorant" RV); (4) ἰδιώτης, 'one in private life' 'non-professional,' 'inexpert,' or 'uninformed' (I Co 14 16, 23 f.). A. C. Z.

UNLEAVENED. See Sacrifice and Offerings, § 13, and Fasts and Feasts, § 2 (2).

UNNI, un'ni (עַנִּי, 'unnī): 1. One of those appointed by direction of David to be doorkeeper of the sanctuary (I Ch 15 18, 20). 2. See Unno. E. E. N.

UNSHOD: This term renders the adj. yāḥēph, 'barefoot,' the usual translation (II S 15 30; Is 20 2 ff.). In Jer 2 25 Judah is warned lest she wear out her shoes in running after foreign gods and allies. Hitzig, ad loc., finds a reference to certain acts connected with Baal-worship. C. S. T.

UPHAZ, yū'faz (אוּפָז, 'ūphāz): This term occurs only in Jer 10 9 and Dn 10 5. In case a prenomen is intended, the Heb. spelling is probably an error for אוֹפִר, 'ōphīr, Ophir (so Targum and Syr. Hexapla). It is possible, but not probable, that the original reading was mōphāz, 'pure,' as in I K 10 18; cf. Giesebrecht in Handkommentar z. A T (1907), ad loc. E. E. N.

UPPER ROOM. See JERUSALEM, § 42; see also HOUSE, § 6 (a).

UPRIGHT: This is the rendering of yāshār, in all cases in which the word has an ethical meaning. It denotes primarily 'even,' 'level,' and is used of roads in a number of passages. Then it is applied figuratively to persons and to actions in the sense of 'impartial,' 'equitable,' 'just,' much as we use the adjectives 'straight' and 'square.' L. B. P.

UR, ūr (אוּר, 'ūr; Babylonian, uru, 'fire'): I. The designation of an ancient Babylonian city, commonly called "Ur of the Chaldees." Its importance is enhanced by the fact that it is regarded in the O T as the birthplace of Abraham (Gn 11 28, 31, 15 7; Neh 9 7), and the place from which he migrated to Haran in Mesopotamia, and thence to Canaan. Its site has been variously identified, but the most probable location of this ancient seat is at the modern Mugheir, or Mukayyar (='bitumened'), on the right or W. bank of the Euphrates, about 140 m. SE. of the site of old Babylon, and about 125 m. NW of the present Persian Gulf, near the junction of the Shatt-el-Hai with the Euphrates. It was one of the seats of worship of the moon-god Sin, as was also Haran, to which Abraham migrated. Its proximity to the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf (for at that day the latter reached more than 100 m. further inland than it does to-day) made this city an important commercial and political center. Located, as it was, in a group of strong religious and commercial cities, it occupied a preeminent place in the culture and commerce of its day. The second part of the phrase, "of the Chaldees," seems to have been due to the fact that the region in which Ur was located was in later days designated as the land of the Chaldees or Chaldæans (Babylonian mât Kaldu). The ruins of Ur at the present time cover something more than 150 acres, and are somewhat oblong in form, consisting mainly of a group of low mounds, with the remains of the usual tower or ziggurat in the northern portion of the area. Up to the present time only enough work has been done at the mound to identify it as the ancient city of Ur.

URBANUS, ūr-bē'nus (Οὐρβανός, URBANE AV): A Christian in Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation, calling him "our fellow worker" (Ro 16 9). Nothing more is known of him. E. E. N.

URI, yū'rai (אוּרִי, 'ūrī), probably the abbreviated form of "Urijah": 1. The father of Bezalel (Ex 31 2, etc.). 2. One of Solomon's stewards (I K 4 9). 3. One of the porters who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 24). E. E. N.

URIAH, yu-rai'ā (אוּרִיָּה[וּ], 'ūriyyāh[ū]), 'flame of J" or 'J" is light': 1. A Hittite warrior (Mt 1 6, Urias AV) enlisted in David's army, whom the king made a victim to his sinful infatuation for his wife Bath-sheba (II S 11 2 ff.). 2. Urijah, the chief priest of the Temple in the days of Ahaz, chosen by Isaiah as one of the two witnesses to attest the prophecy concerning Maher-shalal-hash-baz (Uriah, Is 8 2); at the king's command he built a new altar after a Syrian or Assyrian model, and in other ways acquiesced in the innovations introduced by the king (II K 16 10-16). 3. The father of Meremoth, a priest in the days of Nehemiah (Ezr 8 33; Neh 3 4, 21). 4. A priest who stood by Ezra when he read the Book of the Law before the people (Neh 8 4), possibly the same as 3. 5. Son of Shemaiah, a prophet of Kiriath-jearim (Jer 26 20-23), put to death by King Jehoiakim. A. C. Z.

URIAS, yu-rai'as. See URIAH, 1.

URIEL, yū'ri-el (אוּרִיאֵל, 'ūrī'ēl), 'my light is El': 1. A Levite, chief of the Kohathites, who assisted in bringing up the ark from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem (I Ch 6 24 [9], 15 5, 11). 2. According to II Ch 13 2, a man of Gibeah; and the maternal grandfather of Abijah. URIM, AND THUMMIM, thum'im (אוּרִים וְתֻמִּים, 'ūrīm wetummīm), 'lights and perfections' (RVmg.): A method of inquiring of God (I S 28 6), involving the use of certain stones in connection with the breastplate of judgment (Ex 28 30). Upon this breastplate were attached twelve gems, each representing one of the tribes of Israel. Josephus (Ant. III, 8 9) and some of the rabbis were of the opinion that these gems were identical with the Urim and Thummim. Following this opinion, some in modern times have conjectured that the method of divination by Urim and Thummim was the one used by the high priest when, in propounding an inquiry before God, he read the Divine answer by spelling it out in the successive flashings of light on the letters inscribed on the gems. Such an explanation would, of course, require the assumption that all the letters of the alphabet were represented on these gems. Of this there is no evidence whatever.

1. A Method of Divination.

The Urim and Thummim stones must then be distinguished from the gems of the "breastplate of judgment." They were two (possibly three) stones worn in a pouch attached to the breastplate, and so arranged as to be near the heart of the wearer. Analogues to such stones are found in the Assyrian "Tablets of Destiny" (cf. Muss-Arnolt, Urim and Thummim, in Am. Jour. of Theol. July, 1900, pp. 193 ff.), and the headless and featherless arrowshafts "of command and prohibition" among the Arabs (cf. G. F. Moore, EB, s.v.). These stones were small, and probably inscribed with distinctive signs, by which one was known as the affirmative and the other as the negative, and the third (if a third were used) non-committal or blank. Regarding their construction, no directions of any kind are given. It has been alleged that they were shaped somewhat like the teraphim (Spencer, De Legibus, III, 3); but the evidence on this point is scanty.

2. Assyrian Tablets of Destiny.

The manner of the use of the Urim and Thummim is also involved in obscurity. But the theory that there was a connection with, or analogy to, the breastplate, which the Egyptian high priest wore during legal trials (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, III, 183), is generally discountenanced as based upon very superficial resemblances. Another theory assumes that the Urim and Thummim were emblems (Kalisch, Exod. p. 544) identical with the twelve gems of the breastplate and that they symbolized the sanctification of the priest; that they were worn in order to represent to him the self-sacrifice involved in his office; but that inasmuch as they suggested his mediatorial office, they drew his mind away from self and environment and fixed it on the Divine will, stimulating supernatural insight and securing exact knowledge of that will. This view, which assumes the use of hypnotism, is out of analogy with the general conditions under which the Urim and Thummim were used, and amounts to a practical abandonment of any explanation of the institution. The facts (Dt 33 8; I S 14 41; Lv 8 7 f.; Nu 27 21) point rather to the use of the Urim and Thummim as lots. If, in answer to an inquiry, the one designated as the affirmative fell out of the pouch, the inquirer would know that God approved; if the other or negative stone fell out, he would know that God disapproved his plan. Or, in case a third anonymous or non-committal stone were used and fell out, he would know that God declined to answer (I S 28 6).

3. Method of Use.

The Urim and Thummim were used in the pre-exilic period. At the time of the Exile, they fell into disuse. Ezr 2 63 and Neh 7 65 show that they were regarded as a matter of the past. This probably accounts for the fact that the description of them in P throws so little light on them; since, when P was written, they had become only a memory. Josephus asserts that this mode of divination had ceased 200 years before his own day. A. C. Z.

UTHAI, yū'thai, yū'thê, or yū'tha-ai (עוּתַי, 'ūthay): 1. The son of Ammihud, a Judahite (I Ch 9 4). 2. One of the "sons of Bigvai," who returned from exile with Ezra (Ezr 8 14). E. E. N.

UTTERMOST, UTMOST SEA. See MEDITERRANEAN SEA.

UZ, uz (עוּץ, 'ūts): I. 1. One of the 'sons' of Aram (Gn 10 23), perhaps the eldest, and consequently a grandson of Shem (Gn 10 22), though I Ch 1 17 gives him as a son of Shem. 2. The first-born 'son' of Nahor by Milcah (Gn 22 21, Huz AV), probably settlers or a tribe in the upper Euphrates Valley or Mesopotamia. 3. One of the 'sons' of Dishan of the Edomites (Gn 36 28), perhaps a tribe which bore that name.

II. The land which is designated as the home of Job (1 1). According to ver. 3, it would seem to have been E. of Palestine, and according to 1 13-19, it was located on the edge of the desert and within raiding distance of the Sabeans and Chaldeans. Now is it possible to combine all the foregoing cases of Uz, as is done by Glaser (II, 414 ff.)? He thinks them to be identical with a section of the northwestern Arabian territory called Tihama. The Assyrian inscriptions frequently mention Uzza as a land of Syria or on the edge of Syria, hence Delitzsch locates it at or near Palmyra. But at best this is only a conjecture. The evident meaning of the first chapter, confirmed by the location of the homes of some of Job's so-called friends—viz.: Eliphaz of Teman (2 11), Bildad the Shuhite (of Shuah; cf. Gn 25 2), Elihu the Buzite (Gn 22 21)—is that Uz was a section of country bordering on the eastern Arabian desert, either in the Hauran or slightly farther N., though not so far as Palmyra. I. M. P.

UZAI, yū'zai, yū'zê, or yū'za-ai (אוּזַי, 'ūzay): One of those who repaired the walls under Nehemiah (Neh 3 25). E. E. N.

UZAL, yū'zal (אוּזָל, 'ūzāl): One of the thirteen Arabian tribes descended from Joktan (Gn 10 27). Arabic tradition looks upon it as the ancient name of Ṣan'â, the capital of Yemen in southern Arabia. It was after the Abyssinian occupation that the name "Uzal" was changed to San'â. According to one reading of Ezk 27 19, the Tyrians imported iron and spices from Uzal. San'â is situated on a stream in the center of a beautiful and fertile region, which produces two crops a year. It has played an important part in the history of Islam; in the 7th cent. it was the capital of the Zaidite Imams. Glaser, the explorer, rejects this site and advocates a position near Medina, but on subjective and inadequate grounds. J. A. K.

UZZAH, uz'ā, UZZA, uz'a (עֻזָּה 'uzzāh) (AV): 1. A son of Abinadab. When David was transferring the ark to Jerusalem, Uzzah, one of the drivers, was smitten by J" because he sacrilegiously steadied the ark (II S 6 6 ff.). 2. One from whom a garden in, or near, Jerusalem was named. It was here that the kings Manasseh and Amon were buried (II K 21 18, 26). 3. A Levite (I Ch 6 29). 4. A Benjamite (I Ch 8 7). J. A. K.

UZZEN-SHERAH, uz"en-shê'rā, UZZEN-SHEERAH, -shîr'ā. See SHEERAH.

UZZI, uz'ai (עֻזִּי, 'uzzī), abbreviated from "Uzziah" (q.v.): 1. A priest in the main line of descent from Aaron (I Ch 6 5, etc.). 2. The ancestor of a clan of Issachar (I Ch 7 2, 3). 3. The ancestor of a clan of Benjamin (I Ch 7 7). 4. The ancestral head of a Benjamite family in post-exilic Jerusalem (I Ch 9 8). 5. An overseer of Levites in Jerusalem (Neh 11 22). 6. The ancestor of a family of priests (Neh 12 19, 42). E. E. N.

UZZIA, uz-zai'a (עֻזִּיָּא, 'uzzīyā'): An Ashterathite enumerated among the valiant men of David (I Ch 11 44). E. E. N.

UZZIAH, uz-zai'ā (עֻזִּיָּהוּ, 'uzziyyāh[ū], also עֻזִּיָּא, 'uzziyyā', I Ch 11 44), 'my strength is J"': 1. Another name of Azariah, son of Amaziah, King of Judah, whom he succeeded at the age of sixteen (II K 15 1, 13, etc.; II Ch 26 3 ff.). His reign was signalized by successful wars against the Philistines, the Arabians, the Meunim, and the Ammonites. He strengthened the fortifications of Jerusalem, which were somewhat out of repair in consequence of the siege by Jehoash of Israel (II Ch 26 6-9). He also fortified the harbor city Elath, on the Red Sea, and colonized it with Jews (II K 14 22). How large a maritime enterprise he thus secured for the kingdom of Judah is not clear. The size of his army is given by the Chronicler as 307,500. But this is very improbable; such large figures are quite liable to be due to confusion and misreading. Toward the end of his reign, Uzziah became leprous, and his son Jotham assumed the reins of government (II K 15 5). The reason for this visitation is given by the Chronicler as the sin of usurping the function of the priesthood by burning incense in the Temple (II Ch 26 16-21). Uzziah's reign was also noted for a great earthquake (Zec 14 5), which was used as a chronological datum in later times.

In the famous inscription of Tiglath-pileser III, Azriyau of Yaudi is named as one of the kings paying tribute. This suggests Uzziah, but this identification, which at first met with strong support, is now generally given up. Yaudi was an Aramæan district to the N. of Palestine. 2. A Kohathite in the genealogy of Heman (I Ch 6 24). 3. The father of Jonathan, an overseer of David (I Ch 27 25). 4. A priest who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 21). 5. The father of Athaiah of a Judahite family of the post-exilic period (Neh 11 4). 6. See Uzzia. A. C. Z.

UZZIEL, uz-zai'el or uz'zi-el (עֻזִּיאֵל, 'uzzī'ēl), 'God is strong': 1. The ancestral head of one of the great divisions of Kohathite Levites (Ex 6 18, etc.), the Uzzielites (Nu 3 27). 2. One of the leaders of a band of Simonites against the Amalekites in Seir (in post-exilic days?) (I Ch 4 42). 3. The ancestor of a Benjamite clan (I Ch 7 7). 4. A chief musician (I Ch 25 4, called Azarel in ver. 18). 5. A Levite in the days of Hezekiah (II Ch 29 14). 6. One of those who repaired the wall with Nehemiah (Neh 3 8). VAGABOND: This term renders in the AV (1) the ptcpl. of nūdh, 'to wander' aimlessly as a fugitive (Gn 4 12, 14, "wanderer" RV). (2) nūa', 'totter' about as beggars (Ps 109 10). (3) περιέρχεσθαι, 'to go about' (Ac 19 13, "strolling" RV). C. S. T.

VAHEB, vê'heb. See Suphah.

VAIL. See Veil.

VAIN, VANITY: The basal conception in the word "vain" (from Lat. vanus, 'empty') is that of 'emptiness.' It conveys the idea of something that may have a certain appearance or pretense of being or possessing substance, value, etc., but is in reality of no significance. Of the following numerous Heb. and Gr. terms rendered by "vain" or "vanity" in EV, the first four express this same general idea of 'emptiness,' 'lightness,' 'transitoriness,' 'without real substance,' especially in the moral or religious sphere: (1) hebhel, 'breath,' i.e., mere breath, illusion, fancy. (a) In a more general sense in the wisdom literature (Job 7 16, 9 29, etc.; Pr 31 30; Ec 1 1, 2, 14, and often; Is 30 7, etc.). (b) Applied to wicked practises, especially idolatry (Dt 32 21; I K 16 13, 26; Jer 2 5, etc.). (2) rīq, rēq, 'to empty,' 'empty.' (a) Generally (Lv 26 16, 20; Dt 32 47; Ps 2 1; Is 49 4, etc.). (b) In a moral sense (Jg 9 4, 11 3; II S 6 20, etc.). (3) shāw', 'nothingness,' also 'deceit,' 'falsehood,' and so rendered frequently in RV (Job 7 3, 11 11, 15 31, 31 5; Ps 12 2, 24 4, 26 4, 41 6, 60 11, 144 8, etc.; Is 1 13; Ezk 13 6 ff., etc.). It is this word that is used in the Third Commandment (Ex 20 7; Dt 5 11). The common interpretation, taking the name of J" "in vain" (i.e., lightly, irreverently, or in false oaths, etc.) is disputed by some, who would interpret shāw' here as equivalent to 'with empty hands' (cf. Ex 23 15, where, however, a different Heb. word is used), and make the command a prohibition to worship J" without sacrifices. But this seems very improbable. The significance attached to the Divine name Yāhweh was very great, and that the Decalogue should emphasize the necessity of duly reverencing this name is only what would be expected. Cf. Kautzsch in HDB, extra vol., p. 640 f., and McNeile, Westminster Com. (1908), ad loc. (4) κενός (and derivatives), 'empty,' the exact N T equivalent of (2) above, but used more comprehensively (Ac 4 25; I Co 15 10; II Co 6 1; Eph 5 6, etc.). In I Ti 6 20 and II Ti 2 16 the Gr. κενοφωνία means lit. 'empty sound' ("babblings" RV).

Other terms rendered more or less consistently by "vain" or "vanity" are: (5) 'āwen, which is not 'vanity' but something positively wrong or troublesome (Job 15 35; Ps 10 7, both "iniquity" RV; Pr 22 8, "calamity" RV; Is 41 29, 58 9, "wickedly" RV; Jer 4 14, "evil" RV; Zec 10 2). (6) ḥinnam, 'gratis,' 'for naught' (Pr 1 17; Ezk 6 10). (7) nābhabh, 'to be hollow' (Job 11 12). (8) rūaḥ, 'wind' (Job 15 2, 16 3; cf. RVmg.). (9) sheqer, 'lie,' 'deceit' (Ex 5 9, "lying" RV; I S 25 21; Ps 33 17; Jer 3 23, 8 8). (10) tōhū, 'barren,' 'waste,' 'empty' (I S 12 21; Is 40 17, 23, 44 9, 45 18, "waste" RV, 19, 59 4). (11) sāphāh in Is 36 5 means 'lip' and the lit. expression is "word of lips"; "vain" is not in the original. (12) μάταιος, ματαιότης, μάτην, all having the general idea of 'futility,' 'uselessness' (Mt 15 9; Ac 14 15; Ro 8 20; I Co 3 20; Ja 1 26, etc.). (13) εἰκῇ, the N T equivalent of (6) above (Ro 13 4; I Co 15 2; Gal 3 4, 4 11; Col 2 18). (14) δωρεάν, 'freely,' 'as a gift' (Gal 2 21, but here in the sense 'to no purpose'). E. E. N.

VAIZATHA, vai'za-tha (וַיְזָתָא, wayzāthā', Vajezatha, va-jez'a-tha AV): A son of Haman (Est 9 9). E. E. N.

VALE, VALLEY: The term "vale" is the rendering in both versions of 'ēmeq (Gn 14 3, 8, 10, 37 14; also in RV Gn 14 17; Jos 8 13, 15 8, 18 16; I S 17 2, 19, 21 9; cf. also "king's dale," Gn 14 17; II S 18 18). This term 'ēmeq, 'deepening,' is (1) "a highlander's word for valley, as he looks down into it," and is commonly used of broad valleys running up into the mountains, as the Vale of Elah (I S 17 19, etc.), of Aijalon (Jos 10 12), of Jezreel (Jos 17 16; Jg 6 33), etc. It seems to be used also of the maritime plain (Jg 1 19, 34; cf. Jer 47 5). It occurs also as opposed to mountains or hill-country (q.v.) (Mic 1 4; Jg 1 19, 34, 5 15; I K 20 28, etc.); an 'ēmeq was broad enough for chariots (Jos 17 16; Job 39 21); was cultivated (Is 6 13; Ps 65 13 [14]; Job 39 10; Song 2 1, etc.), and was suitable for herding (I Ch 27 29). Other words rendered by "valley" are (2) biq'āh, a 'cleft,' i.e., a broad opening in the midst of hills, and in some passages rendered "plain" (q.v.). It is the opposite of hār, 'mountain' (Dt 8 7, 11 11; Is 41 18, 63 14; Ps 104 8). The term biq'āh is used for Valley of Jericho (Dt 34 3), of Mizpeh (Jos 11 8), of Lebanon (Jos 11 17, 12 7), of Megiddo (II Ch 35 22; Zec 12 11). The RV has "valley" for "plain" AV in Ezk 37 1, 2 and Am 1 5. (3) gay', gay, ge' (Is 40 40), gē (Zec 14 4), a 'depression,' 'gorge,' or 'ravine.' It is always rendered "valley" and was narrower than the 'ēmeq. It is the opposite of mountain and hill (Jos 8 11; Mic 1 6; Is 17 3; II K 2 16; Is 40 4, etc.). It is used with names for specific valleys. The RV reads "Ge-harashim" (I Ch 4 14), and "Gai" (I S 17 52, "Gath" RVmg.). (4) naḥal, 'torrent,' 'torrent-valley,' 'wâdy.' It is often used for the bed of a 'torrent' or 'brook,' even when there is no water (Nu 21 12, 32 9; Dt 1 24, 3 16, 21 4, 6; Jg 16 4; I S 15 5; II S 24 5, "river" AV; II Ch 33 14; Job 21 33, 30 6; Ps 104 10; Pr 30 17; Song 6 11; Is 7 19, 57 5, 6, "stream" AV; Jl 3 [4] 18; also for "brook" AV, Nu 13 23 f.; II Ch 20 16). A naḥal was a suitable place for digging wells (Gn 26 17, 19; cf. II K 3 16, 17). The RV always has "valley of the Arnon" river (Dt 2 24, 36, etc.). For the similitude see Nu 24 6. Oxf. Heb. Lex. with other authorities suggests "palm-trees" for "valleys." (5) shᵉphēlāh, 'lowlands,' the Shephelah (q.v.) of Judah, see PALESTINE, § 7 (b). The RV always has "lowlands" for "valley" and "plain" AV (Dt 1 7; Ob ver. 19; Zec 7 7). (6) φάραγξ, "valley" (Lk 3 5) for ge' (Is 40 4); see (3) above. On the usage of the foregoing words, cf. also G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 384. C. S. T.

VALIANT MAN, MAN OF VALOR: These expressions are often used of men, characterizing them as 'men of war,' or 'warlike.' They render: (1) gibbōr, 'strong,' 'mighty,' always in this sense (I Ch 7 2, 5, 11 26, "mighty" RV; II Ch 13 3; Song 3 7, "mighty" RV). (2) 'īsh- ('man of'), ben- ('son of'), or gibbōr- ('mighty man of'), ḥayil, 'strength,' 'efficiency,' 'wealth.' These latter Heb. expressions denote also personal qualities of courage, prowess (Jg 18 2; I S 18 17; II S 2 7, 13 28, 17 10; II K 5 1; II Ch 26 17, etc.); skill or ability (I K 11 28; cf. Gn 47 6; Ex 18 21; Pr 31 10); virtue or worth (I K 1 42; I S 10 26, the opposite of "worthless," ver. 27). The meaning 'man of substance' ("wealth" AV) is also found (Ru 2 1 RVmg.; I S 9 1 RV; cf. II K 15 20). C. S. T.

VALLEY (or VALE) OF ACHOR, AIJALON, BACA, BERACHA, ELAH, ESCHOL, FERAR, GIBEON, HAMON GOG, HEBRON, IPHTAEL, JEHOSHAPHAT, JERICHO, JEZREEL, JIPHTHAHEL, LEBANON, MEGIDDO, MIZPEH, SALT, SHITTIM, SIDDIM, SOREK, SUCCOTH, ZARED, ZEBOIM, ZEPHATHAH. See ACHOR; AIJALON; BACA, etc.

VALLEY (or VALE) OF CHARASHIM and of CRAFTSMEN. See GE-HARASHIM.

VALLEY OF DECISION. See JERUSALEM, § 5.

VALLEY (or VALE) OF HINNOM, REPHAIM, SHAVEH, SON OF HINNOM. See JERUSALEM, §§ 6–8; also SHAVEH.

VALLEY OF KEZIZ. See EMEK-KEZIZ.

VALLEY OF SLAUGHTER: A symbolic name for the Valley of Hinnom (Jer 7 32, 19 6). E. E. N.

VALLEY OF VISION: A part of the title (probably affixed by an editor) of one of Isaiah's threatening prophecies against Jerusalem (Is 22 1). It is difficult to see just what suggested the caption—possibly ver. 5. The LXX. reads "Valley of Sion." E. E. N.

VANIAH, va-nai'ā (וַנְיָה, wānyāh): One of the "sons of Bani" (Ezr 10 36). E. E. N.

VAPOR: This word renders: (1) 'ēdh, a term of doubtful meaning, probably related to the Assyr. edû, 'flood,' 'overflowing water' (Gn 2 6 "mist," LXX. "spring," Job 36 27 "vapor," LXX. "clouds"). (2) nāsī', 'that which is lifted up,' always associated with 'ascending' (Ps 135 7; Jer 10 13; 51 16). (3) 'ālāh, 'that which goes up' (Job 36 33 AV but "[the storm] that cometh up" RV). (4) qīṭōr, 'smoke'; cf. Gn 19 28 (Ps 148 8 AV, but "stormy wind" RV), and (5) ἀτμίς, 'breath' (Ja 4 14; Ac 2 19, "vapor of smoke" [from the LXX. of Jl 2 30, where the Heb. is correctly rendered by AV and RV "pillars of smoke"]). A. C. Z.

VASHNI, vash'nai (וַשְׁנִי, washnī): The oldest son of Samuel, according to the Heb. text of I Ch 6 28. But the word "Joel" (cf. I S 8 2) should be inserted (cf. RV). "Vashni" would then be read "and the second." E. E. N.

VASHTI, vash'tai (וַשְׁתִּי, washtī): Queen of Ahasuerus (Est 1 9, etc.). See ESTHER, BOOK OF, §§ 2, 6. E. E. N.

VAT (FAT AV) and WINE-VAT (WINE-FAT AV). See VINES AND VINTAGE, § 1.

VEDAN, vē'dan (וְדָן, wᵉdhān): One of the commercial feeders of Tyre (Ezk 27 19), perhaps either Adin or Weddân, between Medina and Mecca (Bertholet, Hand-Kom., ad loc.). Several other readings have been suggested. The text of the entire verse is very uncertain, the LXX. omitting it altogether. A. S. C.

VEGETABLES. See PALESTINE, §§ 21, 22, 23, and FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 3.

VEHEMENT: This term in the AV of Jon 4 8, "sultry" RV, renders a Heb. word, ḥărīshīth, apparently from a root meaning 'to cut'; hence, strictly. 'cutting [distressing] wind'; but as the wind in question is also said to have been an east wind, what is meant is the hot, blasting wind from the desert. A. C. Z.

VEIL. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8, and TEMPLE, § 33.

VEIN. See MINE, MINING.

VENGEANCE: This term renders (1) nāqām, nᵉqāmāh, from nāqam, 'to avenge.' It is predominantly of God that vengeance is asserted (Jg 11 36; Is 34 8; Gn 4 15). (2) δίκη, 'justice' (so in RV of Ac 28 4; but in RV of Jude ver. 7, "punishment"). (3) ὀργή, 'wrath' (so in RV of Ro 3 5). (4) ἐκδίκησις, 'the full meting out of just retribution' (Lk 21 22; Ro 12 19; II Th 1 8; He 10 30). See also BLOOD, AVENGER OF, and GOD, § 2. A. C. Z.

VENISON. See FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 10.

VERMILION (שָׁשָׁר, shāshar): This word denotes primarily the red ocher used in painting wood, and then the color itself (Jer 22 14; Ezk 23 14). A. C. Z.

I. GREEK VERSIONS OF THE O T.

1. Introductory.

1. The New Era of Greek Culture After Alexander.

The battle of Chæronea (338 B.C.) meant for Greece the loss of political freedom and injured forever the creative intellectual life of its people. Independent thought and poetry gave place to imitations of the great works of the past; philosophy, comedy, and bucolic poetry flourished, but the old-time luxuriance which characterized the literature of the past was absent. The period of learning had come, and the scholars of Greece were busied with garnering the harvest made possible by the old literature. Before this Alexander had created a world-empire, which caused the spread of Greek culture far beyond its natural limits. From the ruins of this empire Hellenistic kingdoms sprang up and spread Greek civilization farther still. The power of these kingdoms was due to the superiority of their civilization. Greek was the language of the courts; from the courts Greek spread among the common people, whose dealings with the officials made a knowledge of Greek imperative. The learning of this tongue by the subject races reacted, however, upon the Greeks, whose scholars and travelers, always inquisitive, learned and wrote much about the people and their lands, the fauna and the flora of which were hitherto practically unknown. These foreign countries even gave new gods to Greece; to their surprise they discovered that some peoples, hitherto classed as barbarians, had much to recommend them, though their literatures could not compare with that of Greece. Thus the intellectual horizon of the Greeks was extended, and science was vastly enriched. But this contact with foreign peoples who spoke Greek incorrectly and with effort reacted also upon the Greek spoken in Greece, and brought into being a slovenly colloquial language, known as the Common Dialect (the Koinē, from κοινός, 'common'), which supplanted the pure Attic speech the world over (see HELLENISTIC AND BIBLICAL GREEK). The political centers had also shifted from Athens and Greece to the capitals of the Hellenistic kingdoms, and these Hellenistic capitals became literary as well as political centers. The kings were the patrons of literature and art, and gave rich stipends to scholars and artists. But literature and art, having thus become subservient to royal patrons, could no longer flourish as they did when people were politically independent and free of speech.

2. Alexandria the Center of the New Culture.

Among these capitals Alexandria became the chief center of scholarly literature, and there it was that scientific institutes were founded by the first Ptolemy, Ptolemæus Lagi, satrap from 323, king from 304–285 B.C. Acting on the advice of Demetrius Phalereus, he began to make a great collection of books and to erect buildings to house them. His successors continued his policy, and thus there arose two libraries in Alexandria, the Museum and the Serapeum, and kings and scholars vied with one another in filling them with books. Among other things, the Alexandrian libraries were active in causing the sacred books of the Egyptians, Jews, and Babylonians to be translated into Greek. Alexandria was situated at what was then the meeting-place of the nations, and a national interchange of thought was natural.

3. The Jews of Alexandria.

Alexandria had been a favorite home of the Jews from its founding, and under the Ptolemies they were highly esteemed, because of their consistent loyalty during the incessant wars between Egypt and Syria. They were loyal because they enjoyed full citizenship; they occupied a quarter of the city near the palace; they were governed by their own ethnarch, and, as at Ephesus, belonged to a special tribe, a fact which permitted them to follow without hindrance their own religion and customs. About the time of the birth of Christ there were 1,000,000 Jews in Egypt. They remained faithful to their national traditions and made pilgrimages to Jerusalem, to worship and to pay the Temple tribute. But they had acquired a Judæo-Hellenistic culture; they had forgotten Hebrew entirely, and spoke a Judæo-Hellenistic Greek, that is, the colloquial Greek of Alexandria tinged with Hebraisms, both of thought and grammar. These Hellenistic Jews are sometimes spoken of in the N T as "Greeks," and they were fond of trying to connect Judaism and Hellenism. One of their number, Aristobulus, a Jewish Peripatetic philosopher (about 150 B.C.), wrote in Greek a commentary on the books of Moses, or the Mosaic Law, in which he introduced as though from Orpheus, Linus, and Hesiod many verses written by himself. In it he claimed also that Pythagoras and Plato got their first inklings of philosophy and law from Moses.

2. The Septuagint.

4. Its Origin.

Some scholars infer from these statements of Aristobulus that a Greek translation of the Pentateuch was in existence prior to 400 B.C. But the first translation of which we have positive knowledge was made by Greek-speaking Jews of Alexandria. In his letter to Philocrates, a person claiming to be Aristeas (who was surely a Jew, and not a pagan) says that Demetrius Phalereus suggested to Ptolemæus Philadelphus (285–247 B.C.) that a translation of the books of the Law should be made into Greek; that an embassy consisting of Aristeas and Andreas was sent by Ptolemæus Philadelphus to Jerusalem to request the high priest Eleazar to send to Alexandria six scholars from each of the ten tribes of Israel to translate the Pentateuch into Greek. Aristeas gives the correspondence between Ptolemæus and Eleazar and also the names of the seventy-two elders chosen by Eleazar to do the work. Arrived in Alexandria, these elders, Aristeas continues, were quartered on the island of Pharos, where in seventy-two days they completed the translation of the Pentateuch from the Hebrew rolls brought with them from Jerusalem, which means that the MS. from which the translation was made had the approval of the priestly authorities of Jerusalem. Aristobulus (150 B.C.), Philo Judæus (30–50 A.D.), and Josephus (born 37 A.D.) are in practical agreement with this account of Aristeas, that is to say, the story of Aristeas was believed by the Jews of Alexandria, from two centuries before Christ, and it was believed by the Church Fathers also, with the exception of Jerome. Modern scholars regard Aristeas' story as a romance, but with a basis in fact, and the fact is this: That during the reign of Ptolemæus Philadelphus a translation of the Pentateuch into Greek was really made from a MS. brought from Jerusalem for the purpose; that this translation was made probably by the aid of a stipend given by Ptolemæus; that it was not made, however, by Palestinian Jews, as Aristeas asserts, but by Alexandrian Jews, to meet the needs of the Greek-speaking Jews of Egypt, both in public worship and in private life. This can not be controverted, because the language of the Septuagint is Alexandrian, not Palestinian, Judæo-Greek. This translation, because of the prevalent story that it had been made by seventy-two (or, in round numbers, seventy) Jewish elders, was known as ἡ ἑρμηνεία κατὰ τοὺς ἑβδομήκοντα = interpretatio septuaginta virorum, or seniorum, abbreviated to οἱ Ō or οἱ ōβ— the LXX.

5. Its Character.

This translation, intolerable as it was to the Atticist because of its wretched style and indifference to idiom, was for this very reason adapted to the use and the needs of the Alexandrian Jews, who welcomed it warmly (as did also the high priest at Jerusalem, as Aristeas expressly tells us). This translation was limited to the Pentateuch, and it is not known when the other books of the Bible were translated; but we do know that the early Christian writers speak of the whole Greek Bible as the Septuagint, and we know also that all the writings included in our Bible had been translated into Greek by Alexandrian Jews before 132 B.C., and that all the Hebrew Scriptures, including the Apocrypha, had been turned into Greek before the birth of Christ. The Septuagint as a whole exhibits several styles of Greek. The Pentateuch is written in the colloquial Judæo-Greek of Alexandria, whereas the other books approach the literary style of the 2d cent. B.C., and the books originally written in Greek (Wisdom, II–IV Maccabees) exhibit the style of the Jewish historians and philosophers of Alexandria. Paul quotes from this version, which during the Apostolic Age was held high in honor everywhere, except in Palestine. There it was discredited, because it did not follow the official Hebrew text of the Scribes, which by that time had become standard. There was no standard Heb. text when the LXX. was made, since the canon of the Prophets had not then been completed, the Hebrew text being revised and sanctioned by the priestly authorities in Jerusalem after the appearance of the Septuagint translation. This Septuagint version was regarded as sacred (i.e., inspired) Scripture by the Christians, who used it in their controversies with the Jews as equal in authority with the Hebrew original. On their part, however, the Jews claimed that, as it did not represent the official Hebrew text, it could not be used as a basis for theological controversy.

3. Other Greek Versions.

The result was that no less than six new translations, based on the official standard Hebrew text, were made, namely, those by Aquila, Theodotion, Symmachus, and those by three anonymous writers whose versions were known as Quinta, Sexta, and Septima.

6. Of Aquila. Aquila was a Gentile, born in Sinope in Pontus, on the Black Sea. He was a Roman, a kinsman of the Emperor Hadrian (117–138 A.D.), who commissioned him to rebuild Jerusalem under the name of Ælia Capitolina (128–129 A.D.). In Jerusalem Aquila was converted to Christianity, but was excommunicated because he believed in astrology. He was then converted to Judaism, was circumcised, and studied for a series of years under the leading Jewish Rabbis. The result of his Hebrew studies was a new translation of the Scriptures into Greek. It was made from the official standard Hebrew text, which it followed faithfully, literally, slavishly, in utter disregard of Greek syntax, grammar, and idiom, his sole object being to supplant the Septuagint. His translation was approved by the priestly authorities in Jerusalem, and was therefore hailed with delight by the Jews, but with disfavor by the Christians. Probably, because of this very excessive fidelity to the Hebrew text and idiom, it failed in its purpose to supplant the Septuagint, though its painful accuracy makes it of very great value for textual criticism.

7. Of Theodotion. Theodotion, according to Irenæus, was a native of Ephesus, though Epiphanius contends that he, too, like Aquila, was a native of Sinope and a convert to Judaism. He was, probably, a Jew from Ephesus, and, according to Jerome, an Ebionite, that is, one who recognized Christ as the Messiah, but denied His Divinity, maintained the binding force of the Mosaic Law, and rejected Paul and his writings. Epiphanius assigns Theodotion to the reign of Commodus (180–192), but he wrote, probably, during the reign of Marcus Aurelius (161–180). His translation was more a revision of the Septuagint than a version of his own. His object was both to avoid the pedantry and absurd fidelity of Aquila and to present an idiomatic translation from the official standard Hebrew text, one that would not offend the literary susceptibilities of cultured Hellenists. The fragments of his translation show that he succeeded fairly well; his style is simple, dignified, and withal faithful to the original.

8. Of Symmachus. Symmachus was an Ebionite by religion, according to Eusebius and Jerome, a Samaritan by birth, and, according to Epiphanius, a convert to Judaism. The last-named assigns him to the reign of Marcus Aurelius (161–180), though it may be claimed that he wrote during the reign of Commodus (180–192). We know nothing of his country or of his personality. In his translation his aim was essentially the modern one, to give a liberal, idiomatic rendering of the Hebrew, not a crude literal translation—that is, he tried really to translate Hebrew thoughts into the current Greek literary style, and the fragments of his version show that he did not fail of success.

9. The Quinta, Sexta, and Septima. Origen (185–253 A.D.) mentions three other translations. They were known as Quinta (ε′), Sexta (ϛ′), and Septima (ζ′). Origen found the MS. of Quinta at Nicopolis (near Actium) about 231 A.D., while the MS. of Sexta (or Septima; it is uncertain which) was found in a buried earthen jar in Jericho, about 217 A.D. Eusebius says that the MS. of Septima was found during the reign of Caracalla. We know nothing further about it, nor do we know whether or not Quinta, Sexta, and Septima each embraced the whole O T. Numerous fragments of Quinta (II Kings, Job, Psalms) and of Sexta (Psalms, Canticles) are extant; they show that the writer of Quinta had an elegant Greek style, while the writer of Sexta was fond of paraphrases. The fragments of Septima are very scant, being practically confined to the Psalter.

10. Later Versions. In the 14th cent. a Jew, Elissæus, who lived at the court of Murad I, translated most of the O T into Greek. His version is known as Codex Græcus Venetus, and is preserved in St. Mark's Library in Venice. The translator produced a faithful, but infelicitous, version in what he thought was Attic Greek, though he used the Doric dialect to render the Aramaic portions of Daniel.

The first Modern Greek translation of the Psalms was made from the Septuagint in Crete by Agapion (1543); in 1547 a Jew of Epirus made a Modern Greek version of the Pentateuch; in 1576 Moses Phobian published in the Polyglot Pentateuch a version of Job in Modern Greek.

4. The Work of Origen and Others.

11. The Hexapla. Origen, born 185 A.D., revised the translation of the O T on the basis of the versions of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus. He studied Hebrew in Egypt, whence he was exiled to Cæsarea in Palestine (216–219), where he perfected his knowledge of Hebrew. He first wrote commentaries on the O T, which made a study of the standard Hebrew text necessary. Origen contended that Christians should know that the Septuagint version, regarded by them as inspired, did not represent the official Hebrew text, and that in many respects the versions of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus were much more accurate than that of the Septuagint. Origen, therefore, arranged the Hebrew text, the existing Greek versions, and the Septuagint version, as emended by himself, in parallel columns, whose arrangement we understand clearly from a fragment of his work discovered at Milan in 1896, and from another fragment containing all the six columns, found in 1898:

i.	ii.	iii.	iv.	v.	vi.
Hebrew text.	Transliteration of the Hebrew text into Greek letters.	Version of Aquila.	Version of Symmachus.	Alexandrian version as revised by Origen.	Version of Theodotion.

Aquila's version stands next to the Hebrew text, because it was slavishly faithful to the Hebrew. The version of Symmachus comes in the fourth column, because it is practically a revision of that of Aquila. The version of Theodotion occupies the sixth column, because it was practically a revision of the version of the Seventy, Origen's revision of which occupied the fifth column. The Hebrew column contained in each line one word, or at most two, and each line of the corresponding Greek translations contained one word, or at most four. Origen's great work was called the Hexapla, or Sixfold Edition. He published also a smaller edition, called the Tetrapla, or Fourfold Edition, because it omitted the first two columns of the Hexapla. Occasionally, in the Hexapla (in the poetical and prophetical books) the versions of Quinta and the Sexta were added in separate columns, thus creating for those books an Octopla, or Eightfold Edition. We hear also of a Heptapla, or Sevenfold Edition, in which either Quinta or Sexta was omitted.

The fifth column of the Hexapla did not contain the Septuagint version, but that version revised by Origen, on the basis of the Hebrew text and the other Greek versions. The Septuagint version contained parts of sentences not to be found in the official Hebrew text, and, on the other hand, it did not contain parts of sentences that were in the official Hebrew text, and, again, it gave a sense not supported by the official Hebrew text. Occasionally, matter, sometimes extending to several chapters, was displaced in the Septuagint version (all of which came about, because the Septuagint version was made before an official standard Hebrew text had been promulgated by the priesthood of Jerusalem). The object of Origen's revised Hexapla text was to make the Septuagint version the exact equivalent of the official standard Hebrew text. Consequently, he changed the Greek order, making it correspond with the Hebrew order, and corrected the corruptions of the Septuagint version, supplying what was missing, but without altering the Greek. However, interpolations had also crept into the Septuagint, or Alexandrian, version, and presented difficulties to Origen, as did the matter found in the Septuagint version, but not in the official Hebrew, and the matter found in the official Hebrew text, but not in the Septuagint version. Origen tells us that he solved these problems by the inspiration of God. He adapted to his use some of the critical signs employed originally by Aristarchus in his editions of the Homeric poems. In Origen's Hexapla text (column v) the obelus sign, —, or ÷, was placed before words or lines which were not found in the official Hebrew text, and were, therefore, unauthorized. The asterisk, *, was placed before words or lines found in the official Hebrew text, but not in the Septuagint version. The metobolus, :, was placed at the end of the words or of the clause challenged by the obelus or the asterisk. When the words or the clause challenged by the obelus or by the asterisk overpassed the limits of the line, the obelus or the asterisk was repeated at the beginning of each line, until the presence of the metobolus notified the reader that the end of the challenged passage had been reached.

12. Relation of Origen's Text to the Massoretic.

Origen's Hexapla edition was finished about 240 A.D., and his Tetrapla edition appeared toward the end of his life. Eusebius says that in preparing his version Origen employed "more than seven tachygraphers ['fast writers' stenographers], who relieved one another at fixed intervals, and he employed an equal number of bibliographers ['copyists of the text'] and female calligraphers" ('experts in penmanship'). The completed Hexapla edition covered at least 3,250 leaves, or 6,500 pages, exclusive of the Quinta and the Sexta. The Tetrapla edition covered at least 2,000 leaves, or 4,000 pages. Neither of these editions was published, that is, they were not put upon the book-market, but were deposited in the library of Pamphilus in Cæsarea, where they were consulted by Jerome in the 4th cent. It is known that they were still in existence in the 6th cent. They perished, probably, in 638, at the time of the capture of Cæsarea by the Saracens. The fifth column of the Hexapla edition, containing Origen's version of the Septuagint version, was published separately and placed upon the Palestine book-market by Pamphilus (martyred within the period from 307 to 309) and Eusebius, who completed it after the death of Pamphilus. This edition was known as Eusebius' edition, or as the Palestine edition, or as Origen's edition of the Septuagint. It was a grave error of judgment to publish Origen's Hexapla revision by itself, for it intensified the mischief, in that the Aristarchian signs had no meaning whatever in the separate publication, and the version itself, when taken out of connection with the Hebrew text and the other versions, was wholly misleading.

13. Editions of the Hexapla.

When Pamphilus and Eusebius were publishing the fifth column of Origen's Hexapla edition in Palestine, Hesychius in Alexandria, with the aid of Phileas and others, was revising and editing the old Septuagint version. This edition has disappeared completely, and we do not even know positively who this Hesychius was, though he was probably the martyr of that name. In Antioch, at about the same time, Lucian (martyred Jan. 7, 312), with the aid of Dorotheus, was making what was practically a new version of the Hebrew Bible. It was probably clear in diction and complete in form. It has been ascertained that Lucian's version was the archetype of several codices of the O T, and Lagarde has reconstructed much of the text of Lucian's version. It is smooth and full; it is near to the Hebrew, and yet the Greek is idiomatic. It often gives double renderings, and sometimes Lucian's rendering is based on a better text than the Massoretic.

II. Other Versions of the O T.

The Septuagint version was in common use throughout the Roman Empire from Gaul to Egypt and Cyrenaica, with the sole exception of Carthage, where Greek did not occupy a preferred position. It was, perhaps, at Carthage in the 2d cent. A.D. that the Septuagint version was first translated into Latin, the Old Latin Bible (Vetus Itala), frequently and accurately quoted by Cyprian (middle of 3d cent.). Jerome (Eusebius Hieronymus 329-420), of Pannonia, at the request of Pope Damasus, undertook a revision of the O T on the basis of the Septuagint (393). He began his work with the Old Latin Psalter (Psalterium Romanum). A few years later (389), he published another revision of the Psalter, made from the Septuagint on the basis of the fifth column of Origen's Hexapla (Psalterium Gallicanum). About 390 he translated the Psalter from the Hebrew (Psalterium Hebraicum), which, however, failed to displace his other two versions in the Church service. These versions were followed from time to time by versions of other books of the O T. The Latin Bible was revised in the 6th and again in the 9th cent., but the Latin Bible of to-day still re-echoes the Septuagint. This revised version was called the Vulgate, first by Roger Bacon, though Jerome applied the term Vulgata to the Old Latin Bible.

16. The Egyptian (Coptic).

Before the close of the 2d cent. A.D., at least two translations of the Bible into the Egyptian (Coptic, a corruption of Αἰγύπτιος) dialects (the Bohairic and the Sahidic) had been made from the Septuagint version. We have also fragments of later translations into other Egyptian dialects—the Middle Egyptian, the Fayumic, and the Akhmimic, all from the Septuagint version.

17. The Ethiopic.

In the 4th cent. missionaries from Tyre evangelized Ethiopia, and in the 5th or 6th cent. the Bible was translated into Ethiopic, on the basis of the Greek Septuagint, though Lagarde holds that the extant Ethiopic version was made from the medieval Arabic version in the 14th cent.

18. The Arabic.

The earliest Arabic version was made partly from the Hebrew, partly from the Syriac Peshiṭto, partly from the Septuagint, and, possibly, partly from the Coptic. The first important translation was made by Saadia Gaon (872–942), and it is still used by Arabic-speaking Jews. Other Arabic versions are the Karaite version and the Samaritan version of Saadia (11th cent.).

19. The Syriac.

There were two Syriac versions of the O T. (1) The Peshiṭto or 'the simple,' made probably at Edessa by Jews, from the Hebrew, at the time of King Abgar (9–45 A.D.). A free revision of this version, on the basis of the Septuagint, was made by Philoxenus about 508 A.D., the fragments of which are in the British Museum (the Philoxenian Syriac). (2) The version of Paul, Bishop of Tella in Mesopotamia, made from the Hexapla revision of Origen about 616 A.D., called the Syro-Hexapla. Besides these two, there are fragments of several other Syriac versions, as follows:

(1) A version in the Palestinian dialect containing the whole O T and made from the Septuagint version.

(2) A version by Mar Abbas (552 A.D.).

(3) Two Jacobite versions: (a) By Polycarp (5th cent.), (b) by Jacob of Edessa (704 A.D.).

(4) A version by a Syrian interpreter, called ὁ Σύρος.

20. Persian, Gothic, Armenian, Georgian, Slavonic, etc.

Maimonides says that the Pentateuch was translated into Persian long before Mohammed, but the first Persian version of which we have knowledge was made by Jacob Tawus, and appeared in the Polyglot Pentateuch (Constantinople, 1546). About 350 A.D. Ulfilas translated the Bible into Gothic, the long fragments of which version (Gospels and Pauline Epistles) are most precious to the student of language, because they are the oldest specimens of Teutonic literature. The translation of the Bible into Armenian falls between 354–441. It was begun at Edessa by Mesrop and continued by his nephew Moses of Khoren. It was based on the Septuagint version.

Mesrop also inaugurated the Georgian, or Iberian, version, on the basis of the Septuagint version.

In the 9th cent. the brothers Cyril and Methodius translated the Septuagint version into Slavonic. Most of this version perished during the Tatar invasion in the 13th cent., and the present Slavonic version is not based wholly on the Septuagint, some of it having been translated from the Hebrew and some from the Latin Vulgate. The Western versions into Anglo-Saxon, Frankish, etc., were made from the Latin Vulgate, and not from the Hebrew or Greek. See also Aramaic Language and Targum.

VESSELS: The words so rendered have the very general meaning of 'utensil,' 'weapon,' etc., except nebhel in Is 30 14, which means an 'earthen jar,' or 'pitcher.' In I S 21 5 the interpretation is somewhat difficult. The probable meaning is that as David and his men were on a military expedition, they and all their accouterments were ceremonially 'holy,' so that they could touch the "holy" bread without risk. VESTURE. See Dress and Ornaments.

VIAL: This is the rendering of: (1) pakh, a 'flask,' 'vial' for holding oil. A vial of oil was used in anointing Saul (I S 10 1) and Jehu (II K 9 1, 3, "box" AV). (2) φιάλη, a broad, shallow 'bowl' (so RV in all passages), used for presenting incense (Rev 5 8) and drink-offerings. It was probably of saucer shape, so that the contents could be poured out at once and suddenly. In Rev (15 7, 16 1 ff., 17 1, 21 9) they are spoken of figuratively as filled with the wine "of the wrath of God." C. S. T.

VILLAGE: (1) The ordinary O T word ḥātzēr, 'enclosure' (cf. Hazor, Hazar-susah, etc.), originally meant a village that had grown out of a settlement of nomads (cf. Gn 25 16; Is 42 11). (2) kāphār, 'village' (cf. Arab. kefr), is of later origin and not frequent in Biblical use (I Ch 27 25; Song 7 11), except in proper names such as Chephar-ammoni, Chephirah, Capernaum. It apparently denoted a regular village, and not a mere collection of huts like ḥātsēr. See also Havvoth-jair and Perizzites. (3) In the N T the common Gr. term κώμη is applied specifically to Bethlehem (Jn 7 42), Bethsaida (Mk 8 22 f.), Bethphage (Mt 21 1), Bethany (Jn 11 1), and Emmaus (Lk 24 13).

The OT never mentions villages singly or by name. They are usually grouped as mere dependencies of some fortified place (cf. Jos 13 23; Neh 11 30; cf. Mk 8 27), of which they are often called the bānōth, 'daughters' (Nu 32 42; II Ch 28 18; cf. II S 20 19), although in many cases (e.g., Jos 15 21-32) the protecting 'city' must itself have been very small. The same idea of villages dependent on a city is represented in the N T term κωμόπολις, properly a 'village-city' (cf. Mk 1 38).

The original distinction between a city and a village was that the former had walls (Lv 25 29-31; I S 6 18). Later on, the city became noted for its size and wealth; according to the Talmudists it must have a synagogue, and in the Greek period a certain political organization was demanded. Varying standards, as well as the growth and decay of communities (cf. Zec 2 4), led to a certain latitude in the use of terms. Thus Bethlehem is called both a "city" (Lk 2 4) and a "village" (Jn 7 42). The same is true of Bethsaida (Lk 9 10; Mk 8 22 f.). Capernaum (see above) was called a "city" because much more important than its first part (Caper = kefr, 'village') would indicate. See also CITY, § 3.

VINE. See VINES AND VINTAGE.

VINEGAR: The word ḥōmets, rendered "vinegar" in the O T, included any acid beverage made from wine, or "strong drink" which had become sour (Nu 6 3). Completely fermented vinegar was unsatisfying to the thirst (Ps 69 21) and irritating to the teeth (Pr 10 26); but sour wine, or "vinegar" diluted with water, was a refreshing drink (Ru 2 14), though it was forbidden to the Nazirite (Nu 6 3). The "vinegar" of the Crucifixion narratives (ὄξος, Mt 27 48 and ||s) was apparently the posca, or sour wine ordinarily served out to the Roman soldiers, and seems to have been offered as an act of mercy. VINE OF SODOM. See SODOM, VINE OF.

VINES AND VINTAGE: The fact that the common name for "banquet" among the Hebrews was mishteh ('drinking') shows the significance which attached to wine. Its use was presupposed as a necessary part of every meal (Gn 27 25), while "wine and corn" in common speech represented the most important part of the produce of the land.

1. Culture of the Vine Among the Hebrews.

In Gn 9 20 the culture of the vine is traced back to Noah, its origin being attributed to a mythical ancestor, just as other phases of civilized life are traced to ancient heroes in the Cainite genealogical table in Gn 4 16 ff. A dim recollection of the fact that Israel learned the art of vine-culture from the Canaanites is to be found, not only in the story of the spies (Nu 13 24), but also in the hostile attitude of the Rechabites, who rejected the use of wine probably because of its Canaanite origin (cf. Jer ch. 35). As a matter of fact, vineyards were to be found everywhere in the land, especially on mountain slopes and hills (Is 5 1; Jer 31 5), but also in the valleys (e.g., in that of Jezreel, Jg 9 27; I K 21 1 ff.). The wine from the neighborhood of Hebron was famous (Nu 13 24), also that from the Lebanon region (Hos 14 8). The care bestowed upon vine-culture is revealed in not a few passages of the O T. The hillside, where a plow could not be used, was worked with a mattock and the stones removed (Is ch. 5). It was protected by terrace-walls, gādhēr, in order to prevent the washing away of the soil by water (cf. Nu 22 24), and surrounded with a thorn hedge, mᵉṣūkkāh, or wall, or even with both (Is 5 2, 5, 17 10 f.), as a protection against grazing herds (Is 7 25; Jer 12 10), or wild animals (Ps 80 14; Song 2 15). Huts, ṣukkōth (cf. Is 1 8), or watch-towers, migdōl (Is 5 2), were erected, in which the vine-dresser, kōrēm (II Ch 26 10), or the keeper, nōṭēr, lived (Job 27 18; Song 1 6, 8 11 f.). Every vineyard had its wine-press (gath or pūrāh), in which, with shouts of joy, hēdhādh, the grapes were trodden, dārak, in a stone tub ("press," fat) to must (tīrōsh, new wine, i.e., unfermented juice with its sediment); cf. Is 16 10; Jer 25 30, 48 33. If the soil was rocky, the press was hewn out in the rock. Connected with it, but on a lower level, was a receiving-vat, yeqebh, into which the must flowed to be clarified. From this it was drawn off into jars (Jer 48 11), or skins (Job 32 19). The work of pruning, zimmēr, the branches with the pruning-hook, mazmērāh (Lv 25 3; Jn 15 3), was of great importance. In general, the vines were trained as separate stocks, though also, at times, they were allowed to run and develop into a number of connected vines. As today, so in older times, a vine with its wide outspreading branches furnished of itself a substantial foliage (cf. Mic 4 4). It was forbidden to plant anything else in a vineyard (Dt 22 9), and it was required that a vineyard should be left uncultivated every seventh year (Ex 23 11; Lv 25 3 ff.). The wood of old and useless vines was burned (Ezk 15 2 ff.; Jn 15 6). As to the varieties of grapes raised in ancient Palestine, it is possible to draw some inferences from O T expressions. From the designation of the juice of the grapes as their "blood" (Gn 49 11; Dt 32 14), it may be concluded that red grapes were most highly prized. This is confirmed by the use of the term sōrēq ('red,' Is 5 2; Jer 2 21) for the vines of best quality ("the choicest vine"), which indicates that they were so called from their red grapes. In later times, however, the culture of other varieties must have supplanted that of the red grapes, for the wine exported from Palestine at the beginning of the Middle Ages was white, and it is the white grape that is grown most extensively there to-day.

2. The Manufacture of Wine.

The time of the ripening of the grapes varied according to the location of the vineyards. On the plain along the coast there are ripe grapes as early as July, in the highlands not for a month later, while those destined for the wine-press are not gleaned until September and October. This was the custom also in the olden time, since the festival which specially celebrated the vintage—the Feast of Booths (Tabernacles)—came in Tishri (September–October). It was a feast of unrestrained joy. Song and dancing were the order of the day (Jg 9 27; Is 16 10; Jer 25 30; 48 33). The must was drunk, either sweet or half fermented. It was generally allowed to ferment in jars or skins (cf. Mk 2 22 and ||s), and to stand a while upon its lees (Is 48 11; Zeph 1 12). Sometimes, it was kept over a year, until the second fermentation took place, and then poured from one vessel into another (Is 48 11). Before drinking, wine was filtered or strained (shᵉmārīm mᵉzuqqāqīm, Is 25 6; Jer 48 11). Among the Israelites, it was not usual to mix the wine with water; this was a Greek custom. But it was often mixed with various sorts of spices (Song 8 2; Is 5 22). It can not be asserted with certainty that the Hebrews were accustomed to boil down the must to grape honey (Arab. dibs), though this may well have been the case (cf. dᵉbhāsh, Gn 43 11; I K 14 3; Ezr 27 17). Grapes were often dried, tsimmīqīm (I S 25 18), and pressed into cakes, 'ăshīshāh (Hos 3 1; II S 6 19). At the present day, raisins form a chief article of export in Syria. The bᵉ'ūshīm mentioned in the O T (Is 5 2, wild grapes) were imperfect grapes that did not mature, but should be distinguished from the bōser (Is 18 5, "ripening grape"; Jer 31 29 f., "sour grape"), which were grapes used while still green or unripe. What kind of injury to the vine was inflicted by the tolā'ath (Dt 28 39, "worm") is not certain.

VIRGIN: This word renders the Heb. and Gr. terms: (1) bᵉthūlāh, 'separated,' which conveys definitely the idea of virginity, and is used either, literally, of a young unmarried woman (Gn 24 16; Ex 22 16 f.; II S 13 2), or, figuratively, in poetic passages, in the personification of a social body—a city, or state, e.g., "virgin daughter of Zion" (Is 23 12); "virgin daughter of Babylon" (Is 47 1); "virgin of Israel" (Am 5 2). (2) 'almāh, 'mature,' used simply of a young woman of marriageable age, without reference to her being married or not (Gn 24 43; Song 1 3, 6 8; Is 7 14, etc.). See IMMANUEL. (3) παρθένος, used in the LXX. mainly as the rendering of bᵉthūlāh (of 'almāh in Gn 24 43 and Is 7 14); in the N T it retains its LXX. sense, with the single exception of Rev 14 4, where it is used of men, with the emphasis on the idea of chastity. VOW: A promise to God—either formally expressed or tacitly implied—to perform some service, or do things pleasing to Him, generally on condition of receiving in return a specific favor. Vows are known in all religions, and belong to all ages. Jacob vowed that, if God would be with him and bless him, he would take Him as his God, build Him a sanctuary and pay Him tithes (Gn 28 20-22). Jephthah's vow to sacrifice the object that would first meet him as he returned victorious from battle is familiar (Jg 11 30-40). Other vows mentioned are Hannah's (I S 1 11 f.) and Absalom's (II S 15 7 f.). Just before the battle of Michmash Saul led the people to vow that they would eat nothing until evening (I S 14 24 f., 36 f.). The law of vows assumes that they are voluntary. No one is required to make a vow. Vows are classed with free-will offerings (Dt 12 6); but a vow once made constitutes a solemn obligation, from which nothing can absolve one. So far as a vow involved a sacrifice, such sacrifices were regulated by a prescribed ritual—the ceremony being designated "to accomplish a vow" (Lv 22 18-23, 27 1-13; Nu 15 3 ff.; cf. also Ac 21 23 ff.). In such a case the Law fixed on a minimum of offerings, i.e., for a man 50 shekels of the sanctuary, for a woman 30, for a male child 5, and for a female child 3 shekels (Nu 30 2 f.). The performance of vows was one of the tests which the prophets applied in exposing the transgressions of the people (cf. Is 19 21; Nah 1 15; Jon 1 16, 2 9; Job 22 27; Pr 20 25; Ps 22 25, 50 14, 56 12). The foregoing applies to the ordinary, later known as the 'minor,' vow. WAFER: This is the rendering of two Heb. words: (1) rāqīq (Ex 29 2, 23; Lv 2 4, 7 12, 8 26; Nu 6 15, 19; I Ch 23 29 RV), on which see FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 3. (2) tsappīḥīth (from tsāphaḥ, 'to spread out'), a flat cake. The word occurs but once (Ex 16 31) and is used in this place as a sweetmeat: "wafers made with honey." E. E. N.

WAGES: This word is used to render a number of Heb. and Gr. terms: sākhār and maskōreth, 'hire' (Gn 30 28, 29 15, etc.); pᵉullāh, 'work' (Lv 19 13); μισθός, 'reward' (Jn 4 36); and ὀψώνιον, 'rations' (Lk 3 14; Ro 6 23; II Co 11 8). Almost nothing is said specifically as to the conditions and payments of hired service in the Bible. The actual amounts paid, e.g., a "penny," i.e., a denarius a day for vintage labor (Mt 20 2), or ten shekels and a suit of apparel a year, plus food, as a priest's salary (Jg 17 10), were small in comparison with modern wages, but, of course, the purchasing power of money was then much greater than it is now. The O T law regarding wages was concerned mainly with guaranteeing to the wage-earner the prompt payment of the amounts due him (Lv 19 13; cf. Mal 3 5). E. E. N.

Bedawin than like the campaigns of a great people. It was for the sake of plunder, or to repel a sudden attack, or to avenge the death of those killed in such an attack that the men of a clan or tribe rallied around the chief or the bravest one in the midst of them.

1. Character of Early Warfare.

In times of great danger heralds were despatched to the friendly or neighboring tribes to ask their aid. If the enemy was beaten, each warrior returned to his own home with his share of the spoil. Thus Gideon at the head of 300 men of his clan sought to avenge the death of his brothers who had been slain by the Midianites (Jg 7 16 ff., 8 18 f.). The tribe of Dan put 600 warriors into the field to make conquest of new places of abode (Jg 18 11 ff.).

Only on one occasion did any large number of tribes unite in a campaign. This was when, in the days of Barak and Deborah, the Israelites to the N. and S. of the Plain of Esdraelon were engaged in a life-and-death struggle against Sisera (Jg ch. 4 f.; cf. also I S 11 6-8; Jg 20 1-3). The early historical sources—especially those of the period of the Judges—show that early Palestinian wars were more like the expeditions of the carried on only in the dry season. When the rainy weather of autumn came on, operations were suspended, to be resumed in the spring. This is the meaning of the expression in II S 11 1, "the return of the year, at the time when kings go out," i.e., on campaigns, when the long-continued fair weather of spring and early summer was favorable to military operations. While preliminary parleys frequently preceded a conflict (Jg 11 12 ff.; I S 11 1 ff.; I K 20 1 ff.), a formal declaration of war was by no means necessary (cf. I S 15 5 ff.).

Before war was begun, sacrifices were offered, so that the expression qāddēsh milḥāmāh ('to sanctify war,' Jer 6 4; Mic 3 5; Jl 3 9; cf. RVmg.) meant to initiate a war with sacrifices. In like manner, care was taken at the opening of a campaign, or in critical situations, not to omit seeking to know J"'s will by means of the sacred lot (Jg 1 1 ff.; I S 14 37, 23 2 ff., 28 6, 30 7 f.; II S 5 19, 23), or through prophets (I K 22 5 ff.; II K 19 2 ff.). In other cases, a knowledge of the Divine will was sought by means of all kinds of omens (I S 14 8 ff.; Jg 6 36 ff.), and it was for just this purpose, and not that they might offer sacrifice, that priests accompanied the army, since the sacred lot was in their keeping. In ancient times, in order to make J″'s help in battle more certain, the Ark, in which He was thought to be present, was carried with the army into war. This explains why Uriah was careful not to render himself ceremonially unclean through intercourse with his wife (II S 11 11), also the requirement that the camp be kept free from all defilement lest J″ should withdraw Himself from Israel (Dt 23 10 ff.; cf. Nu 5 1 ff.).

2. Religious Aspects of Warfare.

The detailed arrangement of a military camp is no longer known. The name ma'gāl (I S 17 20, 26 5, 7, "place of wagons" RV, trench AV) indicates that it was circular in form, with the force camping under tents (cf. II S 11 11). The sustenance for the army was generally secured as occasion offered (cf. I S 17 17 ff.; II S 17 27 ff.), which could be managed without great difficulty, since the number of troops was generally quite small. Sentries, who were changed three times in a night, watched the camp (Jg 7 19; I Mac 12 27). When the force marched out to battle, a detachment remained with the camp (I S 30 24). On the march the enemy sought to harass the rear-guard (Dt 25 18; Jos 10 19).

3. Details of Camp and March.

Military science was simple. It was an old custom of the Bedawin to divide a force into two attacking divisions or bands. The rear one (liers in wait, 'ăqēbh, Jos 8 13) served, if necessary, also as a reserve, or guaranteed to the chief and those with him a chance of escape (Gn 32 7 f.). Sometimes, in order to divert the attention of the enemy, and also to conceal the attack itself, three divisions were formed (Jg 7 16 ff.; I S 11 11; II S 18 2; I Mac 5 33). Night attacks were often resorted to (Jg 7 16 ff.; II S 17 1 ff.), as well as ambushments and pretended flight (Jos 8 2, 12; Jg 20 29 ff.; I S 15 5; cf. II K 7 12 ff.), and circumvention of an enemy preparatory to an attack from the rear (II S 5 22). David availed himself of the rustling of the mulberry-trees in order to come upon his enemy unawares (II S 5 24); Joab disposed his men within a wooded tract to render the overthrow of Absalom's followers more complete (II S 18 6 ff.). A trumpet-signal by the commander opened each battle (Jg 7 18) as well as the war itself, and in the same way the forces were called away from the fight (II S 2 28, 18 16, 20 22), or summoned to break camp and go home (II S 20 22). As to the disposition of the battle array, ma'ărākhāh (I Ch 12 38, rank AV), information is lacking. Probably, spearmen formed the first line, bowmen or archers the second, and slingers the third. Horsemen, or more accurately, horses and chariots, as a distinct element of the fighting force were not used by Israel until quite late—as in the Assyrian era—owing largely to the broken character of the ground, which was specially unfavorable for the movement of chariots. The bulk of the fighting was done by footmen. Before the beginning of a battle, it was usual to offer sacrifices (I S 7 9 f., 13 9 f. See above, § 1), then with a loud battle-cry, or alarm, terū'āh, the host rushed against the foe (cf. Am 1 14; Jer 49 2, etc.). On some occasions there were special battle-cries (Jg 7 18, 20). In the conflict men fought hand to hand with the bare arm, as the upper garment had to be thrown back and tucked in the girdle, as it was also while on the march. In such contests personal bravery and skill, physical strength and agility decided the issue. The latter qualities were important not only for the attack itself, but for gaining advantageous positions. Sometimes, the battle was preceded by duels, which not seldom had a decisive effect on the outcome of the fray (I S 17 3 ff., 41 ff., 51 f.; II S 2 14 ff.; cf. 21 18 ff., 23 21).

To bury the slain countrymen was a sacred duty (I K 11 15), and over fallen heroes and captains a general lamentation was held (II S 3 31). The bodies of the enemy also were buried (cf. Ezk 39 11 ff.) or burned (Is 30 33). It was only on special occasions that the head of an enemy was taken for a trophy (I S 17 51 ff., 31 9; II S 20 22). On the other hand, it seems to have been an early custom to cut off the foreskins of fallen enemies (I S 18 25, 27). This was also customary in the wars of the Egyptians, as appears in a picture in the Ramesseum at Medinet Tabu. Prisoners of war were often treated with great severity. Kings and leaders were usually put to death, sometimes after the victor had placed his foot on their necks (Jos 10 24); often large numbers of captives were slain (II Ch 25 12); in other cases they were mutilated (Jg 1 6 f.; cf. II S 12 31); frequently they were sold into slavery (Am 1 6, 9, etc.).

4. The Ordering of a Battle.

5. After the Battle.

Such a passage as I K 20 30 ff., in its display of the mercy of Ahab toward Ben-hadad, shows how little inclined were the people of antiquity in general to be considerate in their treatment of a captured enemy. Even Deuteronomy justified on theological grounds the wholesale extirpation of the conquered inhabitants of the holy land (20 16 ff.). Horses taken as spoil were lamed (hocked) in the earliest times when Israel as yet had neither wagons nor horses (II S 8 4; Jos 11 6, 9). The country of a conquered enemy was often laid waste by cutting down the trees, stopping up the springs, and burning the cities and villages (II K 3 19; Jg 6 4). A yearly tribute was laid upon a defeated people or, in many cases, a larger sum of money was demanded at once (II K 18 14; Is 33 18). Hostages were also taken to prevent violation of agreements (II K 14 14), while garrisons were frequently placed in the captured cities (II S 8 6, 14). The booty (plunder, spoil) was shared equally between those who participated in the fight and those who guarded the camp (I S 30 24 f.). Gold and silver were dedicated to the Temple of J″ (II S 8 11), and costly trophies were hung up in the sanctuary (I S 21 10; II K 11 10; cf. I S 31 10).

The warriors returning from a victorious battle, while under necessity, according to the Priestly Code, of submitting to the purification ceremony prescribed for those defiled by contact with the dead (Nu 31 19 ff.), were greeted with songs and dances and the noise of drums (Jg 11 34; I S 18 6 ff.). Victorious kings often set up memorials of their victory (I S 15 12; cf. 7 12). In later times, there are accounts of thanksgiving festivals in honor of J″, who gave the victory (II Ch 20 26 ff.; I Mac 4 24). W. N.

WARS OF JEHOVAH, BOOK OF THE: A lost work quoted in Nu 21 14. It seems to have contained a collection of poems celebrating the victories of Israel over her enemies. The existence of such a book has been doubted by Professor Sayce (Acad. 1892, Oct. 22). On the other hand, it has been conjectured that it was a source for Nu 21 17 f. and 27b-30; and, further, that it was identical with the Book of Jashar (q.v.). Assuming the existence of such a collection, it was evidently so called because J" was held up in all its songs as the leader of Israel's armies and the cause of their successes (Ex 15 2). The wars of Israel were the wars of J", Israel's God (cf. I S 18 17, 25 22). A. C. Z.

WASH, WASHINGS. See BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, § 1, and PURE, PURITY, PURIFICATION, § 2.

WATCH: In the O T the words "watch," watchman are used of two kinds of duty: (1) that of guarding, shāmar and its derivatives, and (2) that of being on the lookout to discern from a vantage-point—such as a watch-tower, which seems to have been very common—things that took place at a distance, in order to report them in time, tsāphāh and its derivatives (e.g., "mizpah" [mitspāh], 'watch-tower'). On (1) cf. Jg 7 19; II K 11 5; Neh 4 9, etc. On (2) cf. I S 14 16; II S 13 24, 18 24; II K 9 17; Is 21 8, etc. Another word, nātsar, 'to guard,' or 'keep,' is used in the sense of "watch" only in II K 17 9, 18 8; Jer 4 16, 31 6; cf. Nah 2 1. In the N T κουστωδία, "watch," means a 'guard' (Mt 27 65, 28 11). In the O T 'ashmūrāh (Ex 14 24), and in the N T φυλακή (Mt 14 25, 24 43, etc.) are used for designating time (see TIME, § 1), though both terms get this sense from their more primary reference to the military custom of dividing the night into three (Heb.) or four (Roman) periods, during each of which a detachment of men kept watch or guard. E. E. N.

WATCHER. See ANGELOLOGY, §§ 2, 4.

WATCHMAN, WATCH-TOWER: The walled cities of Palestine had watch-towers (migdāl) on the walls (e.g., Jezreel, II K 9 17-20, 17 9; Gaza, 18 8), or an additional story above the gates, which served the same purpose (II S 18 24 ff.). There were also watch-towers to guard the roads (cf. II Ch 20 24). A watchman was called: (1) nōtsēr (II K 17 9, 18 8; Jer 31 6, 4 16, "blockaders"). (2) shōmēr (Jer 51 12; figuratively Is 21 11, 12, 62 6; cf. Song 3 3, 5 7 = 'city police'?). (3) tsōpheh (I S 14 16, "sentinels"; II S 13 34, 18 24 ff.; II K 9 17-20; figuratively Is 52 8, 56 10 [= 'prophet'], 21 6; Ezk 3 17, 33 2, 6, 7; Mic 7 4). See also TOWER and WATCH. C. S. T.

WATER: Water was appreciated by the ancient Semites more highly than by most other races on account of its scarcity in the lands that they inhabited. In the Arabian desert, their original home, it was obtainable only from the scanty springs that here and there broke through the arid ground. In Canaan and the other lands adjacent to the desert there was rainfall, but it was so scanty and uncertain as to be a constant source of anxiety. It is not surprising, therefore, that water is mentioned in the Bible more frequently than any other substance. In Is 3 1, 33 16; Sir 29 21, 39 26, it is regarded as one of the chief supports of life. The finding of water was a matter of the utmost importance (Gn 16 7, 21 19, 26 19, 32; Ex 15 22, 17 2; Nu 21 5, 33 14), and when a well was discovered this event was celebrated with song (Nu 21 16-18). When springs could not be found, or when a person was passing through foreign territory, water had to be bought (Dt 2 6, 28). Failure of the water-supply was the greatest of national calamities, and was regarded as a direct judgment of God (Lv 26 19; Dt 28 23 f.; I K 17 1; Is 5 6; Am 4 7 f.); and, on the other hand, the Prophets look for a supernatural increase of the streams of Palestine as one of the chief blessings of the Messianic Age (Is 30 25, 35 6 f., 41 18, 49 10; Jer 31 9; Zec 14 8; Ezk ch. 47). On account of its needfulness and its scarcity, water becomes in the Bible a figure of speech for all kinds of blessings, e.g., good news (Pr 25 25), wisdom (Sir 15 3), a wife (Song 4 15), and particularly for the Divine grace (Ps 23 2; Is 32 2, 55 1, 58 11; Jn 7 38; Rev 7 16, 21 6, 22 1, 17).

By the primitive Hebrews, as by the other Semites water in all its forms was reverenced as Divine (see SEMITIC RELIGION, § 8). In later times, springs became the favorite sanctuaries of J" (see FOUNTAIN; SPRING; WELL). In the narratives of the Hexateuch one of the functions of J" is miraculously to provide water for Israel (Ex 15 25, 17 6; Nu 20 8, 21 16; Dt 8 15). Even so late a writer as Jeremiah (Jer 14 22) regards it as the chief difference between J" and the "vanities of the nations" that He can cause rain. See also PALESTINE, §§ 17–20.

Water is often mentioned as used for cleansing purposes (Gn 24 32, 43 24; Ex 30 18-21, 40 7, 30-32; Lv 11 32, 14 8 f., 15 5, 13, 16 4, 24, 28; Nu 19 17; II K 13 1; Jth 10 3, 12 7; Lk 7 44; Jn 13 5). Hence it becomes a symbol of the cleansing of the soul from sin (Ezk 16 4, 9, 36 25; Jn 3 5; Eph 5 26; He 10 22; I Jn 5 6, 8). See also BAPTISM. L. B. P

WATERCOURSE: This term renders in the AV: (1) yābhāl, lit. 'conduit' (q.v.) (Is 44 4; cf. 30 25). (2) mōtsā', 'springs' (q.v.) as RV (II Ch 32 30). (3) t'ālāh, 'trench,' 'conduit' (q.v.); RV has "channel" (poetical, Job 38 5; cf. II K 18 17 = Is 7 3, etc.). The RV renders also (4) tsinnōr (II S 5 8, "gutter" AV) by "watercourse" in this difficult passage, but the real meaning of tsinnōr here is unknown. C. S. T.

WATER OF BITTERNESS. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 12, and DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 7 (12).

WATER-POT: A vessel in which water was kept, either for drinking (Jn 4 28) or for purifying purposes (Jn 2 6 f.). E. E. N.

WATERS OF MEROM. See MEROM.

WATERS OF STRIFE. See MERIBAH.

WATERSPOUT (צִנּוֹר, tsinnōr): The word is found only in Ps 42 7 (waterfall ARV), and means strictly 'canal' or 'watercourse' (cf. II S 5 8), but is used of a rush of water of large proportions and of Divine origin. Briggs (Int. Crit. Com.) thinks the Jordan rapids are meant, but great floods of rain seem to suit the context better (so Baethgen, Handkom.). E. E. N.

WAVE-OFFERING. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 11.

WAX: This word, the rendering of dōnag, 'beeswax,' is found in the O T in Ps 22 14, 68 2, 97 5; Mic 1 4, always in a simile. See also BOOKS AND WRITING. E. E. N.

WAY: Literally used, this term denoted either (1) a 'trodden path' or 'road' (derekh, Gn 38 16, etc.; ὁδός, Mt 2 12, etc.; and, ōraḥ, Is 30 11, 41 3), or (2) a 'journey' or 'trip' comprehensively viewed (Gn 28 20, etc.; Ac 8 36). But by a favorite Hebrew mode of thought, it is figuratively used also of the 'habit,' 'conduct,' or 'attitude,' whether of God or of man (Ex 32 8; Dt 5 33; Job 16 22; Ps 119 9; Pr 12 28, etc.). Especially is this metaphorical sense attached to the term when employed in the plural (Jos 24 17; Ps 51 13, etc.; cf. Mt 7 13 f.). In the N T the plan of God for the salvation of man as outlined by the Prophets and realized in the gospel is called "the way of the Lord" (Mt 3 3, etc.). From this meaning the term easily passed to the broader sense in which it meant Christianity or Judaism (Ac 9 2, 19 9, 22 4), and came to include the whole system of thought and life that the Christian accepts and practises (II P 2 2, 19). A. C. Z.

The term highway is usually the rendering of meṣillāh, 'that which is thrown up,' evidently referring to the labor of making the road, perhaps also to the fact that the great thoroughfares of Ephraim and Judah ran along the crest of the highland. In Jg 5 6 the better reading may be "caravans" (see Moore, Int. Crit. Com., ad loc.). In Dt 2 27 the Heb. is derekh, derekh, 'way, way'; cf. RVmg. In Am 5 16 RV "streets" is substituted for "highways" AV, as a rendering of ḥūts. In Mt 22 10, Lk 14 23 ὁδός is rendered "highway," but "way" in Mk 10 46 RV On Mt 22 9, cf. RV

On the road-system of Palestine see PALESTINE, §§ 7–13, passim; TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 2. Roads are indicated on the maps of Palestine in this work. See also the map of the Ancient Semitic World, and the maps in EB, IV, art. Trade and Commerce, and in HDB, extra vol., Map. I. See also PATH. E. E. N.

WAYFARING MAN: This term in the sense of 'traveler' renders: (1) 'ōrēaḥ (ptcpl. used as a substantive) (Jg 19 17; II S 12 4 [‖ to "traveler"]; Jer 9 2 [1], 14 8 [‖ to "sojourner"]). (2) hōlēkh derekh, 'one going a way' (Is 35 8). (3) 'ōbhēr ōraḥ, 'one traveling a road' (Is 33 8). C. S. T.

WAYMARK: This word, which renders tsiyyūn, 'something set up' in Jer 31 21, is the same Heb. term rendered "sign" in Ezk 39 15 and "monument" in II K 23 17. E. E. N.

WEALTH: This word is used to render the following Heb. and Gr. terms: (1) n'khāṣīm ('possessions,' II Ch 1 11 f.; Ec 5 19). The conception here is primarily that of property in abundance, worldly goods. (2) hōn, 'things possessed' (Ps 112 3; Pr 10 15, etc.), conveying the same general sense as (1). (3) ḥayil, 'strength' (Gn 34 29; Job 31 25), emphasizing the thought of power and social standing belonging to the possessor of wealth. (4) kōaḥ, 'strength' (Pr 5 10 AV; cf. RV). (5) ṭōbh, 'good' (Job 21 13; Ezr 9 12, "prosperity" RV, and Est 10 3, "good" RV), bringing into view the desirableness of wealth. (6) shālēw, 'ease' (Jer 49 31, "at ease" RV), pointing to the comfort and luxury made possible by wealth, or, in a broader sense, to the freedom to do one's pleasure (Ps 66 12; "abundance" RVmg.). (7) εὐπορία, 'abundance of means' (Ac 19 25). A. C. Z.

WEAN: This word renders gāmal, 'to complete' or 'finish,' and in every passage is used concerning a child which has been weaned (cf. I S 1 22 ff., etc.). Hebrew mothers usually nursed their children two or three years (cf. II Mac 7 28), as is the custom in Palestine to-day. The weaning of a child was accompanied by a feast (Gn 21 8) with an offering (I S 1 24). C. S. T.

WEAVE, WEAVING. See ARTISAN LIFE, § 12.

WEB: In Is 59 5 f. the word rendered "webs" is qūr (in pl. form), which means a 'fine thread,' and hence a spider's 'web.' In Jg 16 13 f. the term maṣṣekheth is the 'web' or fabric which was being woven in the loom by Delilah. According to Moore (Int. Crit. Com., ad loc.), we should read thus: "If thou weave the seven braids of my head along with the web, and beat up with the pin [i.e., so as to make the texture as firm as possible], my strength will fail me," etc. Thus Delilah is represented as actually weaving Samson's locks into the fabric, and, having "beaten" this as firm as possible, as calling to him that the Philistines were upon him. Samson arose, fastened to the web, and pulled up the loom to which the web was secured. In Job 8 14 the word rendered "web" means simply 'house.' E. E. N.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES: The most ancient systems of weights and measures were of Babylonian and Egyptian origin. The Babylonian sexagesimal system was thoroughly scientific, being based probably on a unit of length, possibly astronomically ascertained, the cube of which gave the unit for measures of capacity, the weight of water contained in this cube giving the unit for weights. As all the civilization of Western Asia was profoundly influenced by the Babylonian, it was the Babylonian system of weights and measures that formed the basis of the systems in use throughout the whole region from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean. The Hebrews in Palestine were also largely influenced by the Egyptian decimal system, through which they appear to have modified the Babylonian system in some respects. The Phœnicians and Persians also modified the Babylonian tables by diminishing or increasing the values of the fundamental units. See MONEY § 3. The weights and measures we find in the O T can not be counted as all belonging to the unmodified Babylonian system, but must be reckoned as belonging now to one, now to another of the systems with which the Hebrews were familiar and used at different periods of their history. In the N T times the Jews were familiar with the Græco-Roman system, to which some of the N T terms are to be referred.

1. Introductory.

That the most primitive system of measurement made use of certain parts of the body as units seems to be a well-established fact. Such a system, once in vogue, would yield very slowly to a more artificial, even though it were a more scientific, system. Among the Hebrews and other ancient peoples, the smallest unit of length seems to have been the finger, 'etsba' (Jer 52 21), four fingers making a handbreadth, ṭephaḥ (I K 7 26), three handbreadths a span, zereth (Ex 28 16, etc.), and two spans a cubit, 'ammāh. In Ezk 40 5 we read that the cubit used in measuring the (ideal) Temple of the prophet's vision was "a cubit and a handbreadth" in length. This would indicate that the ordinary cubit was a handbreadth shorter than the cubit used for the Temple. In Dt 3 11 we read of a "cubit of a man," i.e., the common cubit. It is likely that the dimensions of Ezekiel's Temple were exactly those of Solomon's and, therefore, that the longer cubit was in use as early as Solomon's day (cf. also II Ch 3 3, where it is said that the cubit of Solomon's Temple was "after the first measure," i.e., the old cubit). Thus the Hebrews knew and used two cubits, one a handbreadth longer than the other. Exactly the same usage was in vogue in Egypt, where a short cubit of 6 handbreadths (17.68 in.) existed alongside of a 'royal' cubit of 7 handbreadths. Two cubits were also used in ancient Babylonia, a common and a 'royal' cubit, the common cubit being either single (about 19½ in.) or double (39¼ in.). The actual length of the Hebrew common cubit is a matter of some uncertainty. Kennedy (in HDB, iv, 907 ff.) has argued quite conclusively that it was a little shorter than the Egyptian short cubit, or about 17.58 in. This would give us the following results for the Bible terms:

2. Measures of Length.

Finger	= .7325 in.	or about	¾ in.
Handbreadth (4 fingers)	= 2.93 in.	" "	3 in.
Span (3 handbreadths)	= 8.79 in.	" "	9 in.
Cubit (short)	= 17.58 in.	" "	1½ ft.
Cubit (of Ezekiel's Temple, etc.)	= 20.51 in.	" "	1¾ ft.
Reed (6 cubits—short)	= 105.48 in.	" "	8¾ ft.
(6 " long)	= 123.06 in.	" "	10¼ ft.

The "cubit," gōmedh, mentioned in Jg 3 16 was probably a short measure, a little less than the common cubit in length.

Of the measures of distance mentioned in the Bible, the pace, tsa'adh (II S 6 13), was probably not an exact measure. The mete yard, middāh (Lv 19 35 AV), is simply a "measure of length" (RV). The day's journey was from four to eight hours' walk. A Sabbath-day's journey (Ac 1 12) was 2,000 cubits, based on Jos 3 4. The scribes found ways, by legal fictions, of increasing this distance to as much as 4,000 cubits. The Gr. furlong, στάδιον, stadium (Lk 24 13, etc.), was a little less than ⅛ of a Roman mile (Mt 5 41), which contained 1,000 paces or about 5,000 of our feet. The furlong contained 600 Gr. ft. (=582½ Eng. ft.). The fathom (Ac 27 28) was about 6 ft.

The term tsemedh, rendered acre (Is 5 10), means 'yoke,' and indicates the amount of surface a yoke of cattle could plow (on an average) in a day. In I S 14 14 the Heb. ma'ănāh, rendered "acre" in AV, is rendered "furrow" in RV; but the text here is probably corrupt. According to Kennedy, the Heb. tsemedh was about 100 cubits square (=about half an acre).

3. Measures of Capacity.

The system of measures of capacity in use among the Hebrews was the Babylonian sexagesimal system, although the names of the various measures may not have been in all cases identical. With the Hebrews the smallest unit of capacity was the log, lōg. From the O T and other sources we get the following tables:

1. Dry Measure.

1 log (Lv 14 10, 12, 15, 21, 24). The unit for both dry and liquid measures.
4 logs = 1 cab, qabh (II K 6 25). Later used also for liquids.
1⅘ cabs = 1 omer, 'ōmer (Ex 16 36, etc.), the same as the "tenth" (deal AV) of Lv 14 10, etc.
3⅓ omers = 1 seah, ṣe'āh (measure EV, Gn 18 6; I S 25 18; I K 18 32; II K 7 1, 16, 18).
3 seahs = 1 ephah, 'ēphāh (Ex 16 36; Ezk 45 11, etc.).
5 ephahs = 1 letekh, lethekh (Hos 3 2).
2 letekhs = 1 homer, ḥōmer (or kor, kor) (Is 5 10; Ezk 45 10-14).

Or,

1	log											= about 1 pt.
4	logs	=	1	cab								= 2 qts.
7⅓	"	=	1⅓	cabs	=	1	omer					= 7⅓ pts.
24	"	=	6	"	=	3⅓	omers	=	1	seah		= 1½ pks.
72	"	=	18	"	=	10	"	=	3	seahs	= 1 ephah	= 1 bu., 4 qts.
360	"	=	90	"	=	50	"	=	15	"	= 5 ephahs	= 1 letekh = 5½ bu., 4 qts.
720	"	=	180	"	=	100	"	=	30	"	= 10 "	= 1 homer (kor) = 11 bu., 1 pk.

Many of these terms are obscured in our EV by the indefinite rendering "measure(s)" often given to them. The ephah (=the liquid bath) seems to have been the measure most generally used. The omer or 'tenth' (of an ephah) was probably a late measure, obtained by the application of the decimal system. Apart from the omer, all the measures of the table are the result of multiples or divisions in sexagesimal system. The "measures" referred to in I K 18 32 are 'seahs,' and the statement means, probably, that the trench was long enough to encircle a piece of ground of the size that two seahs of grain would sow. In the N T the term bushel (μόδιος, Mt 5 15, etc.) was the O T seah, and "measure" (χοῖνιξ, chœnix, Rev 6 6) was a small Gr. dry measure of 2 sextarii or pints.

2. Liquid Measures. For these we have the following table:

1 log (Lv 14 10, etc.).
4 logs = 1 cab
12 " = 3 cabs = 1 hin, hīn (Ex 29 40, etc.).
72 " = 18 " = 6 hins = 1 bath, bath (=ephah) (I K 7 26; II Ch 2 10; Ezk 45 14, etc.).
720 " = 180 " = 60 " = 10 baths = 1 kor, kōr (=homer) (I K 4 22; II Ch 27 5; Ezk 45 14).

Or,

1 log = 1 pt. (approximately). 1 bath = 9 gals.
1 cab = 2 qts. 1 kor = 90 gals.
1 hin = 1½ gals.

In the N T we find βάτος = 'bath' (Lk 16 6, "measure" EV), and κόρος = 'cor' (Lk 16 7, "measure" EV, here used as a dry measure). In Mt 13 33 the Gr. is σάτον = 'seah.' The firkin (μετρητής) referred to in Jn 2 6 was a Gr. measure about equivalent to the Heb. bath.

4. Weights. The Hebrew system of weights was Babylonian in its arrangement, although the actual values of the several weights was not at all times identical with those of Babylonia.

(a) The Babylonian table was the following:

60 shekels = 1 mina.
60 minas = 1 talent (3,600 shekels).

It is remarkable that, as with length measures, so with weights, there was a double system in vogue, the weights in one being exactly double those in the other. Several very ancient inscribed stone weights (½, ⅙, ⅓, and 1 mina) show that the (light) mina weight was approximately 490 grams or 7,580 grains Troy.

This would give the following results:

Light.

1 shekel =	126 gr.	Troy = about	.36 oz.	avoirdupois.
1 mina =	7,580 "	" = "	1 1/12 lbs.	"
1 talent =	454,800 "	" = "	65 lbs.	"

Heavy.

1 shekel =	252 gr.	Troy = about	.72 oz.	avoirdupois.
1 mina =	15,160 "	" = "	2⅛ lbs.	"
1 talent =	909,600 "	" = "	130 lbs.	"

This double (light and heavy) system seems to have been the one in general use in Babylonia, whence it spread, though with some changes in the exact weight of the different measures, throughout the ancient civilized world. Alongside of these weights another and heavier scale was also used in Babylonia and Assyria in which the (light) mina weighed about 505 grams, giving a light shekel of about 130 gr. Troy, and a heavy shekel of about 260 gr. Troy, as over against those of 126 gr. and 252 gr. in common use. This heavier Babylonian scale is frequently called the 'royal' standard to distinguish it from the common.

(b) In addition to the Babylonian common system in which the shekels were of 126 and 252 grains, the Phœnicians used a scale in which the (heavy) shekel weighed 218–224 gr. (with a corresponding light shekel of about 112 gr.). In this system 50 (instead of 60) shekels were reckoned to a mina, giving 3,000 (instead of 3,600) shekels to a talent. This division of the mina into 50 (instead of 60) shekels was perhaps due to the influence of the Egyptian decimal system, and probably was first applied to money-weights. Through the Phœnician traders it was known not only to the Hebrews, but in addition spread into the Persian, Greek, and Roman world, where, however, it became much modified by combination with other modes of subdivision.

(c) Still a third system of weights appears to have been once current in Western Asia. Evidence of it is found in the record of tribute paid to Thothmes III by Syrian states as early as 1500 B.C. and also in a few weights recently discovered in middle and Southern Palestine belonging to an early period. In this system the (heavy) shekel weighed 320 gr. and the light 160 gr. Kennedy considers that this heavier Syrian standard was obtained by raising the common Babylonian mina by 5 per cent., giving a light mina of about 8,000 gr. and a heavy one of 16,000 gr., and then dividing this result by 50 (instead of 60), giving shekels of 160 gr. and 320 gr. respectively. See MONEY, §§ 3 ff.

(d) Turning now to the weights mentioned in the Bible, it may be remarked in passing that money-weights and merchandise-weights were probably originally identical, the former being only conveniently differentiated from the latter. The weights themselves were of stone (like those discovered in Babylonia and Palestine) of various shapes, inscribed with such statements as "½ mina, true weight," or "netseph" (נצף), i.e., 'half' (sometimes a half-shekel) or, as in one case, "¼ netseph, ¼ shekel," i.e., "one-fourth of a half-shekel"; or they might be of bronze or other metal, properly inscribed. The weights ('ebhen, 'stone') were carried by the merchants in a bag, kīṣ (Dt 25 13; Mic 6 11). Balances, mō'znayim (Lv 19 36, etc.), were used in weighing, the bar of which was sometimes called the 'reed' (Is 46 6) or the 'yoke' (Rev 6 5); cf. also Gn 23 16.

The smallest division of the shekel mentioned in the O T is the gerah, gērāh = $\frac{1}{20}$ shekel (Ex 30 13, probably here a money-weight). The quarter-shekel is mentioned in I S 9 8, one-third of a shekel in Neh 10 32, and the beka, beqa' (bekah AV), or half-shekel in Ex 38 26. These were all small silver money-weights (not coins; see MONEY, § 2f.) The shekel, sheqel, as a weight is frequently mentioned in the O T (Ex 30 23 ff.; Nu 7 13 ff.; Jos 7 21; I S 17 5, 7; II S 14 26, etc.). It is not easy to decide just what shekel is referred to in each case. The shekel of the sanctuary referred to in the 'priestly' writings (Ex, Lv, Nu, I Ch) was probably the old Phœnician shekel of 224 (112) grains. Absalom's hair weighed 200 shekels "after the king's weight" (II S 14 26). If this passage is a post-exilic gloss, the king referred to is the Persian monarch, and the shekel is to be taken as the light Persian shekel of 130 gr. (126 gr. raised about 5 per cent.). But this is uncertain. In other (older) references either the Phœnician (224/112 gr.) or the Syrian (320/160 gr.) shekel is meant.

The mina (māneh, Ezk 45 12, rendered pound in I K 10 17; Ezr 2 69; Neh 7 71 f.) is counted in the later books of the O T on the Phœnician system as containing 50 shekels (the correct reading in Ezk 41 12 is that of the LXX. [Cod. A], "five shekels shall be five, and ten shekels ten, and fifty shekels shall be your maneh"). In the earlier records (e.g., II K 10 17) the Babylonian mina of 60 shekels is probably meant, in this case the heavier one, though the Chronicler seems to have understood it as a mina of 100 (light) shekels (II Ch 9 16).

The talent, kikkār, is frequently mentioned both as a money measure and as a weight proper (Ex 37 24, 38 24 f., etc.). In regard to this, as is the case with the shekel and mina, the talent of the later literature (the P elements of the Pent., Ch, Ezr, Neh) is the Phœnician talent of 3,000 shekels of 224 (112) gr. each, i.e., 672,000 gr. (heavy) or 336,000 gr. (light). In the earlier notices either the heavier Babylonian or Syrian talent is meant.

During the Græco-Roman age the Jews appear to have worked out a syncretistic money and weight system by combining the Phœnician and Attic-Roman systems. According to Kennedy, this was as follows (for both money and weights):

6 mā'ā (1 mā'ā = 1 obol)	= 1 zūz or denarius (drachm),	52½	gr.
2 zūz	= 1 shekel (light),	105	"
4 "	= 1 " (heavy) or tetradrachm,	210	"
50 "	= 1½ minas or p'rāṣ,	2,625	"
100 "	= 1 mina (= 4 tetradrachms),	5,250	"
6,000 " (3,000 shekels)	= 1 talent,	315,000	"

Here we get light on the statements in Dn 5 25 ff.: "mene" = mina, "tekel" is the Aramaic form of shekel, and "u-pharsin" = u-perās, i.e., 'and a peras.' Thus the enigmatic writing was: "a mina, a mina, a shekel, and a half-mina." The Gr. word μνᾶ, rendered pound in Lk 19 35, is the money mina of this later table. The other Gr. word λίτρα, rendered pound in Jn 12 3, 19 39, was the same as the mina and the equivalent of the Rom. libra or 'pound.'

WELL[1]: The word commonly rendered "well" is be'ēr; of other words so rendered, 'ayin, ma'yān, māqōr, and πηγή, all mean 'spring,' or 'fountain' (except in Is 12 3; Neh 2 13; Jn 4 6, 14), and are so rendered by ARV; bōr is a 'cistern' (except in II S 23 15 f. = I Ch 11 17 f.; Jer 6 7), to which φρέαρ corresponds in the N T (Lk 14 5; Jn 4 11 f.). On account of the long, dry summer, wells are of supreme importance to the inhabitants of Palestine (cf. the rites in Gn 21 27 ff.), and are still sources of frequent strife, especially among the Bedawin (cf. Gn 26 20 f.). Abundance of water is a type of the highest beauty and happiness (Song 5 15; Is 12 13; Jn 4 14; cf. Is 41 18), and the Oriental taste can readily distinguish between water from different sources (cf. II S 23 15). The water for household use is usually drawn and carried by women (cf. Gn 24 11; Jn 4 15). The male drawer of water (Dt 29 11; Jos 9 21) is engaged in one of the most menial, fatiguing, and poorly paid occupations. See FOOD, § 12; also CISTERN; FOUNTAIN; PIT; SPRING.

WELL[2]: This word occurs a few times as the transl. of shālōm, 'peace,' in the common salutation or greeting, in which one asks after the welfare of another (Gn 29 6, 37 14, 43 27; II S 18 28; II K 4 23, 26, 5 21, 22, 9 11; also RV, II S 20 9, "art thou in health" AV; II S 18 29, 32, "safe" AV). The Heb. idiom 'to ask one of his welfare' (Jer 15 5) is often rendered by "salute," "greet," etc. (cf. Jg 18 15; I S 10 4, 17 22; I Ch 18 10, etc.). See SALUTATION.

WHEEL[2]: This term renders: (1) 'ōphān (Ex 14 25; I K 7 30-33; Ezk 1 15-21, 3 13, 10 6-19, 11 22; Nah 3 2). (2) galgal (Ec 12 6; Is 5 28; Jer 47 3; Ezk 10 2, 6, 13, 23 24, 26 10; Dn 7 9). Wheels of chariots or of carts were probably made like the Egyptian and Assyrian wheels with six spokes, hishshūqīm, set in the hub, hishshūr, and the rim, gabh. The tire was fastened with thongs passed through holes and bound around the rim. From the circumstance that cart-wheels were employed to thresh out grain, the wheel is used as a symbol of calamity in Pr 20 26 and Is 28 27. In Ezekiel's vision the wheels are animate beings that form part of the chariot-throne of J", hence in Eth. En., 61 10, 70 7, 'wheels' become a special class of angels along with cherubim and seraphim.

WHIRLWIND: A frequent translation of ṣūphāh, 'storm-wind,' ṣa'ar and ṣe'ārā, 'storm,' 'tempest.' In other passages the same words are often translated "storm" or "tempest." This is a more accurate rendering, since there is nothing in any of these forms that suggests the idea of whirling. The proper word for "whirlwind" is galgal, lit. 'wheel' (Ps 83 14 [13], "wheel" AV, 77 19 [18]; "heaven" AV; Is 17 13; "wind" EV). All these words are used figuratively of a swift and terrible destruction (Pr 1 27, 10 25; Is 5 28, 17 13, 21 1, 40 24, 41 16, 66 15; Jer 4 13, 23 19, 30 23; Hos 8 7; Am 1 14; Nah 1 3; Zec 9 14).

WHITE. See Colors, § 1; also Dress and Ornaments, § 5.

WHITE OF AN EGG: The rendering of the Heb. phrase rīr ḥallāmūth (in Job 6 6, "the juice of purslain" RVmg.). But rīr means 'slime,' or 'spittle' (cf. I S 21 14), and ḥallāmūth is of uncertain meaning, though some take it to be the name of an insipid herb. However, the yolk of an egg is just as probable a rendering. "The slime of the yolk" would indeed be an apt illustration of a tasteless, uninviting article of food. E. E. N.

WHORE, WHOREDOM: In a figurative sense, these words are often used in the O T to designate disloyalty to J" on the part of Israel, either through the worship of other deities, or through the practise of gross materialism and sensuality in their (nominal) worship of Him. The conception leading to the use of such a figure was that the relation between J" and Israel was like a marriage-covenant, in which Israel the spouse was pledged to exclusive loyalty to J", her husband (cf. Hosea's teaching on this). The prevalence of gross sensualism in the common Semitic religion (q.v.) also easily led to the use of such a figure. See also Crimes and Punishments, § 2 (c), and Harlot. E. E. N.

WICKED, WICKEDNESS, WICKEDLY: These terms render the following Heb. and Gr. words: (1) 'āwen, 'one who causes needless pain or trouble for another,' hence 'needless,' 'false,' etc. (Job 11 11, "false" RV, 22 15; Pr 30 20, etc.). (2) b'liyya'al, 'useless,' 'profitless' (Dt 15 9, "base" RV; Job 34 18, "vile" RV; Ps 101 3, "base" RV; Neh 1 11, "wickedness" RV, 15). (3) Derivations of 'āwal, 'to yield' or 'bend,' i.e., 'crooked,' 'perverse' (Job 18 21, 29 17, 31 3, all "unrighteous" RV; II S 3 34, "iniquity" RV, 7 10, etc.). (4) 'āmāl, 'tired,' 'in painful work,' 'trouble' (Job 4 8, "trouble" RV, 20 22, "misery" RV). (5) 'ōtsebh, 'pain' (Ps 139 24). (6) hawwāh (from hāwāh, 'to fall'), that which 'befalls,' i.e., 'misfortune,' 'evil,' etc. (Ps 5 9, 52 7, 55 11). (7) Derivatives of zāmam, 'to think' or 'plan,' but generally in an evil sense (Lv 18 17; Ps 37 7, 140 8, "evil" RV; Pr 21 27, etc.). (8) rā'a' and its derivative ra', a general term for 'bad' or 'evil' (Gn 6 5, 13 13 and often). (9) rāsha', resha', primarily 'loose,' 'looseness,' and then used almost entirely in a moral sense; the most common terms for "wicked," "wickedness," often contrasted with "righteous," "righteousness" (Gn 18 23; I S 24 13, etc.). (10) ḥesedh, 'shameful' (Lv 20 17; cf. RV). (11) 'ānash, 'to be weak,' or 'sick' (Jer 17 9, "corrupt" RV). In the N T the most common term is (12) πονηρός, πονηρία, corresponding to (9) above (Mt 12 45, 22 18, etc.). (13) κακός, κακία, corresponding to (8) above (Mt 21 41; Ac 8 22). (14) ἄθεσμος, 'not lawful' (II P 2 7, 3 17). (15) ἄνομος, 'lawless' (Ac 2 23). (16) ἄτοπος, 'out of place' (Ac 25 5, "amiss" RV).

WILDERNESS: In general, this term signifies, not a sterile sandy desert like the Sahara without water and vegetation—since the Hebrews were unacquainted with any such place—but an uncultivated region, devoted to pasturage, thinly peopled, and occupied by nomads. (1) The most common word translated "wilderness" is midhbār, literally 'a place for the driving of cattle.' It is referred to as the abode of pelicans (Ps 10 26), wild asses (Job 24 5), ostriches (La 4 3), and jackals (Mal 1 3). Chief among such places were the wilderness of the wanderings (Nu 14 33), the wilderness of Judah (Jg 1 16), and the wilderness of Moab (Dt 2 8). (2) A stronger term, expressive of greater barrenness, is y'shīmōn, a 'dry' or 'riverless' region (Is 43 19). When accompanied by the definite article, it is the geographical description of that part of Judah immediately W. of the Dead Sea (Nu 21 20; I S 23 24). (3) A third term is 'ărābhāh, meaning 'arid' and 'barren' (Is 33 9, 51 3). With the article, it is the geographical proper name of the great depression N. and S. of the Dead Sea (Dt 1 7, etc.). (4) A fourth term is tsiyyāh, signifying land of 'drought' (Hos 2 3). (5) A fifth is tōhū, conveying the double notion of 'waste' and 'confusion' (Dt 32 10). (6) The N T term is ἔρημος, which is used with considerable latitude (Mt 14 13; He 11 38). John the Baptist preached in the wilderness of Judæa (Mt 3 1), and here also, probably, Jesus was tempted (Mt 4 1). G. L. R.

WILL: There is no word used in Scripture for the will as a distinct power or faculty. (1) In the O T various Heb. words occur, generally in verbal forms, which are translated by the English words "would," "will," or "willing." One of these ('ābhāh) is almost never used without a negative (Lv 26 21; Dt 10 10; Jos 24 10; II S 3 16, 17); even where the negative is not used it seems to be suggested (Pr 1 10; Is 1 19). Another (rātsōn) is formed from a verb meaning 'to be kind' or 'favorable toward.' When used of J", therefore, it means His 'will' in the sense of His good pleasure, the thing He wishes to see done (Ps 40 6, 8, 143 10). The remaining important word (ḥāphēts) likewise rests on the idea of inclination, desire, delight (I S 2 25; I K 13 33; I Ch 28 9). In Ps 40 6, 8 it is translated by the LXX. (39 7, 9) into both ἐθέλειν and βούλεσθαι. Probably, the means by which the mind of the people came to think more definitely of the will of God was the canonization of the Law. That represented a permanent character as opposed to a passing impulse, a will which is more than desire or pleasure, because it contains an element of absolute or objective worth. (2) In the N T the idea of will is expressed by two words, βούλεσθαι (whence βουλή) and θέλειν (whence θέλημα). The nouns occur in much larger proportion than in the O T. While the words are often apparently equivalent (cf. Mt 11 27 and Jn 5 21), there is yet a range of meaning peculiar to each. In general, it may be said that βουλή lies behind θέλημα as its source. The former means plan or design, the will which is prior to the specific volition; the latter is the projection of purpose in a definite act or word (Ac 4 28; I Co 4 5; Eph 1 11). This vital though subtle difference appears in two other passages of pathetic import. In Mt 1 19 Joseph had the will (θέλων) not to act in one way and planned (ἐβουλήθη) to act in another. In Lk 22 42 our Lord appeals to the βουλή of the Father as if it were the source of alternative θελήματα; but He submits His own will absolutely to the conclusive will (θέλημα) of the Father. Thus in the life of Jesus there came to view in startling light that profound problem, the relation of the human will to the Divine, and thence arose in the experience of Christendom for all time the one supreme task, agony, and hope of man. The will of God is ever spoken of as something at last fully known (Mt 6 10, 7 21; Lk 12 47; Ac 22 14; Ro 2 18, 12 2; Col 1 9, 4 12). It is now confronting every man through the gospel, and the will of every man is confronting it (Jn 6 39, 40, 7 17, 9 31). Here the climax of human experience is reached. For, on the one hand, salvation is just the will of God (both βουλή and θέλημα) taking full effect on a man (Eph 1 3-11), and, on the other hand, the will of man recognizing and doing that will (Mt 23 37; Jn 5 40; I Jn 2 17), conscious of warfare in its own inner life (Ro 7 15-21), but succored even there by the grace Divine (He 13 20 f; Ph 2 13). WISDOM, WISE MEN: In Jer 18 18 the intellectual classes of ancient Israel are spoken of as consisting of priests, prophets, and "the wise." It was the function of the priests to give the 'torah' or instruction, of the prophets to give the "word," and of the wise to give "counsel." This reference to conditions as they existed in later pre-exilic days doubtless holds true for a long period preceding. It can hardly be doubted that, from a very early period, "the wise" formed a class of no small importance in ancient Hebrew society, although references to them in the extant early literature are few and somewhat unsatisfactory.

1. The Wise Men of Ancient Israel.

The earliest reference to "the wise" as such is in II S 14 2, to the wise woman of Tekoa, whom Joab made use of to persuade David to recall Absalom from exile. Another wise woman is mentioned in II S 20 16 ff., who delivered the city of Abel, a center of ancient wisdom (cf. ver. 18), by her wise advice. Solomon is viewed not simply as wise in the ordinary sense, but as a prominent "wise man." With Solomon are mentioned others, some by name, as "Ethan the Ezrahite, and Heman and Calcol and Darda"; still others more indefinitely characterized as "children of the east," all of whom Solomon surpassed in wisdom. Such references, together with the presuppositions in the earlier portions of Pr (q.v.), and the development necessary to be assumed before such literature as we have in the wisdom books of the O T could be produced, make it necessary to posit the existence of numerous and influential wisdom schools or circles throughout the whole kingdom period, as well as during the exilic and post-exilic periods.

The beginnings of the wisdom development in Israel were, naturally, simple and informal. It was not the great problems of life that occupied their attention, but something much less abstruse. From the evidence we possess it would seem that they gave their attention mainly to the formulation of brief, epigrammatic sayings containing keen observations on life or nature, or to the construction of riddles or parables. In all this there was little or no science or unity, except as to the literary form in which the observations were embodied. This at last came to be fixed, at least in its fundamental form, as the māshāl (see PROVERB and PROVERBS, BOOK OF, § 3). The fable of Jotham (Jg 9 7-15) and of Jehoash (II K 14 9), the clever story of the wise woman of Tekoa (II S 14 5 f.), the parable of Nathan (II S 12 1-6), the riddle of Samson (Jg 14 14) and his ready retort when it was solved (ver. 18) are examples of what was likely to be produced in the early wisdom circles. Solomon is said to have composed 1,005 songs and 3,000 proverbs, and to have spoken of "trees, from the cedar that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall; he spake also of beasts, and of birds, and of creeping things, and of fishes" (II K 4 32 f.).

2. The Work of the Ancient Wisdom Schools.

A complete statement of the final aim of the early wisdom schools is given in Pr 1 2-6. This may be taken as expressing what finally resulted from the earlier efforts. More and more the practical and moral aim predominated. Observations on beasts and birds, etc., became of secondary importance. Attention was concentrated on life, and the wise man sought to show how the every-day life could be and ought to be lived in order to insure the greatest success and happiness. The deeper problems were left untouched. It was reserved for a few chosen spirits among the wise men of a later day to struggle with these (see § 3, below). Proficiency in such knowledge was designated ḥokhmāh, "wisdom," and he who was a master of it was ḥākhām, "wise" (from a root signifying primarily 'to be fixed' or 'solid'). In addition to ḥokhmāh, other terms occur less frequently, such as 'ormāh, 'shrewdness' or "prudence" (Pr 1 4), bīnāh and t'bhūnāh, 'understanding,' m'zimmāh, 'cleverness' or "discretion" (Pr 1 4), and tūshiyyāh, the ability to succeed, to help oneself. These, however, may belong to the later periods of the wisdom development.

What degree of organization these wisdom schools or circles possessed is unknown, as are also their methods. The gate of an ancient city was a place of public concourse where the elders assembled, public questions were discussed, cases tried, etc. (cf. Gn 19 1, 23 10 ff.; Dt 21 18 f., 22 15, 24; II S 19 8 f., etc.), and it may well have been the case that here in ancient Israel the wise men were wont to meet, to try one another's skill with hard questions or riddles, to make observations on manners and customs, and to formulate rules of conduct (cf. Pr 1 20 f., 31 23). Here the younger men learned the wisdom of their elders, and thus the wisdom of one generation was passed on to another. It would thus be easy for one locality to become famous for its wisdom school, and through visits of members of other wisdom circles to impart its knowledge to and receive new wisdom from other schools (cf. Job, a wise man, and his three friends from other localities).

All the wisdom books of the O T belong to the post-exilic age, most of them even as late as the Greek period. We are not concerned here with the details of the date, composition, and specific teachings of each of these (see separate articles PROVERBS, BOOK OF; JOB; ECCLESIASTES; ECCLESIASTICUS; and WISDOM, BOOK OF). Taken together, these books show the several main lines along which Jewish "wisdom" found its development. (a) The problem of practical morality, the conduct best suited for every-day life, is that with which Pr and Sir are mainly concerned. This is the simplest of the problems of the Hebrew wisdom. It was handled also in the simplest manner, almost altogether by the formulation of short rules of conduct in the form of m'shālīm or "proverbs." Extended discursive treatment of only one theme was not necessary. Positions such as the existence of God, His goodness, His judgments, the free will of man, etc., could be taken for granted without debate. It is true that in the latest portion of Pr (1 7–9 18; see PROVERBS, BOOK OF) there are discursive sections, and in one of these (ch. 8) a poetic description of wisdom is given in which the main theme of practical morality appears to be lost sight of. But even here there is no serious attempt to discuss any new problem, and at the end "wisdom" is resolved into the governing principle of right conduct (8 31 ff.). The same is true of the later wisdom of Ben Sira; for, while in his hands the problem of right conduct takes on a broader scope involving more of the national aspects (wisdom has its seat in Israel, as the Law, ch. 24) and occasionally comes close to the problem of sin (as in ch. 17), and also is more discursive than Pr, the book as a whole deals with no other subject at length than that of practical morality (except, of course, in the "hymn to the fathers," chs. 44–50), in which religion and ethics are, as in Pr, treated as one. (b) It is a problem of a very different sort that is discussed in Job and Ec. In these all the positions of the ancient wisdom are not taken for granted, except the one most fundamental—that God is, and that He is essentially just. But the world God had made aroused troublesome questionings. In Job it is the moral problem of the Divine government, especially the apparent injustice of the sufferings of the righteous, which seems to destroy all confidence in God's care for His servants and to annihilate the (supposed) difference between the righteous and the wicked. The problem is discussed and the negative side presented in masterly fashion, but no positive solution is reached. In Ec a more pessimistic note is struck. Everything seems involved in one ceaseless round, no definite aim or end ever being reached. "All is vanity." In neither book is the doctrine of a future life, with its ethical significance, made use of as helping to solve the problem. Both books show the need of a fuller revelation of God and immortality than had yet been given. (c) In the Wisdom of Solomon (Wis) we have Jewish wisdom in conflict with Epicurean tendencies due to contact with Greek life and philosophy. And it is a noble and beautiful reply that is made to the shallow philosophy in this book. Wisdom is the path not only of rectitude but of life, which death can not destroy, for beyond the grave the righteous find their reward. "Hades hath not a royal dominion on earth and righteousness is immortal" (1 14 f.), and wisdom "passing from generation to generation unto holy souls maketh men friends of God. Against wisdom evil doth not prevail she reacheth from one end (onward) . . and ordereth all things graciously" (7 27-30). It is a wholesome, optimistic philosophy that is taught in this, the last important product of the Jewish wisdom schools. (d) One phase of the problem of the Divine government, untouched in Job and Ec, the problem of Israel, God's Chosen People, maltreated, oppressed, and held under the sway of the heathen, was left to be handled by the apocalyptic writers, who thus became, in a measure, the successors of the wisdom school (see DANIEL and ENOCH, BOOKS OF). The Maccabæan war and the resulting changes in Palestinian life brought new interests to the front and diverted the attention of learned Jews to new subjects. "Wisdom" ceased to be a special object of study.

4. Wisdom in the New Testament.

The story that wise men, μάγοι (Mt 2 1 ff.), came from the East to Judæa to find a new-born king is not at all improbable. There was then a general, wide-spread expectancy of some such event, and it is quite likely that certain devout astrologers of Babylonia should have been led by some unusual heavenly phenomena to make such a journey. "Wise men" is used here as the equivalent of magician or astrologer, as in a few passages of the O T (Gn 41 8; Dn 2 12 ff.; cf. Allen in Int. Crit. Com. on Matthew). In a sense, Jesus should be counted as one of the "wise men" of Israel. In His use of the parable and in the epigrammatic form of much of His teaching He followed the earlier wisdom methods. He was also well acquainted with thc Book of Proverbs (see Kent, pp. 176–201).

In Lk 11 49 the words "therefore also said the wisdom of God" may be merely equivalent to "therefore God in His wisdom hath said." No known wisdom book contains the following words, which seem to be a quotation, and it is possible that here Jesus speaks, like one of the prophets of old, a Divine word on His own initiative (cf. Plummer in Int. Crit. Com., ad loc.). In Paul "wisdom," so far as it is condemned or made the opposite of the higher wisdom revealed in the gospel, is the current philosophy of Greece, which Paul felt was apt to prove a dangerous rival to the truth of God as revealed in Christ (cf. I Co 1 19 ff., 2 5 ff., etc.). See also ASTROLOGY AND ASTRONOMY, § 9, and MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 7.

WISDOM OF JESUS. See ECCLESIASTICUS.

WISDOM OF SOLOMON: One of the books of the O T Apocrypha, entitled in full, "The Wisdom of Solomon," but generally known as the Book of Wisdom. It was a product of Alexandrian Judaism. It was written in Greek, and has been preserved for us in several of the great MSS. (ℵ ABC), also in several versions. Because of its exalted teaching, its devout spirit, and its fine diction, it has always been held in the highest esteem. Indeed, no other non-canonical book, except perhaps Ecclesiasticus, can rival it in the honor and reverence of the Church.

1. Title and General Characteristics.

The book is divided into two main parts, chs. 1–9 and chs. 10–19. The general theme is wisdom, and the author speaks of this, both in its Divine and in its human aspects. In its Divine aspect, wisdom is a personification of the spiritual power of God, everywhere present, and the soul of all things beautiful and noble. "She is the breath of the power of God, and a pure influence flowing from the glory of the Almighty. She is the brightness of the everlasting light, the unspotted mirror of the power of God, and the image of his goodness" (7 25-26). In its human aspect, wisdom is that knowledge of things Divine and human which manifests itself in a righteous life. The wise man is the godly man. With these conceptions in mind, the writer addresses himself, first, to those who have turned from the way of faith and fidelity. He contrasts with the wise man's life that of the sensualist, and points out its fearful issue. He tells of the sure reward of those who remain faithful. In the end, Wisdom will be justified of her children (chs. 1–5). Then follows a commendation of wisdom, as the source of all moral and intellectual blessings. It leads to a kingdom, and gives friendship with God and scientific knowledge. Personifying Solomon, the writer gives us a description of the nature of wisdom and how he came to have her as a life companion, and the section closes with his prayer for wisdom. In the second division of the book we are given a series of illustrations of the power of wisdom in history. Adam, Abraham, Jacob, Joseph, are examples of her protecting, beneficent care. Especially was her glorious efficacy seen in the deliverance of the children of Israel from Egypt and in their wanderings in the desert. It was this same wisdom which punished the Egyptians, and compelled them to see in Jehovah the true God. The thought of the true God suggests the folly of idolatry, particularly such idolatry as was predominant in Egypt, after considering which the author devotes the last four chs. to a review of the contrasted fortunes of the Israelites and the Egyptians in the matter of the plagues and the Exodus. The book ends somewhat abruptly, but its illustrations are clear and sufficient.

2. Contents.

The work has a double purpose—to comfort and to warn. The warning comes first, and is directed against faithless Jews—those who had succumbed to heathen philosophy and adopted heathen customs (chs. 1–5). It sets forth also the deadly peril of idolatry (chs. 13–15). On the other hand, it seeks to comfort the faithful amid their sufferings. If they will but hold to wisdom, they shall be blessed amid trial, and enter at last upon a glorious immortality. The problems of inequality and suffering for the righteous are solved in the issues which wisdom shall bring. Wisdom secures a complete theodicy. Once and again the unity of the book has been denied, and there are still those who believe it to be a composite work (see art. in JE). This, however, is not the generally accepted view. While there is a complete change of treatment in the second part, the style is the same as in the first part; so too is the language. It is all from one hand. Whose that hand was will probably never be known. Only this much is clear, that the author was an Alexandrian Jew who had a knowledge of Greek thought and life. The name of Solomon is given to the book as a transparent pseudonym—a sort of "collective name," as one says of it, "for all sapiential Hebrew literature."

3. The Aim, Unity, and Authorship.

4. Date.

The date can not be fixed within narrow limits. It is later than the Septuagint Version, for the book uses it. It is earlier than the Apostolic Age, for it contains no trace of Christian doctrine. It may probably be assigned to the 1st cent. B.C.

WOMAN: The Heb. and Gr. words which designate "woman" are: (1) 'ishshāh, 'wife'; (2) n'qēbhāh, 'female'; (3) nashīm, pl. from 'ănāshīm, 'men'; (4) γυνή, 'wife,' and (5) θήλεια, 'female.' In general, the Biblical view of woman is included in that of man (q.v.). It differs from those of other Oriental and ancient nations mainly by its placing the sexes more nearly on an equal footing in general, and in particular, in the fact that in religious matters they stand altogether on a par. So far as woman is distinguished from man, her frailty and dependence upon him are noted (Gn ch. 3; Ec 7 26, 28; I Ti ch. 2, passim). Yet in many beautiful passages the virtues of ideal womanhood are portrayed (cf. Pr ch. 31; Is 49 15 and the Book of Ruth and Song of Solomon). A. C. Z.

WONDER, WONDERFUL: The Heb. words most frequently thus rendered are: (1) mōphēth (etymol. uncertain), the term used along with 'ōth, 'sign,' for the miraculous events of the Exodus narrative (Ex 4 21, 7 3, etc.). It is twice rendered "miracle" in AV (Ex 7 9; Dt 29 3) and several times "sign" (I K 13 3, 5; II Ch 32 24; Ezk 12 6, 11, 24 24, 27; in these passages it seems to be used as a synonym of 'ōth). (2) pāla' (and derivatives), which seems to express the idea of wonder, mystery, the marvelous. This is the most frequently used term and like (1) above is often joined with 'ōth, 'sign' (Ex 3 20, 15 11; Jos 3 5; II S 1 26; Pr 30 18, etc.). It is the word pele' that is used to indicate one of the four great characteristics of the Messianic King in Is 9 6. (3) t'māh, a term indicative of astonishment (Dn 4 2 f., 6 27; cf. Is 29 9; Jer 4 9; Hab 1 5). (4) τέρας, a 'wonder,' generally in the sense of 'miracle,' but rendered "wonder" (Mt 24 24; Mk 13 22; Jn 4 48; Ac 2 19, 22, etc.). The words usually rendered sign sometimes have the sense of 'wonder' or 'miracle.' Of these 'ōth is used in a variety of other meanings (cf. Gn 1 14, the heavenly bodies as 'signs'; Jos 4 6, a memorial; I S 2 34, an event indicating the Divine will; also I S 14 10; Ps 74 4; Ezk 14 8, etc.). In the N T σημεῖον is used much in the same way as 'ōth is in the O T (Mt 12 38 f., 24 24, 30; Mk 16 17; Jn 20 30; Ro 4 11, etc.). Of other terms rendered "sign," nēṣ (Nu 26 10) means 'banner'; mas'ēth (Jer 6 1), something 'set up' as a monument. See also MIRACLES and TOKEN. E. E. N.

WOOD: In the sense of 'forest' this word translates: (1) ḥōresh, 'wooded height' (Is 23 15, 16, 18, 19). Many, however, find here a place-name ("Horesh" RVmg., or "Horesha"). Conder discovered a Khoreisa SE. of Ziph. See G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 307. The RV has "wood" (Is 17 9); the LXX. reads "of the Amorites and Hivites," as ERVmg., and the text should probably be thus emended. (2) ya'ar, 'forest,' 'thicket' (Dt 19 5 and often). When denoting pieces or articles of wood, it renders (3) 'ēts, lit. 'tree' (q.v.). From the many references to wood, it is evident that Palestine must have been more abundantly wooded than it is to-day. but the fact that wood was not often used in the building of houses shows that there were few trees from which long beams or boards could be obtained. The branches of trees and brushwood were gathered for fires (Nu 15 32; Jos 9 21 f.; I K 17 10; Jer 7 18, etc.), and were especially used in connection with offerings (Neh 13 31; Gn 22 3; Lv 1 7, etc.; I K 18 23). For Solomon's buildings timbers of cedar and fir were sent to Jerusalem from the Lebanon; the forests of Palestine itself, however, must have furnished most of the wood used in building operations (cf. Neh 2 8) and manufactured articles. Wood was used for timbers (Zec 5 4; I K 15 22), floors, and windows, and in fine houses walls and floors were covered with wood (I K 6 15). Wood was also used for the furniture of the Tabernacle (Dt 10 3) and the Temple (Dt 10 1; I Ch 29 2). Wood was also employed for wagons (I S 6 14), for all sorts of agricultural implements, and for musical instruments (II S 6 5). Idols of wood are often mentioned (Dt 29 17; II K 19 18, etc.). (4) In the N T we find ξύλον, 'wood' (I Co 3 12; Rev 18 12), ξύλινος, 'wooden' (II Ti 2 20; Rev 9 20). See also TREE. C. S. T.

WOOL: Among the Israelites, the most important material for clothing was tsemer (Aram. 'ămar, Dn 7 9), ἔριον (LXX.) 'wool' (Lv 13 47, 59; Ezk 44 17). The wool commonly used was secured by shearing the fleece of sheep. It was washed, combed, dyed, spun, and woven into cloth, or roughly fashioned in the loom into garments. To-day the wool is combed by means of a string stretched on a bow. The string is made to vibrate by the blow of a mallet, and being brought in contact with the wool, fluffs it up. Outside garments were generally of woolen cloth. The "soft raiment" (Mt 11 8; Lk 7 25) was probably made of fine wool. It was forbidden to weave cloth of wool and linen (Lv 19 19), and Ezekiel would forbid priests ministering in the sanctuary to wear woolen garments (Ezk 44 17; cf. ver. 19). As to-day, combed wool was probably used for filling mattresses and pillows. It was necessary to protect woolen garments from worms (Is 51 8). Figuratively, reference is made to the original purity and whiteness of wool (Ps 147 16; Is 1 18; Dn 7 9 = Rev 1 14). See also DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 5. C. S. T.

WORD, THE: The rendering of the Gr. term Λόγος (in theological literature often simply transliterated Logos), used in the Johannine literature as the designation of Christ as an eternal personage (Jn 1 1, 14; I Jn 1 1; Rev 19 13. Cf. also He 4 12; I P 1 23 and II P 3 5, where the term is used probably in an impersonal sense more nearly as the equivalent of 'message' or 'oracle'). In the formation of the concept and in the use of the term, Hebrew and Greek antecedents are to be distinguished. While both influenced the thought as well as the selection of the term, the Hebrew antecedents appear to have furnished more of the inner meaning and the Greek more of the philological and outward aspect. The Biblical usage of the term is derived from that of Philo, with whom it is a favorite, and not only occurs frequently, but conveys a large number of kindred notions (cf. Grossman, De Logo Philonis, 1829). Philo in his turn borrowed the term from the Stoics, and they from Heraclitus (Heinze, Die Lehre vom Logos in der Griech. Philos. 1872), by whom it appears to have been first applied to the rational principle of the universe impersonally considered. Philo's own usage is complex and varied. Yet underlying its variations and explaining them all, there is a general idea of the Word (Logos) as the rational principle in the Divine nature, which renders an expression of the Divine thought an objective reality. Upon this basis, Philo calls the Logos "the image of God" (De Mund. Op. 6), also metaphorically the "Son of God" (De Agr. Noë, 12; De Conf. Ling. 14) and even "a second God" (Qu. et. Sol. 62). He assigns to the Logos omniscience, a mediating function in the creation of the universe, and makes him the prototype of man, who is thus placed in the second remove from God Himself (cf. Drummond, Philo Judæus, 1888, II, pp. 156–273). But Philo's doctrine of the Logos is an effort to clothe what he conceived to be an O T idea in the forms of Hellenic philosophy; and the O T roots of the conception are to be found in one direction in the thought of the wisdom of God as a separate entity (ḥokhmāh), and in another in the formal expression of the will of God in articulate language (dābhār). The former of these was in particular developed and portrayed in the so-called Wisdom literature as a personal being (Job 28 12-28; Pr 1 20, 8 1 ff., etc.; Ec chs. 24–29). Whether it was thus intended to convey the impression that wisdom is a real person, apart from God, or was a rhetorical personification for the sake of more vividly describing the inexhaustible and marvelous resources of the Divine mind, at any rate in later Judaism this hypostatic presentation became more and more customary. The 'Word' also assumed a mediating place between God and the world (as in the Creation account, Gn 1 3, etc.), a view which grew into the doctrine of the Memra (cf. Edersheim, Life of Jesus the Messiah, I, pp. 47–48). But if the Logos-conception arose out of the O T ideas of the rational principle in God made manifest in Revelation, through the casting of those ideas into the molds and phraseology of Alexandrian philosophy, it went far beyond these primitive limits in the Johannine system of thought. The Word, according to the Fourth Gospel, is neither a figurative personification of the Divine reason and method of expression nor a reproduction of the ḥokhmāh or Memra. The term is used rather to identify the Messiah as a Divine Person preexisting in eternity and becoming incarnate in Jesus Christ; in other words, the resemblances between the Philonian and the Johannine conception belong to the outward garb and vehicle of the thought, the inner core of which is different in each case. Whereas the Logos of Philo is a personified representation of the Divine reason, revealing the Godhead to man, the Johannine Word is the eternal Son of God, incarnated as the Redeemer of man from sin, no less a means of revelation, but much more than a revealer, a Person in the Godhead. A. C. Z.

WORD OF THE LORD: The expressions "Word of the Lord," "of J″," "of God" (and the related expressions "my" or "his word," etc.), all have the same general idea of an utterance or command of God that must be taken as authoritative by man. But the specific meanings vary considerably according to the date of the documents in which they are found and the nature of the reference as regards the mediate source through which such "words" were communicated.

The Heb. term rendered "word" is usually dābhār, but sometimes 'āmer, 'imrāh, 'saying' or 'word,' and also peh, 'mouth.' In the O T two main usages are to be distinguished: (1) The words of instruction or command given to Moses (e.g., the Ten Commandments are called the "ten words") which were thought to have been written down by him (Ex 24 3 f.) and in an ever-expanding form at last came to be viewed as the 'statutes' and 'judgments' of Divine authority, the Law by which Israel's life was to be regulated. It was this that was probably in the mind of the Psalmist (Ps 119 passim) rather than the O T literature in general. (2) Any 'prophetic' or priestly 'oracle' was a Divine "word." Any revelation by dream, or vision, or otherwise was a Divine "word." Consequently, the prophetic instruction was viewed by the prophets themselves as "the word of J″" (Is 1 10, 2 3, etc., very often in the Prophets). Naturally, as time went on the distinction between Law and Prophecy and other ancient literature was less emphasized, and all came to be known as the "word of God." In the N T we find a corresponding variety of usage. A specific prophetic call such as that of John the Baptist is called the "word of the Lord" (Lk 3 2). Jesus' words, His message as a whole, and He Himself are all designated by the same term "word(s)" (cf. Mt 8 8; Mk 4 33; Lk 1 2; Jn 17 14). The contents of the preaching of the Gospel are termed "the word" (Ac 4 31); so also is the whole Christian movement (e.g., Ac 6 7, 19 20, etc.). See also Jesus Christ, § 19; John, Gospel of, § 5; and Prophecy, §§ 6, 9. E. E. N.

WORK, WORKS. See Justification.

WORLD: A designation of human society as a whole, willingly yielding itself to be the dwelling-place and instrument of sin. In this sense, the English represents both of the Gr. terms αἰών and κόσμος. The first of these terms is peculiarly the word in which apocalyptic literature embodied the idea of the alienation of the present order of things from God, and looked forward to its dissolution with the advent of a new order—"the coming age." The contrast is between the present world and the world to come. It emphasizes rather the duration of the world than its human organization or constitution. As such, the world is subject to the great enemy of the true God, who is its own god (II Co 4 4). It is morally evil (Gal 1 4); its influence is to be avoided, as contaminating and destructive (Ro 12 2; II Ti 4 10). The world, as a Cosmos—the primary reference of this term is rather to the ordered universe (Mt 25 34; Ac 17 24; Eph 1 4; He 4 3; II P 3 6) even in the Johannine writings (Jn 11 9, 17 24)—is identified with simple humanity socially organized. So used, it is predominantly Johannine, though not absent from other N T writers (I Co 2 12; Col 2 8; Ja 1 27, 4 4; II P 2 20). In the Johannine writings it comes to stand for the sphere of evil (Jn 12 46 f., etc.). The world is thus, first of all, at enmity with God; it hates God's chosen (Jn 15 18); it hates also those who unite themselves to Him (Jn 15 19, 16 33; I Jn 3 13). It therefore abides in darkness, rejecting the light (Jn 3 19). It is under condemnation, exposed to the Divine judgment (Jn 12 31) and needs the Divine mercy; but it can not receive the spirit of truth (Jn 14 17), and Jesus even declines to pray for it (Jn 17 9). In expressions of this sort, the emphasis is naturally on the sin of the world. It ceases to pass under that name when it comes from under sin. It is in bondage to Satan (Jn 12 31, 14 30). Its doom is death; "it passeth away" (I Jn 3 17); it is to be overcome as an enemy by God Himself; it has been overcome by Christ, and must be overcome by the disciples (Jn 16 33; I Jn 5 4, 2 15). WORMWOOD: The rendering of the Heb. la'ănāh, 'curse' (?), and the Gr. ἄψινθος, 'absinthe.' The name includes various species of Artemisia (order Compositæ), at least five of which are found in Palestine and Syria. The plants grow usually in waste places and are bitter (cf. Dt 29 18; Pr 5 4), though not actually poisonous. In Rev 8 11, this name is given to the star which fell into the rivers and the springs and made them bitter.

The English term "worship" has several more or less distinct meanings. Of these, three have importance in Biblical study, namely: (a) The explicit acknowledgment of Divine perfections (those which constitute God's 'worth-ship'); (b) any deliberate, concrete expression of thought, sentiment, or purpose, in the form of a direct address or service to God; and (c) any private or social act, custom, or institution in which the preceding expressions play a large or determinative part. Of these senses, the first is the most specialized, being somewhat confined to those acts that are often called 'adoration' or 'thanksgiving.' The commonest Biblical words, shāhāh in the O T, and προσκυνεῖν in the N T, are both derived from bodily actions of humble and reverent salutation, such as are instinctive in the presence of a superior or eminent person. The second sense is broader, since it includes, besides the foregoing, those acts that are otherwise called 'confession,' 'supplication,' 'intercession,' and the like (see Prayer). The third sense is still more general, including, when private, every aspect of conscious and definite intercourse with God, and, when social, designating the complex institution, or body of usages, more exactly known as 'public worship' or 'cultus.' It is evident that in the Bible there is an enormous amount of material more or less clearly pertaining to this subject. No attempt is here made to do more than to present a few suggestive statements upon certain topics under this general head.

1. Meaning of the Term.

As a rule, the obvious assumption of the Biblical writers is not only that God is, and that He can be known by man, but that, in His being and His works and deeds, He presents a supremacy and perfection that set Him far above man. So far as His infinite attributes are perceived and appreciated by man, they arouse wonder, awe, fear, trust, gratitude, joy, and similar sentiments, and these, when embodied in words or deeds, become explicit worship. Most of the Biblical writers manifest a vivid sense of God as manifested in nature, in individual experience, and in the progress of history. Consequently, as they write, they themselves give utterance to their own adoration and thanksgiving, and, in their narrations and discussions, they supply abundant evidence that the habit of worship was wide-spread among devout persons of many classes in the several peoples about whom, or to whom, they write. That the practise of worship was sincere and profound among the Hebrews is perhaps their highest distinction among ancient peoples. This does not mean that they were more religious than others, but that in their religion, under Divine guidance, they had advanced to a knowledge of God so much more vital, ample, and true than that of other peoples that the record of it, as given in their sacred books, has remained to later ages a perpetual source of instruction and stimulus. Worship, then, in the special sense here in view, is the practical side of the theoretic conception often described as 'the Hebrew doctrine of God.' It appears that the Hebrew conception of God was, on the whole, more practical than theoretic; so that the manifestation of this conception by the prophets and psalmists of the O T constantly takes literary forms that are not so much objective speculation or description as subjective worship (see Praise and Prayer). Many of these expressions have acquired a classical value, affecting all Christian thought and especially all Christian devotional and liturgical literature. In this respect the O T stands somewhat in contrast with the N T; for in the latter there appear constantly the more abstract or philosophical qualities of the Greek mind. At least, the purpose of the N T writers and the literary methods they were impelled to use lead in other directions; so that the obvious and direct implications of the N T regarding the sentiments and practise of worship are less than those of the O T, though, at the same time, when scrutinized and interpreted, they prove to be, after all, infinitely richer and deeper. The revelation of God in Christ so far changes the emphasis of thought that Christ, as God Incarnate and in His office as Savior, becomes the One to whom worship is addressed or, at least, by the contemplation of whom worshipful sentiments are especially aroused. This transfer of emphasis unites with the Greek mental habit above mentioned to make the N T suggestions of worship, in the narrowest sense, notably different in quality from those of the O T. As the conception of God takes on new forms, so the tone and substance of worship change correspondingly.

3. Biblical Idea of Worship.

Both the O T and the N T supply many illustrations of the larger sense of worship, in which more elements appear than merely the somewhat distant reverence due to an imperial and transcendent divinity. The reason why the Psalter seems to stand so close to Christian feeling in many ways is that in it, more than elsewhere in the O T, intercourse with God assumes a wide range and a more intimate and free manner. In the N T the visible presence of Christ among the first disciples, followed by the vivid consciousness of His continued fellowship among the members of the early Christian fraternities, in spite of His removal from their bodily sight, wrought inevitably a change in the worshipful attitude in which they regarded not only Him, but the Divinity which He embodied. God was now not a far-off being of a nature so distinct from man that He could be approached only as an Oriental came to some great king. What may be called the despotic or autocratic view of God's relation to men is replaced by a domestic or friendly view. Worship thus becomes more familiar and many-sided. It broadens out so as to include more than distant reverence and merely servile thankfulness. No doubt the O T exhibits those sides of worship termed 'confession,' 'supplication,' 'profession,' and similar ideas, especially in the Psalms; but the N T implications regarding these show a closer fellowship, a stronger faith, a clearer perception of how it is the aim of God's grace to bring man and God into substantial harmony and union. The center of this novel sphere of thought is the personality of the Savior, at once bringing God down to man and raising man up to God. To Him goes out an affection, a loyalty, an aspiration, a confidence, that were not possible at the stage of religion reached in the O T dispensation. The Christian practise of worship, therefore, when developed to its conclusions, rises above the characteristically Hebrew practise. Consequently, Christian devotion, though it adopted and assimilated nearly all the older practise, at once took on a new color and energy. Christian prayers and hymns, for instance, tended from the very first to contain a broader and a more free expression of human personality in close and confident intercourse with the Divine.

4. Public Worship: First Stage.

In the Bible we find data regarding public worship at not less than four stages of development. The first of these, the primitive, is but slightly described, references to it being mostly confined to such books of the O T as Gn and Jg. The line between private and public worship is not sharply drawn, and the methods used are not always clearly differentiated from those of the heathen world generally. But it is fairly evident that, if we could recover all the facts, we could trace in them a gradually unfolding conception of the true God, as the supreme object of worship, and a slow settling of custom and tradition regarding the form and mechanism of communal and national sacrifice, prayer, etc. It is likely that the influence of primitive notions continued long after somewhat highly organized practises were instituted.

5. Second Stage.

The second stage, really the first that was an organized system, is that which ultimately came to its fullest development in the Temple. The acccpted Jewish view of the historic origin of this system was that it was derived from the Divinely appointed Tabernacle set up in the Arabian desert. The modern interpretation of the narratives makes the Tabernacle a more or less fanciful projection into early times of ideas belonging to much later days. In either case, the Tabernacle and the Temple (as regarded in the time just before the Exile, and again after the Exile) present a conception of public worship that may be considered as a single conception. It seems probable that this stage was reached through a long period of experimentation, a time when there were many local sanctuaries or places of sacrifice. We know comparatively little of the details of ritual during this connecting period. But regarding the system as finally made supreme toward the end of the 7th cent. B.C., we have abundant data, and it is this system that acquired for the whole course of later Judaism and, through it, for all subsequent times a peculiar significance and value. With this characteristic system was associated the powerful priestly class, and its headquarters, theoretically unique, was the sanctuary at Jerusalem. Under this system, Church and State were conceived of as but two faces of the one nationality of the Holy People. Concerning its nature as a system, some further remarks are made below.

6. Third Stage.

A third stage, which also developed into a highly organized system, though at a somewhat later period, was that of the Synagogue. This is supposed to have had some sort of a beginning during the Exile, and to have gradually developed afterward, but almost all that we know of it definitely is in the time of Christ, or a little earlier. The Synagogue was then a well-developed institution, substantially the same as it has since continued to be wherever devout Jews have gone throughout the world. The striking contrasts between the Temple and the Synagogue are suggested below.

7. Fourth Stage.

The fourth stage, or system, was that of the early Christian churches, as casually mentioned in certain of the N T books. Were it not for an amount of data from other sources, gradually increasing as the centuries go on, we should be much in the dark as to the early practise of social worship among Christians. It is clear that in many cases, perhaps in most, the pattern followed was that of the Synagogue. But the divergencies ultimately became notable, especially as the progress of Christianity was affected more and more by Greek and Roman influences.

Of the four systems thus briefly distinguished, that of the Temple is by far the one most fully described. Because emphasized in the O T under claims of unique authority, this system has had a profound influence upon Christian thought and practise. Yet at the outset of Christianity it is likely that the system of the Synagogue, as has just been said, had the greater practical influence. Subsequent Christian usage sought to mingle characteristics derived from both, but, with the growth of hierarchical notions and the consolidation of the papal theory of the Church, the tendency was to assimilate Christian public worship to the ideal exemplified in the Temple. As the radical differences between the Temple and the Synagogue systems are not always clearly noted, they may well be briefly stated. The liturgical system of the Temple was not only strongly ecclesiastical, but essentially national. It became the religious system of the Holy People as a whole and in its corporate capacity. The individual came to be merged in this corporate whole. Indispensable at every point were the priests, who not only stood for the people, but were necessary mediators on their behalf. The great feature in public worship was the scheme of sacrifices which, at least after the 7th cent. B.C., could properly be offered only at Jerusalem and in accordance with an authoritative ritual. Thus was thrown into extreme prominence the sacramental aspect of public worship, since the sacrifices were not only symbols of propitiation, but the efficient means by which it was secured. "Apart from shedding of blood there is no remission" (He 9 22) indicates the conviction that stood at the center; so that the accent of the system fell upon worship (man's approach to God) rather than upon instruction (God's approach to man). There was hardly any provision in the ritual for the stated application of teaching or preaching, though, of course, important doctrines regarding the relations between God and man were assumed and implied, as well as symbolically suggested. It is even difficult to maintain that the Temple system, as such, had any adequate place for Scriptures—the authoritative documents whereby revelation is preserved and ministered to the needs of many ages. Thus came the antagonism between the priestly and the prophetic classes, and the actual degeneration of religion, as it grew out of the Temple system, into Pharisaism or mere ritualism.

8. Temple Worship.

The system of the Synagogue was radically different. It was essentially decentralized, since synagogues were encouraged everywhere. It was intensely democratic, instead of autocratic. Its main purpose was ethical and practical — intended to dominate all common life. It exalted the function of the prophet rather than that of the priest; and so it magnified the idea of Scriptures, which were the records of prophetic teaching and interpretation, as well as the action of preachers and interpreters of its own day. It became the home of what there was of popular education, dimly prefiguring many modern institutions, both secular and sacred. Its accent fell upon instruction rather than upon worship, though the latter was not neglected in the rather elaborate scheme of prayers. When it degenerated, it resulted in rabbinism, with its excessive and foolish attention to "the letter."

9. Synagogue Worship.

In Hebrew religious life, as it stood, for example, in the time of Christ, it would seem as if these two systems were instinctively regarded not only as important, but as somehow to be maintained in harmony. From a theoretic point of view, it may be urged that the two ideals of public worship which they represent are in truth complementary. But in the course of all liturgical history, it has proved difficult to keep the balance and the unity between them. In the early development of Christian customs, it is likely that both were preserved; for in the formation of the medieval liturgical system, when comprehensively studied, the derivatives of both appear. But, as time went on, the medieval Church steadily minimized the constituents that came from the Synagogue side. Here was one of the conditions that lay at the root of the Reformation, and thus many of the more zealous of the reformers advocated a liturgical revolution that should not only reassert Synagogue ideas, but banish Temple ideas. In many Protestant bodies to-day the same reactionary spirit appears. Probably to-day, as in Biblical times, there is a call for some fusion of the two systems, or, rather, of the fundamental ideas about public worship which the two represent.

WOUNDS. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 6 (9).

WRATH: The terms "wrath," "to be wroth," render a variety of Heb. and Gr. terms. (1) 'aph, the 'nostrils,' the heavy breathing through the nose and the dilated nostrils being indicative of wrath. Anthropomorphically, the term is often used of God as well as of man (Gn 39 19; Ex 22 24, 32 10 f., etc.). (2) ḥēmāh, 'heat' (Nu 25 11; Dt 29 23, 28; II S 11 20, etc.). (3) ḥārāh, 'to glow' or 'burn' (but in the O T no longer used in that sense), and its derivative ḥārōn, both used exclusively in the sense of strong emotion or anger (Gn 4 5, 31 36; Ex 15 7; I S 18 8, etc.). (4) ka'aṣ, vb., 'discontented,' especially because of grief or other feelings, and ka'aṣ, n. (II Ch 16 10; Job 5 2). (5) 'ebhrāh, from 'ābhar, 'to pass by,' that which causes or manifests the 'passing by' of God, especially in His punitive visitations (Gn 49 7; Dt 3 26; Is 9 19, etc.). (6) qātsaph and qetseph, the simplest term for 'wrath' or 'anger' (Nu 1 53, 16 46; Dt 9 7 f., etc.). (7) rāgaz, 'to be restless,' 'agitated' (Hab 3 2; Is 28 21). (8) zā'aph and za'aph, a 'weighty' emotion (II Ch 26 19; Pr 19 12). (9) θυμός and θυμοῦσθαι, from θύειν, 'to rush along,' 'be in a heat' (Mt 2 16; Lk 4 28; Ac 19 28, etc.). (10) ὀργή (from ὀργᾶν, 'to teem' or 'swell'), the more usual N T term to represent God's wrath against sin or those who persist in sin (Mt 3 7; Jn 3 36; Ro 1 18, etc.).

While in the ancient Semitic religion the anger or wrath of deity was viewed as inexplicable, arbitrary, or capricious, so that it could be appeased by means unrelated to morality or righteousness, in Israel the emphasis was increasingly laid upon the ethical aspect of God's character and, therefore, on the moral character of His wrath as due to His abhorrence of sin, and it is this view that is set forth almost exclusively in the Bible. WREATH, WREATHEN WORK. See TEMPLE, § 16, and PRIESTHOOD, § 9 (b).

WRESTLE: The words 'ābhaq (Gn 32 24 f.) possibly and pāthal (Gn 30 8) certainly mean to 'twist' or entangle, and may have been used of 'wrestling' in a technical sense (which was well known to the ancient Egyptians), although no more than simple struggling seems to be intended in the passages where the words occur. In Eph 6 12, πάλη is the technical term for the scientific wrestling in the games so common in Greek cities. E. E. N.

WRITE, WRITING. See BOOKS AND WRITING.

Y

YARN: The term renders two Heb. words: (1) 'ēṭūn (Pr 7 16, "fine linen" AV). This, however, is of uncertain meaning. (2) m'ūzzāl (Ezk 27 19), which should probably be rendered "from Uzal" (cf. Gn 10 27), a place in S. Arabia. In Ezk 27 19 the AV "going to and fro" is wrong and the RV "yarn" very improbable. The text may be corrupt. On I K 10 28 see RV E. E. N.

YEAR. See TIME, § 4.

YELLOW. See COLORS, § 3.

YOKE: The proper word for "yoke" in Heb. is 'ōl. This was a strong bar, not necessarily shaped to fit the neck as are Western yokes. The yoke was held in its place on the necks of the cattle by pins called "bars" (Lv 26 13; Ezk 34 27, "bands" AV) (see illustration on p. 15) which passed through it while their free ends were often connected by thongs or chains. The yoke was fastened to the pole of the plow or cart by a wooden pin, or a ring, and leather thongs. For lighter work a simple bar, mōṭāh, was used which dispensed with the neck-pins, being held in place by thongs fastened to the animals' horns (see illus. of Agricultural Implements, Fig. 11, op. p. 16). The term tsemedh means the pair of oxen yoked together (I S 11 7, 14 14; I K 19 19, 21; Job 1 3, 42 12; Jer 51 23; cf. in the N T ζεῦγος, Lk 14 19).

Figuratively, the yoke is used as a symbol of oppression or overlordship, exercised by one nation over another, or by a sovereign over his people (Gn 27 40; Lv 26 13; I K 12 4 ff., etc.); also of authority in general (La 3 27; I Ti 6 1); of the "yoke" of sin (La 1 14); of religious forms and ceremonies (Ac 15 10); and, by Jesus, in a good sense of His standard of life and personal authority (Mt 11 29 f.). On "yoke-fellow" see CHURCH LIFE, § 9. E. E. N.

Z

ZAANAIM, zê″a-nê′im. See ZAANANNIM.

ZAANAN, zê′a-nan (צַעֲנָן, צַנָּן, tsenān, tsa'ănān), probably the same as Zenan (Mic 1 11; Jos 15 37): A town in SW Judah. Site unknown. E. E. N.

ZAANANNIM, zê″a-nan′im (צַעֲנַנִּים, tsa'ănannīm; Zaanaim AV): A landmark from which the boundary of the lot of Naphtali was drawn on the W side of the Jordan (Jos 19 33). There was a famous terebinth ("oak" RV) at this place, which is again mentioned as the extreme point reached by the tribe of Heber the Kenite in its nomadic movements (Jg 4 11). The Heb. text is uncertain. The best variant appears to be rendered in RV ("oak in Zaanannim"). A. C. Z.

ZAAVAN, zê′a-van (זַעֲוָן, za'ăwān): A Horite clan (Gn 36 27; I Ch 1 42, Zavan AV). E. E. N.

ZABAD, zê′bad (זָבָד, zābhādh), 'he has bestowed': A form abbreviated from Zabadiah, 'J" has bestowed': 1. A son of Nathan, who was the Egyptian servant of Sheshan, of the family of Jerahmeel, tribe of Judah (I Ch 2 36). He figures also among the heroes of David, as if a son of Ahlai (I Ch 11 41). 2. A descendant of Ephraim, of the family of Shuthelah (I Ch 7 21). 3. A son of Shimeath and leader of the conspiracy against Joash which avenged the murder of Zechariah the son of Jehoiada (II Ch 24 26). 4, 5, 6. One of the "sons of Zattu," one of the "sons of Hashum," and one of the "sons of Nebo," all three of whom married foreign wives and were obliged to put them away (Ezr 10 27, 33, 43). A. C. Z.

ZABBAI, zab′ai (זַבַּי, zabbai): 1. One of the "sons of Bebai" who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 28). 2. The father of Baruch, who repaired a portion of the wall (Neh 3 20). The Q'ri reads, probably correctly, זַכַּי, zakkai (cf. Ezr 2 9 = Neh 7 14). C. S. T.

ZABBUD, zab′ud (זַבּוּד, zabbūdh), 'given': One of the "sons of Bigvai" who returned from exile with Ezra (Ezr 8 14). E. E. N.

ZABDI, zab′dai (זַבְדִּי, zābhdī), abbreviated from Zabdiel or Zebadiah: 1. The head of a clan or family of Judah (Jos 7 1, 17 f.), Zimri in I Ch 2 6. 2. One of the sons of Jeroham, a Benjamite (I Ch 8 19). 3. The overseer of David's vineyards (I Ch 27 27). 4. A son of Asaph, the head of a family of singers (Neh 11 17). E. E. N.

ZABDIEL, zab′di-el (זַבְדִּיאֵל, zabhdī'ēl), 'gift of God': 1. One of David's officers (I Ch 27 2). 2. A Temple overseer (Neh 11 14). E. E. N.

ZABUD, zê'bud (זָבוּד, zābhūdh), 'given': An officer under Solomon (I K 4 5). The text is uncertain; the LXX. omits "priests." His designation as the "king's friend" may indicate that he was his confidential adviser. Such an office seems to have been common in the ancient East. E. E. N.

ZABULON, zab'yu-lon. See TRIBE, TRIBES, §§ 2, 4, on Zebulun.

ZACCAI, zac'a-ai or zac'kê (זַכַּי, zakkay): The ancestral head of a post-exilic family (Ezr 2 9; Neh 7 14). E. E. N.

ZACCHÆUS, zac-kî'us or zak'ę-us (Ζακχαῖος, perhaps another form of Ζαχαρίας; but probably equivalent to the O T zakkai, 'pure,' LXX. Ζακχού, II Es 2 9): A chief tax-collector, who sought to see Jesus on His approach to Jericho (Lk 19 2-10). He was a Jew of benevolent disposition and habits (ver. 8 f.; cf. Lk 15 29; also Blass, *Gram.*², p. 184), whom the Lukan narrative represents as ostracized simply because of his occupation (cf. ver. 7). J. M. T.

ZACCUR, zac'ūr, ZACCHUR (זַכּוּר, zakkūr): 1. A Reubenite, father of Shammua, one of the spies sent by Moses into Canaan (Nu 13 4). 2. A Simeonite, father of Shimei, who had sixteen sons and six daughters (I Ch 4 25 f.). 3. A Levite, of the family of Merari (I Ch 24 27). 4. An Asaphite, set over the service of song by David (I Ch 25 2, 10; Neh 12 35). 5. A 'son' of Imri, and helper in rebuilding the wall under Nehemiah (Neh 3 2). 6. A Levite, who sealed the covenant (Neh 10 13), perhaps the same as 1 (Neh 13 13). 7. A 'son' of Bigvai, who came up from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr 8 14, Kᵉthibh; as RVmg.). C. S. T.

ZACHARIAH, zac''a-rai'ā (זְכַרְיָה, zᵉkharyāh): 'J" remembers': 1. The father of Abi or Abijah, the mother of King Hezekiah (II K 18 2; II Ch 29 1, Zechariah RV). 2. See ZECHARIAH, 2. E. E. N.

ZACHARIAS, zac''a-rai'as (Ζαχαρίας, the Gr. equivalent of Zechariah, q.v.): 1. A priest, the father of John the Baptist. He belonged to the course of Abijah (I Ch 10 24), and served in the Temple only as was demanded by the term allotted to his course. Each course served twice a year for about a week (I Ch 23 6, 28 13; I Es 1 2, 15). Besides what is related in Lk 1 5 ff., nothing more is known of this priest. It may be inferred from the story in Lk that he had little sympathy with the worldly aristocratic Sadducee priesthood in Jerusalem. 2. A priest of the O T period referred to by Jesus (Mt 23 35; Lk 11 51). He was probably the same as the one mentioned in II Ch 24 20 ff., and if so, the reference would indicate that the Books of Chronicles were even then placed last in the list of O T books. See also ZACHARIAH. E. E. N.

ZACHER, zê'kęr. See ZECHER.

ZADOK, zê'dok (צָדוֹק, tsādhōq), 'righteous': 1. One of the two chief priests of the Davidic sanctuary in Jerusalem. The first reference to Z. is in II S 8 17, where we should read as the correct text "and Abiathar the son of Abimelech, the son of Ahitub, and Zadok were priests" (cf. I S 14 3, 22 9 ff., 20). Consequently, in this earliest notice of Z. nothing is said of his lineage. He was associated with Abiathar, probably in the latter half of David's reign. as his younger but equally privileged colleague (II S 15 24 ff., 17 15, 18 19, 27, 19 11, 20 25).

Near the close of David's reign Z. took the side of Solomon against Adonijah, whose cause was favored by Abiathar. The result was that it was Z. who crowned Solomon and was appointed by him chief priest at Jerusalem, Abiathar being banished to his patrimony at Anathoth. Z. thus became the head of the Jerusalem priesthood, which, after the Temple was built, and especially after the fall of the Northern Kingdom, became the most important family of priests in Israel. The centralization of all legitimate worship in Jerusalem through the reform of Josiah (621 B.C.) only added to the importance of the priesthood there. Protests were probably made by representatives of other equally ancient priestly families, but these were, at best, but partially successful. Ezekiel (40 46, 43 19, 44 15, 48 11) pronounced positively in favor of the exclusive rights of the Zadok priests (of whom he was one). The passage in I S 2 27-36 probably reflects some stage of the conflict over the priesthood and attempts to show how it was God's purpose to depose the line of Abiathar. For further details see PRIESTHOOD, §§ 2a, 6, 9a. 2. The father of Jerusha, the mother of Jotham, King of Judah (II K 15 33; II Ch 27 1). 3. A late descendant of 1 (I Ch 6 12). 4. One of the "sons of Baana," who helped on the wall of Jerusalem and signed the covenant (Neh 3 4, 10 21). 5. A priest, of the family of Immer (Neh 3 29 and 13 13?). 6. A priest, perhaps identical with 3 (I Ch 9 11). 7. A scribe (Neh 13 13). E. E. N.

ZAHAM, zê'ham (זָהָם, zāhām): A son of Rehoboam (I Ch 11 19). E. E. N.

ZAIR, zê'ir (צָעִיר, tsā'īr): A city (of Edom?) where Jotham conquered the Edomites (I K 8 21). Site unknown. E. E. N.

ZALAPH, zê'laf (צָלָף, tsālāph): The father of Hanun who repaired the wall under Nehemiah (Neh 3 30). E. E. N.

ZALMON, zal'mon (צַלְמוֹן, tsalmōn), 'dark-colored': I. 1. A hill near Shechem (Jg 9 48), possibly the southern peak of Gerizim. 2. An unknown locality (Ps 68 14; AV Salmon), perhaps the same as 1, but more probably E. of the Jordan. Jebel Ḥaurân would satisfy the context.

II. One of David's chiefs (II S 23 28); in I Ch 11 29 called Ilai (q.v.). L. G. L.

ZALMONAH, zal-mō'na (צַלְמֹנָה, tsalmōnāh): A station of the Israelites between Mt. Hor and Punon (Nu 33 41 f.). It has not been identified. C. S. T.

ZALMUNNA, zal-mun'a (צַלְמֻנָּע, tsalmunnā'): One of the two Midianite princes mentioned in the second version of the story of Gideon's victory over the Midianites (Jg 8 5 ff.). He was captured and slain by Gideon (ver. 21). See GIDEON. E. E. N.

ZAMZUMMIM, zam-zum'im (זַמְזֻמִּים, zamzummīm): A race of giants inhabiting the territory later occupied by the Ammonites, and called also Rephaim (q.v.) (Dt 2 20 = Zuzim [q.v.], Gn 14 5). C. S. T.

ZANOAH, za-nō'ā (זָנוֹחַ, zānōaḥ): 1. A town of Judah, in the Shephelah (Jos 15 34; Neh 3 13, 11 30), said to have been founded by the Calebite Jekuthiel (I Ch 4 18). Map II, D 1. 2. A town in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15 56). Map II, D 3 (but identification uncertain). E. E. N.

ZAPHENATH-PANEAH, zaf"ę-nath-pa-nî'ā (צָפְנַת פַּעְנֵחַ, tsāphᵉnath pa'nēaḥ), Zaphnath-paaneah AV (Gn 41 45): An Egyptian name, given by Pharaoh to Joseph when he appointed him viceregent of Egypt. The more generally accepted meaning is 'the god speaks, and he [the bearer of the name] lives.' C. S. T.

ZAPHON, zê'fęn (צָפוֹן, tsāphōn): A city of Gad, on the E. bank of the Jordan in the valley near Succoth (Jos 13 27). In Jg 12 1 "to Zaphon" should be read for "northward." The Jerusalem Talmud identifies it with the later 'Amathō, probably the Amathus of Josephus, and also of Eusebius and Jerome, which was 21 m. S. of Pella. It is the modern Amateh just N. of the Jabbok at the mouth of the Wâdy-er-Rugeih. C. S. T.

ZAREATHITE, zê'rę-ath-ait. See ZORATHITE.

ZARED, zê'red. See ZERED.

ZAREPHATH, zar'ę-fath (צָרְפַת, tsārᵉphath): A city of Phœnicia near Sidon, where Elijah was entertained by a poor widow, whose son he afterward brought to life (I K 17 9 ff.). It is mentioned (Ob ver. 20) as the future boundary of Israel. It is the Σάρεπτα of the N T (Lk 4 26) and the modern Arab. town Sarafend, near the seacoast on the road from Tyre to Sidon and 8 m. S. of Sidon. Map IV, C 3. The ruins of the older city lie nearer the sea on a promontory, and in the midst of them is the Crusaders' church on the traditional site of the widow's guest-room. C. S. T.

ZARETHAN, zar'ę-than (צָרְתָן, tsārᵉthān): A place probably in the Jordan Valley, W. of the river, near Adam (q.v.) (Jos 3 16 Zaretan AV). If we accept Moore's emendation of I K 7 46 ("at the ford of Adamah" for "in the clay ground"), a road joined it with Succoth (q.v.) E. of the Jordan. Solomon had his brass foundries near Z. (I K 7 46 [Zartanah AV] צְרֵדָתָה, tsᵉrēdhāthāh, II Ch 4 17). Zererah (צְרֵרָה, tsᵉrērāh, Jg 7 22) is supposed to be Zeredah (צְרֵדָה, tsᵉrēdhāh, I K 11 26), and identical with Zarethan. The Z. of I K 4 12 [Zartanah AV] is assumed to be the same place, though it seems to be located too far north. C. S. T.

ZARTHAN, zār'than. See ZARETHAN.

ZATTHU, zat'thu. See ZATTU.

ZATTU, zat'u (זַתּוּא, zattū'): The ancestral head of a prominent post-exilic family (Ezr 2 8, 10 27; Neh 7 13, 10 14 [Zatthu AV]). E. E. N.

ZAVAN, zê'van. See ZAAVAN.

ZAZA, zê'za (זָזָא, zāzā'): The son of Jonathan, a Jerahmeelite (I Ch 2 33). E. E. N.

ZEAL, ZEALOUS: (1) In the O T these terms render Heb. qānā', qin'āh (the root idea of which is 'to become red,' as in the face through strong emotion). The same words are frequently translated 'jealous' or 'envy.' The term is used of both God and man, and is indicative of intense regard for one's honor or rights, or of ardent devotion to a given cause (cf. Nu 25 11 f.; II K 10 16; Is 9 7, etc.). (2) In the N T, ζῆλος, 'zeal' (Jn 2 17; II Co 7 11; Ph 3 16; etc.), ζηλωτής, 'a zealot' (Ac 21 20, 22 3; I Co 14 12, etc.) and the verb ζηλοῦν (Gal 4 17 f.) reflect the O T usage and have the same range of meaning. E. E. N.

ZEALOT. See CANANÆAN.

ZEBADIAH, zeb"a-dai'ā (זְבַדְיָה, zᵉbhadhyāh, זְבַדְיָהוּ, zᵉbhadhyāhū), 'J" has bestowed': 1. One of the sons of Elpaal, a Benjamite (I Ch 8 15). 2. Another, named as son of Elpaal (I Ch 8 17). 3. One of the Benjamites who attached himself to David at Ziklag (I Ch 12 7). 4. The third son of Meshelemiah, one of the doorkeepers of the Temple (I Ch 26 2). 5. One of David's captains "of the host" (I Ch 27 7). 6. One of the Levites who accompanied the princes sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the people (II Ch 17 8). 7. The son of Ishmael, appointed by Jehoshaphat to be "the ruler of the king's matters" (II Ch 19 11). 8. One of those who returned with Ezra from the Exile (Ezr 8 8). 9. One of "the sons of the priests" who married foreign wives (Ezr 10 20). E. E. N.

ZEBAH, zî'bā (זֶבַח, zebhaḥ): A king of Midian, who with Zalmunna was pursued by Gideon as far as Karkor, E. of the Jordan. Gideon defeated their hosts and afterward captured the two kings. After he had taken vengeance on Succoth and Penuel, because they had refused to give him bread, he slew the kings, as his son feared to draw his sword against them (Jg 8 5 ff.; cf. Ps 83 12). C. S. T.

ZEBAIM, zę-bê'im. See POCHERETH-HAZZEBAIM.

ZEBEDEE, zeb'ę-dî (Ζεβεδαῖος), abbreviated from "Zebedaiah" (זְבַדְיָה, 'J" gives' or an Aramaic name; cf. the Palmyrene זבדא, also "Zabdi," I Ch 27 27): A fisherman, the father of two Apostles, James and John (Mt 4 21; Mk 1 20), husband of Salome (Mk 15 40; Mt 27 56). Nothing more is known of him. J. M. T.

ZEBIDAH, zeb'i-dā (זְבִידָה, zᵉbhīdhāh. Zebudah AV), 'endowed': The mother of King Jehoiakim (II K 23 36). E. E. N.

ZEBINA, zę-bai'na (זְבִינָא, zᵉbhīnā'): One of those who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 43). E. E. N.

ZEBOIIM, zę-boi'im, ZEBOIM, zę-bō'im or zi'-bo-im (צְבֹיִים, tsᵉbhōyim, צְבֹיִם, tsᵉbhōyīm, צְבָאִים, tsᵉbhō'yim): One of the ancient cities of the plain that joined in the revolt against Chedorlaomer (Gn 10 19; 14 2, 8) and was overthrown with Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn 19 25; Dt 29 23; Hos 11 8). Site unknown. E. E. N.

ZEBOIM (צְבֹעִים, tsᵉbhō'īm), 'hyenas': 1. A valley mentioned in I S 13 18, probably the same as the Valley of Achor (Map III, G 5), or one of its lower tributaries, as the name survives in the neighborhood to-day. 2. A town of Benjamin, probably in the same region as 1 (Neh 11 34). E. E. N.

ZEBUDAH, zę-biū'dā. See ZEBIDAH.

ZEBUL, zî'bŭl (זְבֻל, zᵉbhul): The ruler of Shechem under Abimelech. He was loyal to his master when Gaal and others plotted revolt, and succeeded in holding the city until Abimelech came and conquered Gaal (Jg 9 28-45). E. E. N.

ZEBULUN, zeb'yu-lən, ZEBULUNITE, zeb'yu-lən-ait. See TRIBE, TRIBES, §§ 2, 4.

ZECHARIAH, zec''a-rai'ā (זְכַרְיָה, zᵉkharyāh), 'J" remembers': 1. The son of Berechiah, son of Iddo, the prophet (Zec 1 1; Neh 12 16). See ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF. 2. The son of Jeroboam II, King of Israel (745–744 B.C., Zachariah AV; II K 14 29, 15 8, 11), and the last of the dynasty of Jehu. His reign lasted but six months, ending with his assassination by Shallum. 3. A Reubenite chief (I Ch 5 7). 4. A son of Meshelemiah, a Levite (I Ch 9 21, 26 2, 14). 5. A son of Jehiel, a Benjamite, also called Zacher (I Ch 9 37, Zecher RV). 6. A Levite Temple musician (I Ch 15 18, 20, 16 5). 7. A priest of the time of David (I Ch 15 24). 8. A son of Isshiah, a Kohathite priest, probably the same as 7 (I Ch 24 25). 9. A son of Hosah, a Merarite Levite (I Ch 26 11). 10. The father of Iddo, a Manassite (I Ch 27 21). 11. One of the deputies of Jehoshaphat in his work of reform (II Ch 17 7). 12. A son of Benaiah, an Asaphite Levite (II Ch 20 14), who encouraged Jehoshaphat in the war with Moab. 13. A son of Jehoshaphat (II Ch 21 2). 14. A priest, the son of Jehoiada, whose efforts at reformation were requited with violent death in the Temple by order of the king, Joash (II Ch 24 20-22). The peculiar sacrilegious nature of this crime caused it long to remain a type of the worst form of impiety, and as such is probably referred to in Mt 23 35; Lk 11 51 (cf. ZACHARIAS). 15. A prophetic adviser of King Uzziah, who had "understandings" in the visions of God ("instruction in the seeing" RVmg.); possibly the "fear" of God is the right reading (II Ch 26 5). 16. An Asaphite Levite (II Ch 29 13). 17. A Kohathite Levite, an overseer of the repairs in the Temple in the days of Josiah (II Ch 34 12). 18. A ruler of the house of God in the days of Josiah (II Ch 35 8). 19. One of the "sons of Parosh," who returned with Ezra (Ezr 8 3). 20. One of the "sons of Bebai," who returned with Ezra (Ezr 8 11). 21. One of the "sons of Elam" (Ezr 10 26). 22. One of those who stood by Ezra when he read the Law (Neh 8 4). 23. A son of Amariah, a Judahite (Neh 11 4). 24. Another Judahite, the son of Shiloni (Neh 11 5). 25. A son of Pashhur, a priest (Neh 11 12). 26. A son of Jonathan, an Asaphite priest (Neh 12 35, 41). 27. A son of Jeberechiah, a contemporary of Isaiah (Is 8 2), identified by some as the author of Zec (chs. 12–14). (Cf. ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF, § 4.) A. C. Z.

ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF: The eleventh of the twelve books of the so-called Minor Prophets. It opens with the self-designation of the

1. Contents. author as the son of Berechiah (1 1; cf. Neh 12 16) and, as is the case with Haggai (q.v.), identifies the time of the prophet with the second year of Darius, 520 B.C. It consists of two sections, different both in style and subject-matter. Of these, the first (chs. 1–8) contains messages dated with precision ("in the eighth month of the year," 1 1-6; "on the twenty-fourth day of the fourth month," 1 7–6 15; and "the fourth day of the ninth month of the fourth year of Darius," 7 1). The first message urges the returned exiles to give their allegiance to J"; the second, which is the longest of the three, consists of eight symbolic representations: (1) the chariots (1 7-17); (2) the four horns (1 18-21); (3) the measuring-line (2 1-13); (4) the vindication and purification of Jeshua the priest (3 1-10); (5) the golden candlestick (4 1-14); (6) the flying roll (5 1-4); (7) the woman in the ephah measure (5 5-11); (8) the chariots and horses (6 1-8). The third message (chs. 7, 8) is an inquiry as to the observance of the fast-days and a reassuring message of the favor of God.

The outlook of this division of the book is Messianic, and is designed to show that all obstacles in the way of the realizing of Israel's

2. General Characteristics. hopes are to be removed. The style of the prophecy is markedly different from that of the pre-exilic prophets. The apocalyptic form of revelation takes a conspicuous place in it, and angelic mediation becomes necessary for the interpretation of the symbolism. The interest of religion is further concentrated largely in the Temple service; but a strongly ethical tone pervades it throughout, and the principle of righteousness is always kept in view.

The question raised with reference to the second part of the book (chs. 9–14) is whether this is the work of Zechariah, son of Iddo. Upon

3. Integrity of Zechariah. the ground of the style of the two parts and the historical presuppositions implied in each, the answer to this question is quite clearly in the negative. But the unity of chs. 9–14 is again called into question. Ch. 9 begins with a title: "The burden of the word of Jehovah upon the land of Hadrach"; ch. 12 also begins with a title: "The burden of the word of Jehovah concerning Israel." This would indicate a difference of address and subject-matter only, but there are also differences in style and type of thought between the sections thus introduced, and these seem to necessitate the ascription of the two sections to different authors.

Assuming that the two parts of chs. 9–14 issue from the same general age, the whole section has been assigned to different pre-exilic dates by

4. Date of chs. 9-14. some even to the days of Isaiah, the son of Amoz. Those who assign this early date to it ascribe the work to Zechariah, the son of Jeberechiah (cf. Is 8 2). Others find a very late date for the work (or works), perhaps the 3d cent. B.C. (Marti dates it as late as 160 B.C.). The chief ground for the post-exilic dating is the mention of the Greeks (9 13). This could not have been done before the days of Alexander the Great (Driver, Stade); but, on the other side, the mention of Ephraim in combination with Judah (9 13, 10 7), of Egypt and of Assyria in the same terms as in Hosea and Isaiah (10 10, 11, 9 11) have led many (Baudissin, Strack) to favor the pre-exilic dating. If this view be accepted, the reference to Greece in 9 13 is a corruption of the text.

ZECHER, zek'ẹr (זֶכֶר, zekher, Zacher AV): The ancestor of a Gibeonite family (I Ch 8 31, called Zechariah in I Ch 9 37). E. E. N.

ZEDAD, zî'dad (צְדָד, tsedhādh): A place on the ideal N. border of Canaan (Nu 34 8; Ezk 47 15). Site unknown. E. E. N.

ZEDEKIAH, zed''ẹ-kai'ā (צִדְקִיָּהוּ, tsidhqiyyāhū), 'J" is righteous': 1. King of Judah from 597 to 586 B.C. He was the youngest son of Josiah, and was raised to the throne by Nebuchadrezzar, who deposed Jehoiachin. The king of Babylon further changed his name from Mathaniah to that by which he is commonly known (II K 24 17), though for what reason does not appear. Zedekiah was twenty-one years of age on his accession and very much lacking in courage and energy. Soon after his accession, messengers came from Moab, Ammon, and Tyre urging him to join a coalition against Babylon (Jer 27 3). The king's irresolute attitude made this the occasion of a controversy between the prophetic party, of which Jeremiah was the leading exponent, and the anti-Babylonian faction, consisting mainly of nobles or princes. The latter had also its prophet in Hananiah, who predicted that in two full years the yoke of Nebuchadrezzar should be broken (Jer 28 3). Despite the earnest words of Jeremiah, supported by Ezekiel, who was already in Babylonia, the anti-Babylonian side steadily gained ground, and in 588 Zedekiah was persuaded to undertake an open revolt. He was promptly joined by Ammon and Tyre, and an appeal was made to Egypt for horses and an auxiliary army (Ezk 17 15). The king of Babylon lost no time in meeting the rebels. He inaugurated a campaign, and laid siege to Jerusalem in 587. Meanwhile, Pharaoh-hophra was reported to be advancing with an Egyptian army. Upon hearing this, Nebuchadrezzar raised the siege—a step which was taken as the sign of assured success for the rebellion of Judah. Jeremiah was seized and, on the charge of treason, cast into a vile dungeon, with the consent of the king (Jer 38 6). Thence Zedekiah summoned him into his presence, asking for a prophetic utterance as to the will of J". The prophet fearlessly declared to him that the only condition upon which a personal and national catastrophe could be averted was to submit to Babylon. But the king was too weak to adopt and carry out the advice of the prophet in the face of the opposition of his nobles. The policy of resistance was adhered to, Nebuchadrezzar returned to the siege with greater vigor, and the city fell into his hands in 586. Zedekiah attempted to flee to the wilderness of Judæa toward the Jordan. He left the city under cover of the night through the southern gate, with a few followers. He was, however, overtaken and captured, and carried to Babylon. As a captive, he was subjected to the cruelty of having his sons put to death in his presence and then having his own eyes blinded. He passed the remainder of his days a prisoner in Babylon (II K 25 3-7). 2. A son of Chenaanah, one of the 400 prophets of Ahab (I K 22 11 f.) who encouraged the king to undertake the campaign against Syria. He was rebuked by the prophet Michaiah, son of Imlah, for false prophesying, but prevailed with the king. 3. A son of Maaseiah, a prophet in the days of Jehoiachin, whom Jeremiah denounced for false prophecy and immorality, predicting his summary punishment at the hands of Nebuchadrezzar (Jer 29 21-23). 4. A son of Hananiah, one of the princes in the days of Jehoiakim (Jer 36 12). 5. A son of Coniah (I Ch 3 16), probably the same as 1, but called the son of Jehoiakim as his successor. 6. One of those who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10 1, Zidkijah AV). A. C. Z.

ZEEB, zî'eb or zîb (זְאֵב, zə'ēbh), 'wolf': A 'prince' of Midian. According to the first version of the story, Z. was one of the leaders of the Midianite invasion of Israel in the days of Gideon, and was slain by the Ephraimites at the wine-press of Zeeb (Jg 7 24 f.). Site unknown. E. E. N.

ZELAH, zî'lā, ZELA, zî'la (צֵלַע, tsēla'): A town of Benjamin, where the family sepulcher of Kish, father of Saul, was located (Jos 18 28; II S 21 14). Site unknown. E. E. N.

ZELEK, zî'lek (צֶלֶק, tseleq): An Ammonite officer in David's army (II S 23 37; I Ch 11 39). E. E. N.

ZELOPHEHAD, zẹ-lō'fẹ-had (צְלָפְחָד, tsᵉlōphᵉhādh): A Manassite who died leaving only daughters, which was the occasion of legislation regarding heiresses (Nu 26 33, 27 1 ff., 36 2 ff.; Jos 17 3; I Ch 7 15). E. E. N.

ZELOTES, zẹ-lō'tîz. See CANANÆAN.

ZELZAH, zel'zā (צֶלְצַח, tseltsaḥ): A town, according to I S 10 2, on the border of Benjamin and Ephraim, near Rachel's tomb. C. S. T.

ZEMARAIM, zem''a-rê'im (צְמָרַיִם, tsᵉmārayim): 1. A city of Benjamin (Jos 18 22). Map III. G 5. 2. A mountain in Ephraim (II Ch 13 4). Site unknown. E. E. N.

ZEMARITE, zem'a-rait. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

ZEMIRAH, zẹ-mai'rā (זְמִירָה, zᵉmīrāh. Zemira AV): The ancestral head of a family of Benjamites (I Ch 7 8). E. E. N.

ZENAN, zî'nan. See ZAANAN.

ZENAS, zî'nas (Ζηνᾶς): A Christian lawyer in Crete whom, with Apollos, Paul requests Titus to send on to him, being careful to see that they lacked nothing for their journey. It is uncertain whether he was a Jewish lawyer or a Roman advocate (Tit 3 12 f.). E. E. N.

ZEPHANIAH, zef"a-nai'ā (צְפַנְיָהוּ, tsᵉphanyāhū), 'J" hides,' or 'J" is hidden': 1. A son of Cushi, a prophet in the days of Josiah (cf. ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF). 2. A son of Maaseiah, the second priest under Zedekiah (II K 25 18; Jer 52 24). He occupied the office of arbiter of true and of false prophets (Jer 29 26), and was commissioned by the king with other important tasks (21 1, 37 3). After the capture of Jerusalem, he was taken to Riblah (Jer 52 24 f.). 3. A son of Tahath, a Kohathite (I Ch 6 36). 4. The father of Josiah, a contemporary of Zerubbabel (Zec 6 10, 14). A. C. Z.

ZEPHANIAH, APOCALYPSE OF: An apocryphal writing mentioned and quoted by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. V, 11 27), also named in the old lists of O T Apocrypha (e.g., that of Nicephorus). Fragments of a Coptic translation of the work have been recovered and published, from which it appears that it was allied to the Apocalypse of Elias, and contained descriptions of heaven and of hell, and predictions of the Messiah (cf. Steindorff in Texte u. Untersuch. Neue Folge, II, 3a). A. C. Z.

ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF: The ninth book in the collection of the Minor Prophets. The author names himself the son of Cushi, and traces his

1. Author. genealogy back to Hezekiah in the fourth remove. Why he should trace it as far and no farther, unless Hezekiah were a well-known person, is not explainable. But about the time to which the fourth generation would reach, the only noted Hezekiah was the well-known king of Judah. It has been quite convincingly argued, therefore, that Zephaniah was not only a prophet by vocation, but a prince of the royal blood. He could thus all the more impressively denounce the sins of the princes (1 8).

The book begins with an impressive announcement of the speedy coming of the Day of Jehovah, which will, at the same time, be the signal for

2. Contents. the destruction of idolatry (1 2-6), a period of judgment for the leaders of Judah (1 7-13), and an awe-inspiring time for all (1 14-18). It may be averted by an earnest effort to know J", and to do His will (2 1-3); but it will certainly come upon the Philistine country (2 4-7); it will sweep over Moab and Ammon (2 8-11), and turn northward to Assyria (resulting in the complete destruction of its capital, Nineveh, 2 12-14). Returning to Jerusalem, the prophet denounces the sins of the city and its leaders (3 1-8), and proclaims a judgment which will bring desolation upon evil-doers, but will leave the humble and God-fearing (the Remnant, q.v.) unscathed (3 9-13). The book ends with a comforting vision of the latter days, when the scattered children of Judah shall be restored to their home-land, and enjoy the favor of their God (3 14-20).

There is no reason to doubt the genuineness of the book. Its date is fixed by the author himself as "the days of Josiah, the son of Ammon"

3. Critical Questions. or 639–610 B.C. (1 1). But the severe words spoken with reference to the character of the leaders make it probable that the prophecy was given before the reformation inaugurated by King Josiah (621). It is a mere conjecture that the special occasion of the prophet's coming forward in the name of J" was furnished by the approach of the Scythians (628). The unity of the book is also generally unimpeached, with the exception of 3 14-20, which, on account of its form, is by many regarded as a production of the latter part of the Exile.

ZEPHATH, zî'fath (צְפַת, tsᵉphath): A town to the extreme S. of Judah, conquered by Judah and Simeon and called Hormah (q.v.) (Jg 1 17). The site is uncertain. E. E. N.

ZEPHATHAH, zef'a-thā (צְפָתָה, tsᵉphāthāh): A "valley" near Mareshah, according to the common text of II Ch 14 10. But the more probable reading (according to the LXX.) is "to the north of." E. E. N.

ZEPHI, zî'fai, ZEPHO, zî'fo (צֵפִי, tsᵉphō, צֵפִי, tsᵉphī): A clan-chieftain (and a clan) of Edom (Gn 36 11, 15; I Ch 1 30). E. E. N.

ZEPHON, zî'fẹn (צְפוֹן, tsᵉphōn, and ZIPHION, zif'i-ẹn, צִפְיוֹן, tsiphyōn): The ancestral head of the Zephonites, a clan of Gad (Nu 26 15, called Ziphion in Gn 46 16). E. E. N.

ZER, zẹr (צֹר, tsōr): A city of Naphtali. Site unknown (Jos 19 35). E. E. N.

ZERAH, zî'rā (זֶרַח, zeraḥ): 1. A descendant of Esau and one of the "dukes" of Edom (Gn 36 13, 17; I Ch 1 17). 2. The father of Jobal, King of Edom (Gn 36 33; I Ch 1 44), perhaps identical with 1. 3. A descendant of Judah and ancestor of the Zerahites, Zarhites AV (Gn 38 30; Nu 26 20; Jos 7 1, etc.). 4. The ancestral head of a family or clan of Simeon, the Zerahites, Zarhites AV (Nu 26 13; I Ch 4 24). 5, 6. The name of two Levites (I Ch 6 21, 41). 7. Z. the "Ethiopian" (Heb. kūshī, i.e., 'Cushite'), who invaded Judah in the days of Asa with an immense army, but was defeated (II Ch 14 9 ff.). The late record in Ch is the only authority for this event, and many scholars doubt its historicity. Some Egyptologists have identified Z. with Osorkon I or II of Egypt (22d dynasty); others think the Heb. kūshī refers to an Arabian chieftain. E. E. N.

ZERAHIAH, zer"a-hai'ā (זְרַחְיָה, zᵉraḥyāh), 'J" hath dawned': 1. A descendant of Aaron and, therefore, in the main line of the high-priestly succession (I Ch 6 6, 51). 2. One of the "sons of Pahath-moab," who returned from exile with Ezra (Ezr 8 4). E. E. N.

ZERED, zî'red (זֶרֶד, zeredh): A torrent-brook of Moab, probably one of the upper tributaries of the Wâdy Kerak that flows past Kerak. Map I, F 11. (Nu 21 12, Zared AV; Dt 2 13 f.) E. E. N.

ZEREDAH, zer'ẹ-da, ZEREDA, zer'ẹ-dā (צְרֵדָה, tsᵉrēdhāh): The birthplace of Jeroboam, and the place where the metal-work for the Temple was cast (I K 11 26; II Ch 4 17, Zeredathah AV). See also ZARETHAN. It lay somewhere in the Jordan Valley. E. E. N.

ZEREDATHAH, zer''ę-dath'ā or zę-red'a-thū. See ZEREDAH.

ZERESH, zî'resh (זֶרֶשׁ, zeresh): The wife of Haman (Est 5 10, etc.). See ESTHER, § 6. E. E. N.

ZERETH, zî'reth (צֶרֶת, tsereth): The ancestor of a Tekoahite family (I Ch 4 7). E. E. N.

ZERETH-SHAHAR, -shê'har (צֶרֶת־הַשַּׁחַר, tsereth-hah-shaḥar, Zareth-sharar AV): A city of Reuben (Jos 13 19). Map II, H 2. E. E. N.

ZERI, zî'rai. See IZRI.

ZEROR, zî'rōr (צְרוֹר, tsᵉrōr): An ancestor of Saul (I S 9 1, Zur in I Ch 8 30, 9 36). E. E. N.

ZERUAH, zę-rū'ā (צְרוּעָה, tsᵉrū'āh): The widowed mother of Jeroboam I (I K 11 26). E. E. N.

ZERUBBABEL, zę-rub'a-bel (זְרֻבָּבֶל, ᶻerubbābhel, Zorobabel in Mt 1 12 AV), 'offspring of Babel,' in allusion to his foreign birth: One of the leaders of the Exile who returned to Palestine. Under him the altar was set upon its base in the second year of Darius (circa 520 B.C.), and the building of the Temple itself progressed through several years (Ezr 5 2, 6 15).

1. Connection with Sheshbazzar.

In Ezr 1 9, 11, 5 14, 16, it is stated that Sheshbazzar was entrusted with the task of bringing back the sacred vessels to Jerusalem. This must have preceded by quite an interval the arrival of Zerubbabel and his company (Ezr 2 2), and though both may have been of Davidic lineage and, therefore, logically governors of Judah, they are not to be identified, there being no reason why two names for the same individual should be used in nearly the same context (see SHESHBAZZAR).

2. Lineage of Zerubbabel.

In Hag, Ezr, Neh, Z. is called the son of Shealtiel, who, according to Mt 1 2, was the son of Jeconiah, but whom Lk 3 27 styles the son of Neri, a descendant of Nathan, Solomon's brother. I Ch 3 19 makes him the son of Pedaiah, the son of Jeconiah. Kittel, with the aid of the LXX., would emend this passage so as to read "Shealtiel" instead of "Pedaiah"; but this is hardly satisfactory. Probably, there were independent genealogical traditions, all which, however, agreed in making Z. of royal descent—two records calling him the grandson of Jeconiah, while a third traces his descent through a collateral royal branch.

3. The References in Zechariah.

Z. is mentioned by name in Zec 4 6 f., 9 f., and is given Divine encouragement and recognized as the rebuilder of the ruined city. Enigmatical, however, are the allusions to the "Branch" (3 8, 6 12). Logically, they should refer to Z., but the high priest Joshua is mentioned in the immediate context, and the strange utterance occurs, "he shall be a priest upon his throne." Probably, the original reference was to the Messianic expectations which clustered around Z., the reinstated Davidic prince (cf. Hag 2 23), but later the overshadowing influence of the priest resulted in an editorial reworking of the material, which left the Messianic element, but pointed it in a different direction. See also SERVANT OF JEHOVAH.

ZERUIAH, zer''yu-ai'ā (צְרוּיָה, tsᵉrūyāh): The mother of Joab, Abishai, and Asahel (I S 26 6; II S 2 13, 18, etc.; I K 1 7, etc.; I Ch 2 16, etc.), and according to II S 17 25, the daughter of Nahash, which is probably to be corrected to "Jesse," as in I Ch 2 16. She was, therefore, David's sister. C. S. T.

ZETHAN, zî'than (זֵיתָן, zēthān): A son of Jediael, a Benjamite (I Ch 7 10). E. E. N.

ZETHAR, zî'thār. See CHAMBERLAINS, THE SEVEN.

ZIA, zai'a (זִיעַ, zīa'): A family of Gadites (I Ch 5 13). E. E. N.

ZIBA, zai'ba (צִיבָא, tsībhā'): A servant of the house of Saul (II S 9 2, 16 4). Upon the death of Saul, he must naturally have given his allegiance to Mephibosheth, but the confusion into which his master's household fell led him to act for a time independently. David attached Ziba to Mephibosheth. But, during the rebellion of Absalom, he again became independent, and was even given Mephibosheth's estate, on the ground that his master had forfeited it by his treachery (II S 16 1-4). When David came back to Jerusalem, he divided the estate between Ziba and Mephibosheth (II S 19 24 ff.). A. C. Z.

ZIBEON, zib'ę-ǫn (צִבְעוֹן, tsibh'ōn), 'hyena': Apparently the name of an ancient Horite clan in Edom, later connected with the genealogy of Esau (Gn 36 2 [read "Horite," not "Hivite"; cf. ver. 20], 14, 20, etc.). E. E. N.

ZIBIA, zib'i-a (צִבְיָא, tsibhyā'). The head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 8 9). E. E. N.

ZIBIAH, zib'i-ā (צִבְיָה, tsibhyāh), 'gazelle': The mother of Joash, King of Judah (I K 12 1; II Ch 24 1). E. E. N.

ZICHRI, zic'rai (זִכְרִי, zikhrī, abbreviated from "Zechariah"): 1. The son of Izhar, a Levite (Ex 6 21). 2. A Benjamite (I Ch 8 19). 3. Another Benjamite (I Ch 8 23). 4. The son of Jeroboam, a Benjamite (I Ch 8 27). 5. A son of Asaph, a Levite (I Ch 9 15). 6. A descendant of Eliezer, a Levite (I Ch 26 25). 7. The father of Eliezer, a Reubenite (I Ch 27 16). 8. The father of Amasiah, a Judahite (II Ch 17 16). 9. The father of Elishaphat, who was one of the conspirators with Jehoiada against Athaliah (II Ch 23 1). 10. A "mighty man of Ephraim" (II Ch 28 7). 11. A Benjamite, the father of Joel who was the overseer of a band left in Jerusalem by Nehemiah (Neh 11 9). 12. The head of a priestly family in the days of Jehoiakim (Neh 12 17). E. E. N.

ZIDDIM, zid'im (הַצִּדִּים, ha-tsiddīm), 'the sides': A city of Naphtali; perhaps the same as Ḥattim, a little NW of Tiberias (Jos 19 35). E. E. N.

ZIDKIJAH, zid-kai'jā. See ZEDEKIAH.

ZIDON or SIDON, zai'dŏn or sai'dŏn (צִידוֹן, tsīdhōn): Z. was the most influential ancient city of Phœnicia, for its importance through long centuries gave the name Zidonians (Sidonians) to the Phœnicians. It was located on the Phœnician coast about 20 m. N. of Tyre and the same distance S. of Beirût, on a small promontory jutting out into the sea, which gave protection for shipping on both sides of it. The earliest reference to it of value is that found in the Tell-el-Amarna letters of 1400–1300 B.C. Its governor, Zimrida, herein notifies the Egyptian king that the Amorite ruler, Aziri, is threatening Egypt's sovereignty over the Phœnician city. It was doubtless some time thereafter before Tyre outstripped Zidon in national importance. In the partition of Canaan among the tribes, Z. stood at the limits of Zebulun (Gn 49 13), and of Asher (Jos 19 28; here and in ‖s it is called great Zidon). The reference in Jg (1 31) leads us to infer that it was assigned to Asher. On the other hand, the Israelites probably fell into the meshes of Baal-worship (Jg 10 6) and consequently, under the authority and oppression of the Zidonians (Jg 10 12). In the times of David and Solomon, Tyre occupied the place of preeminence politically and commercially, at least while the influence of the Zidonian religion—i.e., of Baal and Ashtoreth—permeated all too generally the life of the Israelites (cf. I K 11 5, 33). The marriage of Ahab and Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, King of the Zidonians, was a disastrous event for Israel (cf. I K 16 31-33, 18 18 f., 25-28, 40), for through it the paralyzing worship of Baal and Ashtoreth was officially introduced. Zidon was subordinate to Tyre for some centuries, but the appearance on this coast of the great Assyrian rulers of the 9th cent. encouraged and supported her independence, in order thereby to weaken Tyre, safe and secure on its island fortress. In 701 B.C. Sennacherib received Zidon's submission and set on its throne Tuba'al, but was obliged to leave Tyre unconquered. Its later rebellion against Assyrian authority led Esarhaddon, King of Assyria (681–668 B.C.), to destroy it about 678 B.C. It was, however, rebuilt, and throughout the period of the new Babylonian Empire occupied a prominent place among Phœnician cities. It fell under the condemnation of the prophet Joel for having participated in the sale of Hebrew captives as slaves (Jl 3 4-6). For the rebuilding of the Second Temple, the Zidonians sold the returned exiles cedar wood (Ezr 3 7). Z. was burned to the ground in 351 B.C. by Artaxerxes Ochus of Persia because of its rebellious spirit. Following the battle of Issus (333 B.C.) it, with other Phœnician cities, welcomed Alexander the Great as its lord. It became a subject of Rome in 64 B.C., but with its neighboring city, Tyre, enjoyed the rights of a free city. Z. and its people figure both in the activity of Christ (Mk 3 8; Lk 6 17; Mt 11 21, 22; Mk 7 24-30, etc.) and of the Apostles (Ac 12 20, 27 3). Since the days of the early Church Z. has seen some troublous times, for in the 12th and 13th cents. it was a battleground between the crusaders and the Saracens. The modern town has about 10,000 inhabitants and lies on the shore of the north harbor. I. M. P.

ZIDONIAN, zai-dō'ni-an or zi- See ZIDON.

ZIF, zif: The ancient, or earlier, name of the second month of the old Hebrew year. See TIME, § 3. A. C. Z.

ZIHA, zai'ha (צִיחָא, tsīḥā'): 1. The ancestral head of one of the divisions of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 43; Neh 7 46). 2. An individual, overseer of the division of the Nethinim of the same name (Neh 11 21). E. E. N.

ZIKLAG, zik'lag (צִקְלַג tsiqlagh [צִיקְלַג, I Ch 12 1, 20]): A city of Simeon (Jos 19 5; I Ch 4 30), later probably in the S. of Judah (Jos 15 31). At one time a Philistine city, it was given to David (I S 27 6), and was his residence until the death of Saul (I S 30 1, 14, 26; II S 1 1, 4 10; I Ch 12 1, 20). It is mentioned as a post-exilic town of Judah (Neh 11 28). It is usually identified with Zuheilikah, 11 m. ESE. of Gaza. C. S. T.

ZILLAH, zil'ā (צִלָּה, tsillāh), 'shadow': One of Lamech's wives (Gn 4 19 ff.). See LAMECH. E. E. N.

ZILLETHAI, zil'ĕ-thai (צִלְּתַי, tsill'thay, Zilthai AV): 1. A son of El-paal, a Benjamite (I Ch 8 20). 2. A Manassite chief (I Ch 12 20). E. E. N.

ZILPAH, zil'pā (זִלְפָּה, zilpāh): A maid of Leah, given as a concubine to Jacob, and the mother of Gad and Asher (Gn 29 24, 30 9 ff., etc.). There are many reasons why these marriages and births should be taken as referring to the union of tribes, or clans, rather than individuals. But there is as yet no generally accepted theory. See TRIBE, TRIBES, § 4. E. E. N.

ZILTHAI, zil'thai or -thê. See ZILLETHAI.

ZIMMAH, zim'ā (זִמָּה, zimmāh): The ancestral head of a family of Gershonite Levites (I Ch 6 20, 42; II Ch 29 12). E. E. N.

ZIMRAN, zim'ran (זִמְרָן, zimrān): The ancestral head of an Arabian clan (Gn 25 2; I Ch 1 32). E. E. N.

ZIMRI, zim'rai (זִמְרִי, zimrī), 'mountain-sheep': I. 1. King of Israel, about 890 B.C. (I K 16 9-20), after Elah, under whom he had been general. He found his master in a drunken condition, murdered him, and assumed the reins of government. His rule, however, lasted only seven days, and his crime was execrated in later days as one of peculiar atrocity (II K 9 31). He was attacked by Omri and died in the ruins of his own palace, which he had set on fire. 2. A son of Salu of the tribe of Simeon (Nu 25 14). 3. A son of Zerah and ancestor of Achan (I Ch 2 6). 4. A descendant of Saul (I Ch 8 36, 9 42).

II. A locality whose kings are named (Jer 25 25) with those of Babylon and Elam. The name is, however, changed by some to "Nimri." A. C. Z.

ZIN, zin (צִן, tsin): Possibly a place (Nu 34 4; Jos 15 3) that gave its name to the surrounding district, the wilderness of Zin, which was a region of somewhat uncertain location and extent. It formed part of the southern boundary of Judah (Nu 34 3; Jos 15 1) and contained Kadesh (Nu 20 1), which, however, was so near its border as sometimes to be regarded as in the neighboring wilderness of Paran (Nu 13 26). The wilderness of Zin thus seems to have lain south of a line drawn from Kadesh to the Arabah. See also PARAN. L. G. L.

ZINA, zai'na (זִינָא, zīnā'): A Gershonite Levite (I Ch 23 10, called Zizah in ver. 11). E. E. N.

ZION, zai'ən. See JERUSALEM, § 16.

ZIOR, zai'ōr (צִיעֹר, tsī'ōr): A city of Judah (Jos 15 54). Map II, E 2. E. E. N.

ZIPH, zif, ZIPHITE, zif'ait (זִיף, zīph, זִיפִי, zīphī): I. 1. A son of Jehallelel of Judah (I Ch 4 16). 2. A Calebite family name (I Ch 2 42), connected with II, 1, below. II. 1. A city in the fertile plateau SE. of Hebron, the modern Tell Zif (Jos 15 55). Map II, E 3. David took refuge there when fleeing from Saul (I S 23 14, 15, 24, 26 2), and the Ziphites, inhabitants of the city, sent word to Saul about David's place of concealment (I S 23 19, 26 1; cf. Ps 54, title [1]). 2. A city of S. Judah (Jos 15 24), not yet identified, possibly connected with I, 1, above. C. S. T.

ZIPHAH, zai'fā (זִיפָה, zīphāh): A son of Jehaleel, a Judahite (I Ch 4 16). E. E. N.

ZIPHIMS, zif'imz. See ZIPH.

ZIPHION, zif'i-ən. See ZEPHON.

ZIPHRON, zif'rən (זִפְרוֹן, ziphrōn): A point on the ideal N. border of Canaan (Nu 34 9). Site uncertain. E. E. N.

ZIPPOR, zip'ōr (צִפּוֹר, tsippōr), 'bird' (sparrow ?): The father of Balak, King of Moab (Nu 22 2, etc.). E. E. N.

ZIPPORAH, zip-pō'rā or zip'o-rā (צִפֹּרָה, tsippōrāh), 'bird': The daughter of Jethro (or Hobab) and wife of Moses (Ex 2 21, 4 25 f., 18 2). The tradition concerning her was not uniform (e.g., what is said in 18 2 is not in exact harmony with 4 20 ff.). That the "Cushite" woman whom Moses married (Nu 12 1 f.) was the same as Z. is possible, but not certain. E. E. N.

ZITHRI, zith'rai. See SITHRI.

ZIV, ziv. See TIME, § 3.

ZIZ, ziz (צִיץ, tsīts): The name of an ascent (II Ch 20 16), on the way from Engedi (ver. 2) to the wilderness of Tekoa (ver. 20), which the Moabites and Ammonites had traversed in their attack on Judah and King Jehoshaphat. The letter ה, of the text, may be part of the name, and not the article, as there is a Wâdy Ḥaṣaṣa and plateau of the same name N. of Engedi. C. S. T.

ZIZA, zai'za (זִיזָא, zīzā'): 1. A Simeonite "prince" (I Ch 4 37). 2. A son of Rehoboam and Maacah, the daughter of Absalom (II Ch 11 20). 3. See ZINA. E. E. N.

ZIZAH, zai'zā. See ZINA.

ZOAN, zō'an (צֹעַן, tsō'an; better known by its Gr. name, Tanis): A very ancient and important Egyptian city (Nu 13 22; Ps 78 12; Is 19 11, 30 4; Ezk 30 14) in the NE. of the Delta, the extensive ruins of which lie near the modern fishing-village of Ṣân (i.e., Zoan). See Petrie, Tanis, in EPF, for notices of recent excavations. The kings of the 6th dynasty (2625–2475 B.C.) built a great temple at Tanis, which was enlarged under subsequent rulers and finally completed by Rameses II, who chose the city as his residence and adorned it with many beautiful buildings. Under the 21st dynasty Tanis was the capital of Egypt, and continued to be one of the chief commercial centers until it was finally superseded by the new city of Alexandria. L. G. L.

ZOAR, zō'ār (צוֹעַר, tsō'ar), 'small': One of the cities of the kikkār, or Dead Sea basin (Gn 13 10). It is also called Bela (14 2, 8). Lot and his daughters fled to Z. when Sodom was overthrown (19 20-23). The evidence that these "cities of the Plain" were located at the S. rather than at the N. end of the Dead Sea is overwhelming: (1) From Is 15 5 and Jer 48 34, it is reasonable to infer that Z. was a city of Moab, so that it was probably at the SE. corner of the Dead Sea (cf. Gn 19 37). (2) The victory of Chedorlaomer and his allies over the five kings of the plain in the Vale of Siddim, which was "full of slime pits" (Gn 14 10), is more easily explained on the assumption that these cities were at the S. end of the Dead Sea. (3) Ezekiel describes Sodom as on the "right," i.e., the S. of Jerusalem (16 46). (4) On the other hand, Gn 13 10 does not require one to suppose that Lot, standing at Bethel (ver. 3), saw literally "all" that particular portion of the Dead Sea basin in which Z. was located; even "all" the Jordan Valley N. of the Dead Sea is not visible from Bethel. (5) Likewise, Dt 34 3 must not be urged literally, for no one has ever seen "Dan" from Mt. Nebo (cf. ver. 1). Post-Biblical writers and modern commentators are generally agreed that Z. was situated S. or SE. of the Dead Sea. Josephus placed "Zoara" in Arabia (BJ, IV, 8 4); Eusebius located the Dead Sea between "Zoara" and Jericho (Onom. 261); the recently discovered mosaic map of Medebah (near Mt. Nebo in Moab), dating from about 500 A.D., places Zoar at the SE. corner of the Dead Sea; Abulfeda, the Arab geographer of Hamath, described it as the capital of Edom; and Dimashki (c. 1300 A.D.), another Arab authority, placed it in the Wâdy el-Aḥsâ at the SE. corner of the Dead Sea. In short, this location is accepted by the great majority of recent authorities, including Delitzsch, Dillmann, Driver, G. A. Smith, Buhl, and many others. G. L. R.

ZOBAH, zō'bā, ZOBA, zō'ba (צוֹבָה, tsōbhāh, also spelled צוֹבָא and צוֹבָא): An Aramæan principality, first mentioned in I S 14 47 as one of the enemies of Israel with whom Saul waged war. The Ammonites hired the Aramæans of Zobah to aid them against David, but the allied forces were defeated (II S 10 6, 8). Later, Hadadezer, King of Zobah, was routed by David at Helam, and the kingdom was made tributary (II S 8 3 ff.). Igal, one of David's captains, was from Zobah (II S 23 36). Winckler identifies it with the Aramæan principality known as Subiti in the Assyrian inscriptions which lay to the S. of Damascus. Others advocate an identification with Chalkis, situated on the slopes of Lebanon. The chief argument for the latter theory is the mention of Zobah as a source of copper (II S 8 8). But see METALS, § 1. J. A. K.

ZOBEBAH, zo-bî'bā (הַצֹּבֶבָה, ha-tsōbhēbhāh): Either a place- or a clan-name (I Ch 4 8).
E. E. N.

ZOHAR, zō'hār (צֹחַר, tsōḥar): 1. The ancestral head of a clan of Simeon (Gn 46 10; Ex 6 15). See also ZERAH. 2. The father of Ephron the Hittite (Gn 238, 25 8 f.).
E. E. N.

ZOHELETH, zō'he-leth (זֹחֶלֶת, zoḥeleth), 'serpent': The name of a stone beside En-rogel (I K 1 9), a spring S. of Jerusalem, probably the modern Bîr-Eiyûb (Job's Well) at the mouth of Hinnom (so Paton, Jerusalem in Bible Times, 35 f., and G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, I, 109 f.). When Adonijah planned to make himself king, he sacrificed on the "serpent's stone," which may have been an ancient Jebusite place of worship and sacrifice. Others identify En-rogel with Gihon, the Virgin's Spring, and Z. with a rocky ascent (Zeḥweileh) opposite the spring, which leads to the village of Silwân. Smith, however, loc. cit., states that the name Zeḥweileh seems to be applied to a stratum of rock running as far S. as Bîr-Eiyûb.
C. S. T.

ZOHETH, zō'heth (זֹחֵת, zōḥēth): A son of Shimon, a Judahite (I Ch 4 20).
E. E. N.

ZOPHAH, zō'fā (צוֹפָח, tsōphaḥ): The ancestor of an Asherite family (I Ch 7 35).
E. E. N.

ZOPHAI, zō'fai or -fê. See ZUPH.

ZOPHAR, zō'fār (צוֹפַר, tsōphār): A Naamathite, and one of Job's friends (Job 2 11, 11 1, etc.). The Naamah here alluded to was probably not the one in Judah, but some other locality E. of the Jordan, or in Arabia. See also JOB.
E. E. N.

ZOPHIM, zō'fim (צֹפִים, tsōphīm), 'watchmen': 1. A 'field of watchmen' on Mt. Pisgah (Nu 23 14). The exact site is unknown. 2. See RAMATHAIM.
E. E. N.

ZORAH, zō'rā, ZOREAH, zō'rē-ā (צָרְעָה, tsor'āh, Zoreah, Jos 15 33 AV, and Zarech, Neh 11 29 AV): A town in the Shephelah of Judah, mentioned with Eshtaol (Jos 15 33). Before the migration of the Danites to the north (Jg 18 2, 8, 11), it had belonged to the tribe of Dan. It was the home of Manoah, Samson's father (Jg 13 2, 25), and Samson was buried between Z. and Eshtaol (Jg 16 31). It was fortified by Rehoboam (II Ch 11 10), and was resettled after the Exile (Neh 11 29). Z. is the modern Ṣur'ah, 15 m. W. of Jerusalem on a hill 800 ft. above the Wâdy eṣ-Ṣur'āh ("valley of Sorek," Jg 16 4), through which runs the railway from Jaffa to Jerusalem. Map II, D 1. Across the wâdy to the S. lies 'Ain Shems (Beth-shemesh). The Wâdy eṣ-Ṣur'āh offered easy access from the maritime plain to the hills about Jerusalem, and, therefore, Zorah, overlooking and commanding the valley, was an important place.

ZORATHITE, zō'rath-ait, ZORITE, zō'rait (צָרְעָתִי, tsor'āthī, I Ch 2 53, Zareathite AV 4 2, צָרְעִי, tsor'ī, I Ch 2 54): A Calebite family, which migrated from the S. of Judah to Zorah (q.v.), or descendants of the family which resettled Z. after the Exile.
C. S. T.

ZOROBABEL, zo-rob'a-bel. See ZERUBBABEL.

ZUAR, zū'ar (צוּעָר, tsū'ār): A "prince" of Issachar (Nu 1 8, 2 5, etc.).
E. E. N.

ZUPH, zuf (צוּף, tsūph): I. An ancestor of Samuel the prophet (I S 1 1; I Ch 6 35, called Zophai in 6 26). II. The land of Zuph (I S 9 5), a region in central Israel, probably connected with I as the place where the Zuphites lived. Location unknown.
E. E. N.

ZUR, zūr (צוּר, tsūr), 'rock': 1. A Midianite chieftain, slain by Israel (Nu 25 15, 31 8; Jos 13 21). 2. See ZEROR.

ZUZIM, ziū'zim (זוּזִים, zūzīm): A people of Ham, a district E. of the Jordan conquered by Chedorlaomer (Gn 14 5). They are mentioned between the Rephaim of Ashteroth-karnaim (in Bashan) and the Emim of Shaveh-kiriathaim (in Moab). Ham seems to have been a city of the country inhabited by Ammon, of which Rabbath-ammon (modern Ammân) was the chief city. In Dt 2 20 "Zamzummim" occurs as the Ammonite name of the original inhabitants of the territory N. of Moab, and these were probably the same as the Zuzim. Sayce (Modern Crit. and the Monuments) claims that the variations in the names can be accounted for by the cuneiform originals, and that the form in Dt gives the pronunciation, while that in Gn gives the name as it appeared on some Babyl. tablet. He is also of the opinion that Ham is another form of Ammân, which is explained in a similar way. If we can give credence to the archeological notes of Dt 2 10-20, the Zuzim were a part of the Rephaim (q.v.), as were also the Emim (a Moabite name). Possibly, the name has some connection with the ghosts of dead giants (see REPHAIM) as 'whisperers,' 'murmurers' (cf. Is 8 19). Some find in Ziza', a ruin 20 m. S. of Rabbath-ammon, a trace of the name Zuzim.
